durit not drive or direct it to any place certaine, thereby to make triall whether it were indeed the hand of God that had stricken them. For if the Arke of God were carried towards Bethleem, and into the territorie of Israel: then they should resolve that from God onely came their late destruction. For the Philistines knew that the milch kine which drew the Arke, could not be forced from their calves, but that they would have followed them wherefoever; much lesse when they were left to themselves would they traue a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world if calves be remoued from their dammes, the kine will follow them through woods, and desertes by the foote, till they finde them. But the kine trauielled directly towards Bethleem: and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one Iosua of the same Citie, they stood fill there; which when the Princes of the Philistines perceived, they returned to Ekrum: After which, God spared not his owne people the Bethlemites, in that they presumed to looke into the Arke. And because they knew God, and his commandments and had bene taught accordingly: he strooke them more grievously than he did the Heathen, for there perished of them fiftie thousand and seuentie. From hence the Arke was carried to Kiriath-seaun and placed in the house of Abinadab: where it is written that it remained twentie yeere in the charge of Elezar his sonne, untill Dauid brought it to Hierusalem.

Now whereas it is said, that in the meane while the Arke was in Xob, Misphab and Galgala, it was the Tavernacle, which was at this time seuered from the Arke: or at least, it was for the present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kiriath-seaun.

§. III.

Of SAMUEL and of his Government.

These Tragedies ouerpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while hee was yet a childe, became now Judge and Gouernour of Israel. He was descended of the familie of Beniamin, Chore or Korach. For Leui had three sonnes Gerson, Cheath, and Amerari: Cheath had Amram, and Iezar: of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Iezar, Chore: and of the familie of Chore, Samuel. His father Elezar a Leuite, was called an Ephraimite, not that the Leuites had any proper inheritance, but because he was of Mount Ephraim, like as Iesse, Dauid's father was called an Ephraimite, because borne at Ephraim, or Bethleem. Hannah his mother being long fruitlesse, obtained him of God by prayers and teares: it being an exceeding shame to the Lewish women, to be called barren in respect of the blessing of God both to Abraham that his seed should multiply, as the Starres of Heauen, and the fands of the Sea, as in the beginning to Adam, increase and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomie the seauenth, There shall bee neither male nor female barren among you.

Samuel was no sooner borne, but that his mother according to her former vowe dedicated him to God, and his seruice, to which the deliuered him euen from the dugges. For as the first borne of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were five yeeres old for five sheekles, and betwene five yeeres and twentie for twentie sheekles: so was it not required by the Law that any of the race of the Leuites should be called to serue about the Tavernacle, till they were five and twentie yeeres old.

Saint Peter reckons in the Actes the Prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the writers of holy Scriptures, to whom usually this name of a Prophet was giuen, and yet did Moses account himselfe such a one, as in the 18. of Deuter. The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet like unto mee, &c. But hee is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called Seers; as, Before time in Israel, when a man went to seeke an answer of God, thus he spake, Come and let us goe to the Seer:

for he that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appeare by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether with-drawne his grace from Israel: but as the Chaldean Paraphrast hath it, those reuelations before Samuel's time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel iudged were Mispha or Mispha, seated on a hill in Beniamin neare Juda: also Gilgal, and Bethel, of which we haue spoken elsewhere.

The Philistines taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation for Warre at Mispha in the beginning of Samuel's government, gathered their Armie and marched towards the Citie: at whose approach the Israelites stricken with feare, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and seruitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them: who was then performing his sacrifice when the Philistines were in view. But God being moued with Samuel's prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia) It pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beate downe the Armie of the Philistines, according to the prophetic of Hanna, Samuel's Mother. The Lords aduersaries shall be destroyed, and out of heauen shall be thunder upon them, &c. Iosephus affirms that a part of the Philistines were swallowed with an earth-quake: and that Samuel himselfe led the Israelites in the prosecution of their victorie. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happy successe obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Iosephus called lapidem sortem: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunitie and aduantage of the victorie, the Israelites recovered diuers Cities of their owne formerly lost, and held long in possession of the Philistines, who for a long time after did not offer any inuasion or reuenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts: the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not be assaulted from diuers parts at once; having the Philistines towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanites toward the North and East, and the Idumites on the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gaue audience and iudgment in diuers places by turnes, as hath bene elsewhere said.

§. I.

Of the deliberation to change the government into a Kingdome.

When age now beganne to ouer-take Samuel, and that hee was not able to vnder-goe the burthen of so carefull a government, he put off from himselfe the waight of the affaires on his Sonnes, Ioel and Abijah, who iudged the people at Beersheba, a Citie, the very vtmost towards the South of Juda. And as the place was inconuenient and farre away, so were themselves no lesse remoued from the iustice and vertue of their Father. For the thirst of couetousnesse the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and delireth, finding tast in nothing but gain; to recouer which they did set the Law at a price, and sold Iustice and iudgment to the best Chapman. Which when when the Elders of Israel observed, and saw that Samuel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the errors of his owne, they praised him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be judged as other Nations were; who might also leade them to the Warre and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable success which followed the rule of Eli his sonnes, when those of Samuel by their first blotsomes promised to yeld fruit no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the government out from his race, whom they so much reuerenced, but by the choise of a King.

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile from God: which surely he did not for the establishing of his owne sonnes; who being as they were, God would not haue approved his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, hee vsed his best arguments to deterre them: which when he perceived to bee ouer-feeble, hee deliuered vnto them from Gods reuelation, the inconueniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which hee fore-shewed was not intolerable, but such as hath bene borne, and is so still by free consent of the Subjects towards their Princes. For first he makes them know that the King will vse their sonnes in his owne seruice to make them his Horse-men, Chariotiers, and Foot-men; which is not only not grievous, but by the vassalls of all Kings according to their birth and condition desired: it being very agreeable to Subjects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres; and to till the ground no lesse proper and appertaining to those that are thereto bred and brought vp: so are likewise the offices of women-servants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatned: He will take up your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your best Olive trees, and give them to his servants; with other oppressions; this hath giuen, and giues daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their owne discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here vnto them the power of a King, gouerned by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others vpon further examination construe this Text farre otherwise, as teaching vs what Subjects ought with patience to beare at their Soueraignes hand. The former opinion is grounded first vpon that place of Deuteronomie, where God fore-sheweth this change of government from Iudges to Kings, and after he had forbidden many things vnto the Kings, as many wiues, couetousnesse, and the like: he commandeth that the Kings which were to raigne ouer Israel, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall read therein all dayes of his life: that he may learne to feare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the wordes of this Law, and these ordinances for to do them: that he may prolong his daies in his Kingdome, he and his Sonnes. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrarie to the lawes of God: in the same booke written. For it is said, That which do is right and right shalt thou follow, that thou mayest liue. Now if it bee not permitted to carrie away grapes more than thou canst eate out of an other mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much lesse lawfull to take the vineyard it selfe from the owner, and giue it to an other. Neither are the wordes of the Text (say they) such as doe warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper vnto them, to take at will any thing from their vassalls. For it is not said that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your Sonnes: and againe, this shall be the manner of the King that shall raigne ouer you. God thereby fore-shewing what power secured from pietie, (because it is accountable to God only) will doe in the future. And hereof we finde the first example in Achab, who tooke from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrarie to the trust which God had put in him, of gouerning well his people. For God commanded, That his people should be iudged with righteous iudgement. Wherefore though the King had offered vnto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better valew, or the worth in money money which he refused: yet because he was falsely accused and vniustly condemned (though by colour of law) how grievously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell vs. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a liuing Law, euen as Dauid testifieth of himselfe. Posuisti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true. Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata equitas non est equitas: sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio: Fained innocence, and fained equitie are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled in which there is both iniquitie and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disposition who thinke this place to containe the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrarie side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well knowne to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true law of free Monarchies, which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much lesse here to insert. Only thus much I will say, that if practise doe shew the greatnesse of authoritie, euen the best Kings of Juda and Israel were not so tied by any lawes, but that they did whatsoever they pleased in the greatest things; and commanded some of their owne Princes, and of their owne bretheren to be slaine without any trial of law, being sometimes by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though Dauid confessed his offence by the death of Uriah, yet Salomon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed vnto him as any offence.

That the state of Israel should receiue this change of government, it was not only fore-told by Moses in Deuteronomie, but prophesied of by Iacob in this Scripture. The scepter shall not depart from Iuda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing. For it was not only assured that his issues should in number equall the Starres in heauen, but that Kings should procede of him: Which state seeing it is framed from the Patterne of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Vniuersall: and the excellencie thereof in respect of all other governments, hath bene by many iudicious men handled and proued, I shall not neede to ouer-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Judges every man hath observed what ciuill Warre Israel had: what outrageous slaughters they committed vpon each other: in what miserable seruitude they liued for many yeares: and when it faced best with them, they did but defend their owne Territories, or recover some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Countrey. The Ammonites held much of Gilead ouer Jordan: the Philistines the Sea-coasts: and the Iebusites Hierusalem it selfe, till *Dauid*s time: all which that King did not only conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subiected all the Neighbour Nations, and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassalls. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moued by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to liue vnder a Monarch, or whether by this means they sought to be cleared from the sonnes of Samuel, they became deafe to all the perswasions and threats which Samuel vsed, insisting vpon this point that they would haue a King, both to iudge them and defend them: wherevnto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, hee sent euery man to his owne Citie and abiding.

§. II.

of the election of S. AVAL.

After that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at  Mizpah , hee forbore the election of a King, till such time as he was therein directed by God: who fore-told him the day before, that he would present vnto him a man of the Land of Beniamin, whom hee commanded Samuel to anoint. So

Samuel

Samuel went vnto Ramath Saphim, to make a feast for the entertainement of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promise) and Saul also hauing wandred diuers daies to seeke his Fathers Asse, at length by the aduise of his seruant trauailed towards Ramath, to finde out a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his beasts. In which Iourney it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages and persons) to elect Saul, who sought an Asse, and not a Kingdome: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheepe of Iethro; and after to make choise of Dauid the yongest of eight sonnes, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beuts, and changed his sheep-hooke into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Iuda and Israel. So Iohn and Jacob were taken from cauling their nets, to become Fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apofiles, a dignitie that died not in the graue, as all worldly Honours doe: but permanent and euermlasting in Gods endlesse Kingdome.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom he expected and staid his arrival at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom he had foretold him of, that he should rule the people of God. Saul, finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Iudge of Israel, much lesse knowing the Honour which attended him: asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt, Samuel answered that himselfe was the man he sought, and praised Saul to go before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, above all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the Kingdome, and of Gods graces to be bestowed on him, and the morning following appointed him King of Israel.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward; that two men should encounter him by Rabels Sepulcher, who should tell him that his Asse were found; and that his Fathers cares were changed from the feare of loosing his beasts, to doubt the losse of his sonne: that he should then meete three other men in the plaine of Tabor; then a companie of Prophets: and that he should be partaker of Gods spirit and prophetic with them; and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar into that which became a King elected and fauoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spirituall gifts, were not of the first and most reuerenced number, who by diuine reuelation fore-told things to come, reprehended without feare the errors of their Kings, and wrought miracles of which number were Moses, Isaiah, Samuel, and after them Gad, Isaiah, Abias, Elisha, Elisha, Isay, Ieremie, &c. and the rest; for these Prophets faith S. CHRYSOSTOME, Omnis tempora percurrunt, praterita, presentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh of 1. Cor. 1. 14. who enriched with spirituall gifts expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

At Shiloh Samuel assembled the people that hee might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his owne Vnde therewith, when he asked him what had past betwene him and Samuel: for either he thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reueale it, till he were confirmed by generall consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Shiloh, the generall opinion is, that hee was chosen by lot. Chimbi thinks by the answer of **Prin* and Thumim: that is, by the answer of the Priest, wearing that myserie vpon his breast when he asked counsaile of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not only much vsed among the Iewes, but by many others, if not by all Nations. The Land of promise was diuided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goates, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliuerance, for whose garments the Iewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plautus, Paulinus, and others haue remembered diuers sorts of lots, vsed vsed by the Romanes, Gracians, and other Nations: as in the diuision of grounds or honours; and in things to be vnder-taken: the two first kinds were called diuision; the third diuinatorie; and into one of these three all may be reduced: all which kinds howsoever they may seeme chancefull, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs. The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the Kingdome of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gaue Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul withdrew himselfe in modestie, as both Iosephus confests it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when he acknowledged himselfe to the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel enlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the chosen King of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and praised for him; yet some there were that enuied his glorie (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents as the manner was: of whom Saul, to auoide sedition, tooke no notice.

Of the establishing of SAUL by his first victories.

SOONER was Saul placed in the Kingdome, but that hee receiued knowledge that Nabes King of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Iabes Gilead: which Nation since the great overthrow giuen them by Iephtha, neuer durst attempt any thing vpon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did alwaies attend vpon the aduantage of time, to recover those Territories which first the Amorites, and then Israel dispossest them of: which they made the ground of their invasion in Iephtha's time; yet they neuer perfwaded themselves of more aduantage than at this present. For first they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly they were remembered that the Philistims had not long before slaine 34000. of their men of Warre: and besides had vsed great care and pollicie that they should haue no Smithes to make them swords or speares: neither was it long before that of the Bethshemites and places adioyning, there perished by the hand of God more then 50000. and therefore in these respects, euen occasion it selfe invited them to enlarge their Dominions vpon their borderers: Iabes Gilead being one of the nearest. Besides it may further be coniectured that the Ammonites were emboldened against Iabes Gilead, in respect of their weakenesse, since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not ioyning with them against the Beniamites: at which time they did not only slaughter the men and male-children, but tooke from them their yong women, and gaue them to the Beniamites: and therefore they were not likely to haue beene increased to any great numbers: And if they had recovered themselves of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himselfe with the opinion, that Israel hauing for long time beene disarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would giue them no other condition to ransom themselves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they should be vterly disabled for the Warre, as elswhere hath beene spoken: Saul, both to valow himselfe in his first yeares raigne, and because perchance he was defended of one of those 400. Maides taken from the Gileadites, and giuen to the Beniamites, gaue order to assemble the forces of Israel: hewing a yoke of Oxen into peeces and sending them by messengers ouer all the coasts, profitting thus: That whosoever came not forth after SAUL and after SANUEL, so should his Oxen be serued: threatening the people by

by their goodes, and not by their liues at the first. Seuen daies had Saul to assemble an Armie, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seuen daies to giue Nahab the Ammonite an answer: who, could they have obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to haue secured themselves from Israel, and to become Vassalls and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the meane while Saul assembled the forces, which repaired vnto him at Bezece, neare Jordan, that he might readily passe the River; which done he might in one day with a speedy marche arrive at Iabes, vnder the Hills of Gilead.

1.Sam.17.8. The Armie by Saul led consisting of three hundred and thirtie thousand: he returned an answer to those of Iabes, that they should assure themselves of succour by the next day at noone. For as it seemeth Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch hee surprized the Armie of Nahab the Ammonite. And to the end that he might set on them on all sides, he diuided his force in three parts, putting them to the sword, vntill the heate of the day, and the wearinesse of Sauls troups, infort them to giue ouer the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more carelesse and secure, in that those of Iabes promised the next morning to render themselves and their Citie to their mercie. After this happy successe the people were so farre in loue with their new King, that they would haue flaine all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent louers of the prosperous, and base vassalls of the time that flourisheth: or as despightfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident hath throwne downe.

1.Sam.17.11. After the Armie remoued, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as some Commenters affirme, anointed King; and here Samuel vied an exhortation to all the assembly, containing precepts, and a rehearsal of his owne Iustice, during the beginning of his gouernment to that day. After Saul had now reigned one yeare before hee was established in Gilgal or Galgala, he strengthened himselfe with a good guard of 3000. chosen men, of which he assigned 1000. to attend on Jonathan his sonne at Gibeah, the Citie of his 30 natuities: the rest hee kept about his owne person in Niomas; and in the Hill of Bethel.

§. IIII.

Of SAULS disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his small reitition.

1.Sam.13.5. INATHAN with his small Armie or Regiment, that attended him, 40 taking a time of advantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as some thinke, which Saul past by, when he came from Rama where he was first anointed by Samuel, which they thinke to haue bene Cariath-seirim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison 1.Sam.10. is called the Hill of God, which they vnderstand of Cariath-seirim: but Imus vnderstands this Garrison to haue bene at Gibeah in Beniamin neare Gibba where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers. Howsoever by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Israel: and now being greatly iraged by this surprize they assembled 30000. armed Chariots, and 6000. Horse, where-with they invaded Iduea, and incamped at Michmas or Michmas, a Citie of Beniamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hierusalem, and in the midle of the Land betweene the Sea and Jordan. With this suddaine inuasion the Israelites were stricken in so great a feare, as some of them hid themselves in the caues of the mountains, other fled ouer Jordan into

1.Sam.13.13. Goa and Gilead: Saul himselfe with some 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, staid at Galgala in Beniamin, not farre from the passage of Iordan which hee led Israel ouer Jordan. Here Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the coming of Samuel seuen daies. But when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place 1.Sam.13.9.) to exercise the office which appertained not vnto him, and to offer a burnt offering and a peace offering vnto God, contrarie to the Eccle. asticall lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commandements: others expound the word obedi, in this place, by obedi per Sacerdotem, and so make the sinne of Saul not to haue bene any intrusion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commandment, in not laying according to the appointment. Secondly a diffidence or mistrust in Gods helpe, & too great relying vpon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not beare patiently, and lastly a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him.

1.Sam.13.13. But whatsoeuer was his sinne, notwithstanding his excuses, he was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in termes vntisning his estate, had not extraordinary warrant bene giuen to Samuel so to doe, from God himselfe, at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should be conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart) both from Saul and his posteritie.

1.Sam.13.19. 10. After this Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul when he had taken view of his armie found it to consist of 600. men: for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or speare, but Saul and his sonne Jonathan only. For the Philistims had not left them any Smith in all Israel, that made weapons; besides they that came to Saul came hastily, and left such weapons & armour as they had, behind them in the garrisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should be able the yeere before, or in some part of this very yeere, to succour Iabes Gilead with 33000. men, if there had not now bene any yron weapon to defend themselves withall, saue onely in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his sonne. But howsoever, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistims, and all those craftsmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left vnto the Israelites onely files to sharpen and amend such stiffe as serued for the plough, and for nought else: yet that they had some kinde of armes it is manifest, or els they durst not haue attempted vpon the Philistims as they did. And it is not said in the Text that there was not any sword in all Israel, but onely that there was not any found amongst those 600. souldiers which staid with Saul after Samuels departure: 1.Sam.13.22. and it seemeth that when Samuel had publicly reprehended Saul, that his owne guards forooke him, hauing but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie souldiers, and of all the rest that repaired vnto him, of which many were fled from him before 40 Samuel arrived.

With this small troupe he held himselfe, to his owne Citie of Gibeah, as a place of more strength and better assured vnto him, then Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to passe that the Philistims should thus disarm the most part of the Israelites, howsoever in the time of Samuel much had bin done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by sword or speare, but by thunder from heauen: and when these craftsmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no meruaile if they could not in a short peace vnder Samuel be replanted againe. For this tyranny of the Philistims is to be vnderstood, rather of the precedent times, than vnder Samuel: and yet vnder him it is to be thought that by their craftiest they proceeded in the policie, not suffering their artificers to teach the Israelites, and so euen to the times of Saul kept them from hauing any store of armour. The same policie did Nabuchodonosor vse after his Conquest in Iudea: Dariusius in Suetie; and many other Princes elsewhere in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repaire in Gilead, for ouer Jordan the Philistims

Philistines had not invaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquitie vsed, and their present necessitie ministred vnto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Beniamites exceeded in casting stones in slings: and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the twelfth Chapter, it is written of those that came to succour David against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were armed with bowes, and could vse the right and the left hand with stones; & with a sling it was, that David himselfe slew the gyant Goliath.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard termes, the Philistines hauing parted their armie into three troupes, that they might spoile and destroy many parts at once; Jonathan strengthened by God, and followed with his Esquire onely, scaled a mountaine, whereon a companie of Philistines were lodged: the rest of their armie (as may be gathered by the successe) being incamped in the plaine adioyning. And though hee was discovered before he came to the hill toppe, and in a kind of derision called vp by his enemies: yet hee so behaued himselfe, as with the assistance of God hee slew twentie of the first Philistines that hee encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, feare, and ieioultie, they slaughtered one another in stead of enemies: wherupon those Hebrewes which became of their partie, because they feared to be spoiled by them, tooke the aduantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly Saul himselfe taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that thronged themselves in mount Ephraim, set vpon them and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happie and glorious victorie ouer them. Heere was that prophetic in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and two of them ten thousand.

This done, the small armie of Israel made retreat from the pursuit. And though Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take foode till the euenng, yet his son Jonathan being infeebled with extreme labour and emptinesse, tasted a droppe of hony in his passage: for which Saul his father would haue put him to death, had not the people deliuered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Jonathan, seemes to haue reduced vnto the Philistines remembrance their former overthrow likewise miraculous in the daies of Samuel; so that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, vnderooke by turnes all his bordering enemies; namely the Mohabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zabab, against all which he preuailed. Hee then assembled all the forces hee could make, to wit, 2 10000. men, and receiuing the commandement of God by Samuel, hee invaded Amalek, waisting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petraea, and the desert, belonging to the Amalekites, from Hailah towards Tigris vnto Shur, which bordereth Aegypt; in which warre hee tooke Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all other attempted Israel, when they left Aegypt in Moses time: he notwithstanding did not only spare the life of Agag, but reserued the best of the beastes and spoile of the Country, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the liuing God.

Therefore did Samuel now a second time make him know, that God would cast him from his roiall estate to which he was raised, when he was of base condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voice of God by Samuel, had there bin no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not be ignorant how severely it pleased God to inioyne the Israelites to reuenge themselves vpon that Nation, he was in all vnexcusable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalek from vnder heauen. For the crueltie which the predecessors of this Agag vsed against the Israelites, especially on those which were ouerwearyed, faint, sicke, and aged people, was now to be reuenged on him, & his Nation about 400. yeres afterword; and and now hee was to pay the debt of blood, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himselfe hauing also sinned in the same kind, as these words of Samuel witness: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women; at which time Samuel himselfe (after he had bin by many bootlesse intreaties perswaded to stay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in peeces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul, until the day of his death.

¶ V.

Of the occurrences betwene the reiection of Saul and his death.

NOW while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sonnes of Israh: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how he might auoide both the suspicion, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wisdom he sought to auoide the inconuenience or dangers of this life, then doe those men mistake the nature of his diuine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath giuen them, doe not otherwise auoide the perils and dangers thereof, than as men flippied in the opinion of fate, or destinie, neglecting either to begge counsaile at Gods hand, by prayer, or to exercise that wisdom or fore-sight, where-with God hath enriched the mind of man, for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdain here to instruct Samuel, to auoide the curse of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sonnes of Israh, Samuel by God directed, made choise of David, the yongest, hauing refused Eliab, the first borne; who though he were a man of comely person and great strength; yet vnto such outward appearance the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. Hee also refusing the other six brethren, made choise of one whom his Father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flock, for of him the Lord said to Samuel, arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to seeke the life of David: in which cloudy mind he continued till he died, ouercome in battaile by the Philistines.

The Philistines hauing well considered (as it seemes) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilst they had sitten still and forborne to giue impediment vnto his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new triall of their fortune, as iustly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Israel might be repaied with aduantage, if euer opportunitie should serue their often injured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Israh, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all Warlike promotions, the Philistines had reason to thinke themselves equal, if not superiours to Israel. The successe of their former wars had for the most part been agreeable to their owne wilhes; as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisdom, impute them to second causes, as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarme, whereby their Armie possessed with a needlesse feare had fallen to rout. Hauing therefore mustered their forces and taken the field, encamping so neare to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the triall of a battaile, each part kept their ground of aduantage for a while, not ioyning in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the valley that lay between their Camps. Iust causes of feare they had on both sides; especially the Philistines, whose late attempts had beene confounded by the angrie hand of God. Vpon this occasion perhaps it was, that they fought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroke from heaven were to be feared. Goliath a strong giant, fearing neither God nor man, undertooke to defie the whole hoste of Israel, prouoking them with despitefull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand, offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it selfe as ouercome in grosse, and become vassall to the other. This gaue occasion to young Dauid, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had anointed, to make a famous entrance into publicke notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe to encounter the great strength of Goliath, (sent by his father to an errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes offensive or defensive than a sling, wherewith hee ouerthrew that haughtie gyant, and after with his owne sword strooke off his head. Hereupon the Philistines, who should haue yielded themselves as subiects to the Conquerour, according to the couenant on their owne side propounded, fled without stay; and were pursued and slaughtered euen to their owne gates. By this victorie the Philistines were not so broken, that either any of their townes were lost, or their people discouraged from insulting the Territories of Israel. But Dauid, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the grievous indignation of his matter Saul, through the honour purchased by his well deserving. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul and came vpon Dauid, he then became a cruel Tyrant, faithlesse and irreligious. Because the high Priest Amiath led Dauid in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with the sword of his own conquest taken from Goliath; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murdered this Amiath, and 85. Priests of Nob, but also he destroyed the Citie, and smote with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both childe and sucking, both Oxe and Ass, and sheepe. And he that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preferred the best of his Cattell, contrary to the Commandement and ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercie in store, for the innocent, for the Lords seruants the Priests of Israel. Yea he would haue slaine his owne sonne Jonathan, for pitying and pleading Dauids innocencie, as also once before for tasting the hony, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers vnreasonable commination. The companions of crueltye are breach of faith towards men, and impietie towards God. The former he shewed in denying Dauid his daughter, whom he had promised him: and againe in taking her away from him, to whom he had giuen her; also in that when as Dauid had twice spared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice sworn to do him no hurt, and confessed his errors, yet he sought still to destroy him, by all the means he could. His impietie towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the witch of Endor, which was the last preparatiue for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsell from God he had bene alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Demill this successe followed, that both himselfe, and his three sons, with his neereft and faithfuller seruants, were all slaughtered by the Philistines: his bodie with the bodies of his sonnes (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung ouer the wals of Bethsan: and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of rauenous birds, had not the grateful Gileadites of Iabes stolne their carcases thence and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had gouerned Israel, together with Samuel 40. yeeres, and by himselfe after Samuel 20. yeeres, according to Cedrenus, Theophilus, & Iosephus. But yet it seemeth to me that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long. For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written that Samuel died: and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of Dauid, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gaue a faire entrance to all those victories which Dauid afterward obtained, for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crushed the Syrans, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistines.

Q. V I.

Of such as lined with SAMUEL and SAUL; of HELLEN and HERCULES, and of their issues: upon occasion of the DORIES, with the HERACLIDAE, entering PELOPONNESVS about this time.

N the second yeare of Samuel, according to Ensebius, was Dauid borne: after Codemian later, and in the ninth yeare: after Bunting in the tenth. For Dauid, saith he, was thirtie yeares old when he beganne to raigne: whence it followeth, that he was borne in the tenth of the fortie yeares, which are giuen to Samuel and Saul. About the eleuenth of Samuel, Aeneas Silvius the sonne of Posthumus beganne his raigne ouer the Latines in Alba, who gouerned that State 31. yeares. There are who place before him Latinus Silvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from Aeneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleuenth of Samuel, Dercilus late in the Throne of Assyria, being the one and thirtieth King; hee ruled that Empire 40. yeares. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heracids, who then led and commanded the Nation, possesse a great part thereof 328. yeares before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Aeolians: at length it was called Hellenis, and the people Hellenes, of Hellen, the sonne of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrie of Phrygia in Thessalia. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and sundrie great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie vnder their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet euerie seuerall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had raigne ouer it. And because this is the furthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amiss to recount the Pedigree of her first planters.

Epetus (as the Poets fable) was the sonne of Heaven and Earth, so accounted, either because the names of his Parents, had in the Greeke tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.

Epetus begat Prometheus, and Epimetheus: of whom all men haue read that haue read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion: and Epimetheus, Pyrrha. Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha raigne in Thessalia, which then was called Pyrrha (as Cretensis Rhanius affirmeth) of Pyrrha the Queene. In Deucalions time was that great flood, of which we haue spoken elsewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen: whose sonnes were Xuthus, Dorus, and Aeolus: of Dorus and Aeolus, the Dores and Aeolians had name. The Aeoles inhabited Haetia. The Dores hauing first inhabited landrie parts of Thessalia, did afterward seate themselves about Parnassus: and finally became Lords of the Countrie about Lacedaemon: Xuthus the eldest sonne of Hellen, being banished by his brethren, for hauing diuerted from them to his owne wife some part of their Fathers goods, came to Asiens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erichon, hee begat on her two sonnes, Achaeus and Ion. Of these two Achaeus, for a slaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponnesus: and seating himselfe in Laconia, gaue name to that region: from whence (as some write) he afterward departed; and leuying an Armie recovered the Kingdome of his grand-father in Thessalia.

Ion being Generall for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby such loue and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. He diuided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing euerie one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied he planted Colonies in Sicionia, then called Aegialos, or Aegida: In which Countrie Salmus then raigning, thought it safer to giue his daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him. So

Ion married Helen, and built a Towne called by his wifes name in Agialia, where he and his posteritie reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gave to that Land the denomination. But in after-times the Dores assisting the Nephewes of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, and over-comming the Acheans possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Acheans had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Acheans driven to seeke a new seate, came vnto the Ionians, desiring to inhabite Agialia with them, and allading in vaine, that Ion and Acheus had beene brethren. When this request could not bee obtained, they fought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tijamenes, the sonne of Orestes, in that Warre.

Thus were the Ionians driven out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remove into Attica, from whence after a while they came into Asia, and peopled the Westerne coast thereof, on which they built twelue Cities, inhabited by them, euen to this day, at the least without any vniuersall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Ionians into Asia hath bene mentioned of all which haue written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. yeeres after the warre of Troy, and 60. yeeres after the descent of the Heracles into Peloponnesus. These Heracidae were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeeres. Of their Father Heracles many strange things are deliuered vnto vs by the Poets, of which some are like to haue bene true, others perhaps must be auaricantly vnderstood. But the most approved Writers thinke that there were many called Heracles; all whose exploits were by the Greekes ascribed to the sonne of Amenus, who is said to haue performed these twelue great labours.

First, he slew the Nemean Lyon: secondly, he flew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: The third was the ouer-taking a very swift Hart: The fourth was the taking of a wild Bore alive, which hanted mount Erymanthus in Arcadia: The fift was the cleaning of Augias his Oxen-stall in one day, which hee performed by turning the Riuer Alpheus into it: The sixt was the chaling away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalia: The seuenth was the fetching a Bull from Crete: The eighth was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: The three last were to fetch Geryons Beeces from Gades, the golden Apples of the Hesperides, and Cerberus from hell. The Mythologicall interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both ouer-long to be here set downe, and no lesse perplexed than the labours themselves. For some by Heracles vnderstand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancie, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Heracles the Sunne, and his traualles to be the twelue signes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits; as well allured, that the expolition cannot haue more vnlikelihood, than the fables: That hee tooke Elys, Phylis, Oechalia, and other Townes, being assisted by such as either admired his vertues, or were beholding vnto him. Also that he slew many Theues, and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. His traualles through most parts of the world are, or may seeme, borrowed from Heracles Libyensis. But sure it is that many Cities in Greece were greatly bound to him: for that he (bending all his inducours to the common good) deliuered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no Citie of Greece (Athens excepted) required the vertue and deserts of Heracles, with constant protection of his children, persecuted by the King Eurythius. This Eurythius was sonne of Sibenus, and grand-child of Perseus; he reigned in Mycena, the mightiest Citie then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard taskes vpon Heracles, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murder, which in his madnesse hee had committed vpon his owne Children; but as others say, because hee was his Subiect and Seruant: wherefore there are who commend Eurythius for employing the strength of Heracles to so good a purpose. But it is generally agreed agreed by the best writers, that Heracles was also of the stocke of Perseus, and holden in great ialousie by Eurythius because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous seruices, wherein hee was employed, so that hee grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many wifes and Concubines about threecore children. These children Eurythius would haue gotten into his power, when Heracles was dead: but they fled vnto Ceyx King of Trachinis, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurythius) to Athens. The Athenians not only gaue them entertainment, but lent them ayde, wherewith they encountered Eurythius, Iolau the brothers sonne of Heracles, who had assisted him in many of his trauels, was captaine of the Heracleide. It is said of him, that being dead, he obtained leaue of Pluto to liue againe till hee might reuenge the iniuries done by Eurythius: whom when he had slaine in battell, he died againe. It seemes to mee, that whereas he had led Colomes into Sicilie, and abroad there a long time forgotten: hee came againe into Greece to assist his colins, and afterwarde returned backe. When the Peloponnesians vnderstood that Eurythius was slaine, they tooke Atrous the sonne of Pelops to their King: for hee was rich, mightie, and fauoured of the people. Against him the Heracleide marched vnder Hyllus the sonne of Heracles. But to auoid effusion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echemus King of the Tegens a people of Arcadia, who assisted Atrous, with condition that if Hyllus were victor, hee should peaceably enioy what hee challenged as his right: otherwise the Heracleide should not enter Peloponnesus in 100. yeeres. In that combat Hyllus was slaine; and the Heracleide compelled to forbeare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned vnder Arifloemus (as the best authoritie shewes, though some haue said, that they came vnder the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dores, whom they planted in that country, as is before shewed, hauing expelled the Acheans, ouer whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurythius foure generations.

OF HOMER and HESIOD, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

About this time that excellent learned Poet Homer liued, as many of the best Chronologers affirme. He was by race of the Achaens, descended (as Functius imagineth) of Berosus his Anamcon, who gaue name to that people. But this Functius imagineth Homer the Poet to haue bene long after these times, rashly framing his Archichon in the tract, or rather fragment of temporibus, & makes seuen more of this name to haue flourished in diuers Cities in Greece. Whence, sprang the diueritie of opinions, both of the time and of the native Citie of Homer. According to this Archichon, Functius findes Homer about the time of Alansic King of India and Ninus of Rome. Hee was called Atelegenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blind men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verbe homo: for this Homer in his latter time was blinde. * Clemens Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer liued. So also Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Affricus in his Oracion ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flourished 950. yeeres before the Consulshippe of Marcus Vinutius: which Mercator casteth vpon the worlds yeere 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260. yeeres: and about 250. yeeres before the building of Rome, making him to haue flourished about the time of Iehosaphat King of Iuda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus about named, mention authors that make him much auienter. The difference of which authors in this point is not vnworthie the readers consideration, that by this one instance hee may guesse of the difficultie, and so pardon the errors errors in the computations of auncient time: being in such diuersitie of opinions a man may hardly finde out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gaue being to Homer about 85. yeeres after Troy taken, neere the time that the Heraclides returned into Peloponnesus: and * Erato benes after Troy 100. yeeres. Theopompus 500. yeeres after the armie of Greece failed into Phrygia for the warre of Troy. Ephorion makes him contemporarie with Gyges, who began to reigne in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. yeeres after Rome was built) and Sosibius saith, that hee was 90. yeeres before the first Olympiad: which hee feckes to proue by the times of Charillus and his sonne Nicander 3 Phidocorus placeth him 180. after Troy: Aristarchus 140. in the time of the seating of the Colonies in Ionis. Apollodorus affirms that hee liued while Agagilus gouerned Lacedaemon; and that Lycurgus in his young yeeres, about 100. yeeres after the Ionian plantations, came to visit him, neere 240. yeeres after Troy taken. Herodotus findes Homer flourishing 622. yeeres before Xerxes enterprise against the Grecians: which Bravallus accounteth at 168. yeeres after the Troian warre. Eusebius seemes to make him to haue bene about the time of Iouis King of Iulia 124. yeeres before Rome built: though else where in his Chronologie he notes, that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of Dauid, and others in other ages. In his Euangelicall preparation where out of Tatianus Assyrius he cithethundry opinions touching the time when Homer liued, hee reckoneth many other Greece writers more auncient than Homer; as Linus, Philonon, Epimenides, Pheinius, Aristaeus, Orpheus, Musaes, Thamyris, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Achius Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirme, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and on the contrarie, that Luc. Accus the Poet, and Ephorbus the Historian make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaues it vncertaine which of these learned fablers was first borne: but he findes that they liued together some certaine yeeres, wherein he confirms himselfe by an Epigram, written vpon a Treuit, and left by Helicon in Helicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both liued 160. yeeres before Rome built: while 30 the Siluij reigned in Alba, about * 140. yeeres after the fall of Troy. Euthimenes findes them both 200. yeeres after Troy taken, in the time of Acastus the sonne of Pelias, King of Theffaly. For my selfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet liued 3; neither would I offend the reader with these opinions, but only to shew the vncertaintie and disagement of Historians, aswell in this particular, as in all other questions: and dispute of time. For the curiolitie of this mans age is no lesse ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliades with the word Menein, as perhaps containing some great myserie. In derision whereof Lucian taining himselfe to haue bene in hell, and to haue spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he beganne his booke with that word: who answered, That he began in that sort, 40 because it came in his head so to doe.

It seemeth that Senes, or after Macrobis Senemires, ruled Egypt at this time: for Tamperfabrius was his successeur who preceded Vaphres, father in law to Salem.

About the end of Sauls gouernment, or in the beginning of Dauids time according to Cassiodorus, the Amazons with the Cymmerians invaded Asia, Latinus Sylvius then ruling in Italie. And besides the ouertthrow of that famous State of Troy (which fell 103. yeeres before Dauids time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not onely by reason of those Northerne Nations: but there sprung vp, somewhat neerely together, fixe Kingdomes into greatnesse not before erected. In Italie, that of the Latimer in the South part of Greece, those of Lacedaemon, 50 Corinth, and the Achai. In Arabia, Syria Saba, and Damascus, the Adams made themselves Princes, of which there were tenne Kings, which beganne and ended with the King of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the State of the Isaacites hauing now altered their forme of Gouernment, began to flourish vnder Kings, of which which Dauid, in a fewe yeeres, became master of all those neighbouring Nations, who by interchange of times had subiected the Indians, corrupted their religion, and held them vnder in a most abiect, and grievous slavery; to wit, the Edomians, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Itureans, and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistines, Iebusites, Geshurites, Machabites, all which acknowledged Dauid for their Soueraigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

Of DAVID.

§. I.

Of DAVIDS estate in the time of SAUL.

HE hazards which Dauid ranne into while hee was yet onely deligned King, and liuing as a priuate man, expected the Empire, were very many. The first personal act of fame, was his killing of Goliath in the viewe of both armies, whereby hee became knowne to Saul, and so highly affected of Jonathan the sonne of Saul, that hee loued him as his owne soule: In so much as when Saul sought to perswade his sonne, that Dauid would assuredly be the ruine of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when hee pleaded his cause, 30 Jonathan could neuer be perswaded, neuer fors, nor euer wearied from the care of Dauids life, and well doing. It was not long after this signall act of Dauids, but that Saul became exceeding iealous of him, though hee were become as his household seruant, and his Esquire, or armour-bearer. Saul being vexed with an euill spirit, was aduised to procure some cunning Musician to play before him vpon the harpe; whereby it was thought that he might finde ease, which came to passe accordingly. He entertained Dauid for this purpose, and began to fauour him, giuing him a place of Command among the men of warre. But the iealous tyrant soone waxed wearie of his good affections, and sought to kill Dauid, being thereunto moued onely through enuie of his vertue. This passion first brake forth in the middelt of his ra- 40 uing hir, at which time hee threw a speare at Dauid that was then playing on his harpe to doe him ease.

Conforius remembreth one Aclepius a Physitian, who praised the curing of the Frenzie, by the like Mullick: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a Kinde of harmonic, Somer in his third booke of anger witnesseth. But the madnesse of Saul came from the cause of causes, and was thereby incurable, howeouer it sometimes left him, and yielded vnto that mulicke, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Muiitian than to the King.

Saul hauing failed in such open attempts, gaue vnto Dauid the Commandement 50 of 1000. soldiours, to confront the Philistines withall. For hee durst not trust him as before, about his person, fearing his reuenge. Now the better to couer his hatred towards him, hee promised him his daughter Merab to wife: but hauing married her to Adriel, hee gaue to Dauid his younger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to present him with an hundred foreskinnes of the Philistines: hoping rather (in re- spect fect of the valour of that Nation, that the Philistims would take Dauid's head, than he their foreskinnes. This hope failing, when as now Dauid's victories began new feares and iacouities in Saul, hee practised with Jonathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this hee sought to murder him in his owne house, but Michol his wife deliuered him. So Dauid fought Sammel at Ramoth, and being pursued by Saul, fled thence vnto Ab in Beniamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philistim, Prince of Geth: where to ob- scure himselfe, he was forced to counterfeit both simplicitie and distraction. But being ill assured among the Philistims he couered himselfe in the case of Achillies: and after conueying such of his kinsfolkes as were not fit to follow him into Achish, he hid himselfe in the deserts of Ziph, Maon, and the hills of Egaddi, where hee cut off the lap of Saul's garments, and spared his life: as he did a second time in the desert of Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the hatred, with which his master Saul was knowne to persecute him.

Of Achis Dauid obtained * Siklag in Simoon, pretending to inuade Iudaea: but hee bent his forces another way and strooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Israell, letting none liue to complaine vpon him. Achis supposing that Dauid had drawne boud of his owne Nation, thought himselfe assured of him: and therefore preparing to inuade Israhel, summoneth Dauid to assist him, who dissembling his intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore hee withdrew himselfe to Siklag. At his returne he found the towne burnt, his two wines with the wines and children of his people taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his folowes murmured, but God gaue him comfort, and assurance to recouer all againe: which hee did.

This armie of the Philistims commanded by Achis, encountered Saul at Gibeah, in which hee and his three sonnes were slaine. The newes with Saul's Crowne and bracelets were brought to Dauid at Siklag, in his returne from being victorious over Amalech, by a man of the same Nation, who auowed (though falsely) that himselfe at Saul's request had slaine him. Dauid, because hee had accused himselfe, made no scruple to cause him to be slaine at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gaue strong euidence withall. Otherwise it followeth not that euery man ought to bee beleueed of himselfe to his owne prejudice. For it is helde in the lawes, Confessio reorum non habenda est pro explorato crimine, nisi approbata alia insinuit religionem cognoscentis. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an euidence of the crime, unless some other proofe informe the conscience of the Judge. For a man may confesse those things of himselfe, that the Judge by examination may know to bee impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodiis reorum l. si confitetur, et in cap. de pauis l. qui sententiam, therefore doth the Gloss reconcile these two places in this sort. Si quis in iudicio sponte de seipso confitetur, & postea moueat in confessione, id est satis. If any man in iudgement doe confesse of himselfe, of his owne record, and after doth perseuer in his confession, it is enough. That Dauid greatly bewailed Saul it is not improbable, for death cutteth asunder all competition and the lamentable end that befell him, being a King, with whom in effect the strength of Israell also fell, could not but stirre vpon sorrow and moue compassion in the heart of Dauid.

The victorie which the Philistims had gotten was so great, that some townes of the Israelites, even beyond the river of Jordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left vnto the enemy, who tooke possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may seeme strange, that a Nation so warlike and ambitious as were the Philistims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and seeke to make the Conquest entire. Most like it seemes, that the Ciuill warre immediately breaking out betweene Dauid and the house of Saul, wherein Iuda was diuided from the rest of Israell, gaue them hope of an easie victorie ouer both; and thereby caused sed them to attempt nothing at the present, least by so doing they should inforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessarie reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which means, both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were vnited.

§. I I.

of the beginning of DAVIDS reigne, and the warre made by ABNER for ISROSETH.

FTER the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the war, sought to aduance Ishbosheth (or Ishbosus according to Iosephus) though hee had no right to the Kingdome of Israell: for Ishbosheth the first sonne of Jonathan liued. Against this Abner, and Ishbosheth, Dauid made a defensive warre, till Abner past Jordan, and entred the border of Iuda; at which time hee sent Isab with such forces as hee had, to resist Abner: Ishbosheth remaining in Gilead, and Dauid in Hebron. The armies encountered each other neere Gibeon, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few; like to that Combat betwene the Lacedaemonians, and the Argiues, remembered by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were onely left vnslaine. The like triall by a farre lesse number was performed by the Horatii and Curiatii for the Romanes and Latines. The same challenge Goliath the Philistim made, whom Dauid slew: a custome very auient. Edward the third offered the like triall in his owne person to the French King, and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelue chosen of each part, in this warre of Dauid with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Beniamin, and as many of Iuda: whose force and valour was so equall, as there furnished not any one to challenge the victorie. But the quarrell staid not here: for the armie of Iuda prest Abner in grosse, and brake him. Three hundredth and sixtie men of Abners companions were slaine, and but twentie of Iuda; wherof Ashbel the brother of Isab was one: who when hee would needes pursue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not be moued to quit him, he was forced to turne vpon him, wounding him to death, with the stroke of his speare. For though Ashbel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the T ext, as light as a wild Ree, and as Iosephus reporteth, contented not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to haue gotten great fame, if he could haue maistrised Abner (who as Ashbel perswaded himselfe, had by being overthrown and flying away lost his courage) yet here it fell out true; That the race was not to the swift.

That this ciuill warre lasted two yeeres, wee finde it written in the second of Samuel the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceiue that Ishbosheth had then reigned two yeeres, when this was written, the warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the partie of Ishbosheth after this, and till such time as there grew iacouities betwene him and Ishbosheth for Saul's concubine: neither did the death of Ishbosheth instantly follow; but how long after the murder of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appeare.

§. I I I.

§. III.

of the death of ABNER slain by IOAB, and of ISBOSETH
by RECHAB and BAANAH.

ABNER, reconciled to DAVID, was anone by IOAB murdered; for IOAB could not endure a companion in DAVIDS fauour, and in the commendement of his forces, by which hee was growne so powerfull, as DAVID forbore to call him to account, for thus much he confesteth of himselfe. I am this day weake, and these men the sonnes of ZERUIAH be too hard for mee. In this sort DAVID complained after ABNERS death; and to make it cleare that hee hated this fact of IOAB, hee followed him with this publike imprecation; Let the blood fall on the head of IOAB, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subject to vicer, to the leprose, to lameness, to the sword, and to pouertie, &c. For could a ny thing haue withstood the ordinance of God, this murder committed by IOAB might greatly haue endangered DAVIDS estate, ABNER being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, nor yet reconciled. This mischance therefore DAVID openly bewailed, so that all ISRAEL perceived him to be innocent of that fact. The place which ABNER held, being General of the men of warre, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were faine to giue them great respect, as hath bene alreadie shewed more at large. This office IOAB held in the armie of IUDA, & thought himselfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For he was neere to DAVID in kinred, and had bene partaker of all his adueritie; wherefore hee did not thinke it meete, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefit, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature so ious of his dignitie and place, that hee afterward slew AMSA, his owne kinsman and the Kings vpon the same quarrell; taking it in high disdain to see him ioyned with himselfe as captaine of the hoste of IUDA; much lesse could hee brooke a superiour, and such a one as had slaine his brother, and bene beaten himselfe in battell. But howsoever IOAB did hate or despise ABNER, DAVID esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in ISRAEL, excusing the ouersight by which hee might seeme to haue perished, by affirming that hee died not like a foole, nor a man vanquished, But as a man falleth by, &c. wike men, so (said hee) diuilest thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a stronger hand destroyeth vnawares, or whom subtiltie in free trust bringeth to confusion. For vnder the Sunne are subiect to worldly miseries and misadventures. Howsoever ISBOSETH meant to haue dealt with ABNER, yet when he heard of his death, hee despaired greatly of his estate, and with him all ISRAEL were posselt with great feare: insomuch as two of ISBOSETHS owne Captaines, RECHAB and BAANAH, murdered ISBOSETH, and presenting his head to DAVID, receiued the same reward that the AMALHITE lately did, for pretending to haue slaine SAUL. ISBOSETH being dead, all the Elders of ISRAEL repaired to DAVID at HELBRON, where he was the third and last time anointed by generall consent.

§. IIII.

Of the flourishing time of DAVIDS Kingdome, the taking of Ierusalem, with two ouerthrowes giuen to the Philistines, and the conduccion of the Arke to the Citie of DAVID.

WHEN DAVID was now established in the Kingdome, his first enterprise was vpon the Philistines, who in derision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their walles with the blinde and lame of their Citie; which DAVID soone after entered: all their other forces notwithstanding. For hauing mastered the fort of ZION

ZION (which was afterward the Citie of DAVID) hee became Lord of Ierusalem, without any great daunger, expelling thence the Iebusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of MOSES and IOSEPH, and after them almost 400. yeeres. There are who expound this place otherwise. Except thou take away the blinde and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some thinke that it was meant by the Idols of the Iebusites: others, that it had reference to the Couenant made long before with ISAAC and JACOB: the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angell, and that therefore till those (that is till that Couenant) be broken DAVID ought not to molest them. But for my selfe I take it with IOSEPHUS, that they armed their wals with certaine impotent people at first, in scorn of DAVIDS attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. yeeres against the Children of ISRAEL, IOSEPH, the Iudges, and SAUL: did not doubt but to defend it also against DAVID.

When he had now posselt himselfe of the very heart and Center of the Kingdome, and receiued congratulatory Embassadours & presents from TIARUS King of TYRE: he entertained diuers other concubines & married inoe wives, by whom he had ten sons in Ierusalem, and by his former wives he had six in HELBRON where he reigned 7. yeeres.

The Philistines hearing that DAVID was now anointed king as wel of IUDA as of ISRAEL, they thought to try him in the beginning, before hee was fully warme in his feat. And being encountered by DAVID at two seuerall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants, they were at both times ouerthrowne. After which hee called the place BATHLEHEM.

Then DAVID assembled 30000. choice ISRAELITES to conduct the Arke of God from the house of AMINADAB in GIBEA, to the Citie of DAVID, which businesse was interrupted by the death of YZZAH the sonne of AMINADAB, whom the Lord slewe for presuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harme, when it was shaken. But after three yeeres it was with great solemnitie brought into the Citie with sacrifices, musike, dances, and all signes of ioyfulness, in which DAVID himselfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon MICHEL derided him for dancing before the Arke, and afterward told him in scorn. That hee was uncovered as a foole in the eyes of the maidens his seruants; namely that hee forgot his regall dignitie both in apparrell and behaviour; and mixed himselfe among the base multitude, dancing as fooles doe in the wayes and directes: not that the disliked DAVIDS behaviour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of her derision. But rather the abundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred vp, beholding the glorie of her husband to whom shee was deliuered lastly by force, and remembering the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceiued that the sonne of ISHAR had built this his greatnesse, together with the many new wives and concubines imbraced since his possession of Ierusalem, made her breake out in those despitfull teares, for which she remained barren to her death.

This done, DAVID consulted with the Prophet AATHAN for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed bloud. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; hauing threatned, not in vaine, that hee would require the bloud of man, at the hand of man and beast. The warre which DAVID had made were iust, and the bloud therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appears how greatly those Princes decieve themselves, who thinke by bloodshed and terror of their warres, to make themselves in greatnes like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercie and goodnesse, or seeke the blessednesse promised by our Saviour vnto the peacemakers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of DAVIDS founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon hee receiued both a confirmation of the Kingdome to him and his heirs, and that happie promise of the euertlasting throne, that should be established in his seede.

§. V.

The overthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

1. Sam. 8. v. 1.

Some after this David overthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerless, and vnable to make any inuasion vpon Israel in halfe. For it is written, accept fructum Amgaris et manu Philistinarum, which place our English Geneua conuerts in these words. And DAVID tooketh the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The latine of Iunius giueth another and a better sense, for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong Citie of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneua hath it in the marginal note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Cesaria, set on the frontier of Palestine at the entrance into Iudea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thence into their retreat in all their inuasions, which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier towne of equal strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood the Hebrewes call Amme, whereof and of the word Gat is made Amgar, of which Plinius in his first booke, and thirteenth Chap. T his exposition is made plaine and confirmed in the first of Cleo. the 18.

Iunius in 8. c. of the second of Sam.

There was no nation bordering the Ierues that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leave one Smith in all their Cities & villages of that kind, but infort them to come downe into their territorie, for all iron worke whatsoever they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of David were seldome free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

1. Sam. 13.

After this he gave them foure other overthrowes: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came betwene. In the first of which he was endangered by Isbith-benohi, the head of whose speare weighed 300. shiekles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abisai succoured David and slew the Philistim, whereupon the Councillors and Captaines of David (least the light of Israel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazard himself in any battaile. The second and third encounter and overthrow of the Philistims was at Gob a place neere Gejur, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, hee invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his aduerlty he sought succour and lett his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no it is not knowne.

1. Sam. 31. v. 17.

The Rabines saie that Atab flew those kin-folkes of David, which liued vnder his protection in Sauls time, but questionlesse David well knew how that Nation had bin alwaies enemies to Israel and tooke all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also remembered that in the 23. of Deuter. God commaunded Israel not to seeke the peace or prosperitie of the Moabites, which David well obserued, for he destroyed two parts of all the people, leaving a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his armie by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadazer the sonne of Rehob King therof. The place is set downe in the description of the holy land: to which I referre the Reader.

§. VI.

The warre which DAVID made vpon the Syrians.

IT is written in the Text: DAVIDS note also HADADZER &c. as hee ment to recouer his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as heauen to recouer his border) be referred to David or Hadadazer it is not agreed vpon. Iunius thinks that the article (he) hath relation to David, who finding Tobu oppressd by Hadadazer, overthrow threw the one and succoured the other. But the ancient and most receiued opinion, that this recouerie hath reference to the Syrians, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates he was in farre better case to haue proceeded after his victorie than before: seeing that (Adadazer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his back, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountaines vpon him at his returne.

Again, seeing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desert, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: Hee had now both horse and chariots good store to cary his prouisions through those vninhabited places, by which he was to haue marched before he could haue reached Euphrates or any part therof. But we find that David returned to Hierusalem, after hee had twice overthrowne the Syrian armie, not bending his course towards the river Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Wherby it may appeare, that it was the Syrian, and not King David, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is said.

The King of Syria Damasceus, and of Damascus, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadazer was overthrowne by the Israelites, fearing his owne estate, & the losse of his owne Contry which adioyned to Syria Zobah of Hadadazer, sent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadazer, and too late for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 20000. This King of Damascus, Iosephus (out of Nicobolus an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name & family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow vp in greatnesse, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Assyrians, as is shewed heretofore. David hauing now reduced Damascus vnder his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom: hauing also sacked the adioyning cities of Betab, and Berati, belonging to Adadazer, of which Cities Ptolemy calleth Betab, Tauaba: & Berathi he nameth Barathena. Tobu or Thoi whose contry of Humathio ioined to Adadazer (as in the description of the Holy land the reader may perceiue) sent his son Ioram to congratulate this successe of David: partly because he had war with Adadazer, and partly because he feared David, now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, silver, and brasse, all which together with the golden sheilds of the Aramites, and the best of all the spoiles of other Nations David dedicated vnto God at his returne. Iunius translated the words (elyceps aureos) by rembrances, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the bosses only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Robam made sheilds of brasse in place of these of Adadazer, at such time as Shicab the Egyptian sackt the Temple of Hierusalem, it may be gathered thereby, that those of Adadazer were golden sheilds.

2. Sam. 8.

This done David sent Embassadors to Hannu King of the Ammonites to congratulate his establishment in his fathers Kingdome: for David in the time of his affliction vnder Saul, had beene relieved by Rehob, the father of Hannu. But this Ammonite being ill aduised, and ouer-iculous of his estate, vled Dauids messengers so barbarously, and contemptuously (by curtailling their beards, and their garments) as hee thereby drew a warre vpon himselfe, which neither his owne strength, nor all the aydes purchased could put off, or sustaine. For notwithstanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thousand souldiers of the Amalakiters, and their confederates: to wit, of the vassalles of Adadazer twentie thousand, and of Machab and Isitob thirteene thousand (for which hee disbursed a thousand talents of silver) yet all these great armies together with the strength of the Ammonites, were by Iobab and his brother Abisai easily broken and put to ruine: and that without any great losse or slaughter at that time. And it is written that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites also retrained into their Cities, the one holding themselves within the wals, the other in their desarts adioyning, till Iobab was returned to Hierusalem.

Hadadzer hearing that Ishb had disinherited his armie, assembled his forces againe, and sent for all the companies that he could leuie out of Mesopotamia, who vnder the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side thereof. David hearing of this new preparation assembled all the ablest men of Israel and marched towards the Syrian armie in Palmyrena, not yet entered into Aradia, to wit, at Helam, a place no lesse distant from Damascus, towards the Northeast, than Hierusalem was towards the Southwest. Now David speaking humanely might with the more confidence go on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest-off journey that euer he made, because he was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the mid-way. He also possit himselfe of * Thidmor or Palmyrena, which Salem afterward strongly fortified, and this Citie was but one daies iourney from Helam, and thence to Damascus. So had he two safe retreats the one to Thidmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter between David & the Syrians, they lost 40000 horsemen, and 7000 chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their armie. The Chronicles call these 40000 souldiers footmen, and so Iustus conuerts it, and so is it very probable. For the armie of Israel consisting of footmen, could hardly haue slaughtered 40000 horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on foote. So are the chariots taken in this battell, numbered at 7000 in the first of Chron, the 9, in which number, as I conceiue, all the souldiers that serued in them with the conductors are included: so as there died of the Syrians in this warre against David, before he forc't them to tribute; 100000 footmen, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and besides all those that Ishb slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabbah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adams in following ages gathered strength againe, and afflicted the Kings of Isa often: but the kings of Israel they impowrished, euen to the last end of that State.

David hauing now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians from the partie and confederacie of Ammon: He sent out Ishb the Lieutenant of his armies to forrage and destroy their territorie, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphus, which after a while the Israelites maltreated and possit. The Kings crowne which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, David set on his owne head, and carried away with him, the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though David stayed at Hierusalem, following the warre of Irish-his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremitie and readie to be entred: yet Ishb in honour of David forbore the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his maisters arriual. To the people he vsed extreme rigor (if we may so call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters) for some of them he care wch harrowes some he sawed afunder, others he cast into burning kilns, in which he baked tile and bricke.

§. VII.

Of DAVID troubles in his reigne, and of his forces.

BV as victorie begetteth securitie, and our present worldly felicitie a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himselfe the giuer of all goodnesse: so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly hee had to please God in the precise obseruation of his Lawes and Commaundements. For hauing now no dangerous apparant enimie (against whom hee was wont to aske counsaile from the Lord) hee beganne to be aduised by his owne humane affections and vaine desires. For hee was not only satisfied to take Irish wife from him, and to vse her by stealth: but hee imbrodered his adultery with Irish slaughter, giuing order to his trustie seruant

Ishb to marshall him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gaue an assault vpon the suburbs of Rabbah, when there was not as yet any possibilitie of preuailling. And that which could no lesse displease God than the rest, hee was content that many others of his best seruants and souldiers should perish together with Irish, hoping thereby to couer his particular ill intent against him. After which he beganly degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse, and his dayes then to come were filled with ioyes and woes interchangeable, his troden-downe sorrowes began againe to spring; and those perils which he had pulled vp by the rootes (as he hoped) gaue him an after-haruest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased God to take the witness of *David*s owne mouth against him, as David himselfe did against the Amalekite, which pretended to haue slaine Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded vnto him his owne error, in the person of another, to wit of him that tooke the poore mans sheepe that had none else, the bearer being Lord of many: He then vowed it to the liuing Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon David, for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he deliuered him Gods iustice together with his merie in the tenour following; Now therefore the sword shall neuer depart from thy house, because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slaine him. 2 Sam. 11. 24. 25. and 12.

Ishb of the children of Ammon. Soone after this David lost the child of adulterie which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his owne sonne Amnon being in loue with his halfe sister Thamar, by the aduise of his Cousin german the sonne of *Shimeah David*s brother, possit her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a careless and deslightfull manner. Two yeeres after which foule and incestuous act, Abshalem caused him to be murdered, at the feast of his sheep-shearings: nor perchance in reuenge of *Thamar*s rauishment alone: but hauing it in his heart to vster the Kingdome; in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Ammon, he thought his affaire greatly aduanced by his destruction. So the one brother hauing rauished his owne sister, and then despised her; the other after a long dissembled malice, first, made his own brother drunken, and then slaughtered him; which done he fled away, and liued vnder the sauegard of Talmi King of Gessur, neere Damascus, who was his grand father by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Abshalem by the inuention of Ishb, (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his sonne) was brought againe: first to the Kings fauour, and then to his presence. He began instantly to practise against David his father, seeking by the pretence of common iustice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equitie, to win vnto himselfe a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatened by the Lord as a punishment of *David*s sinne.

The company which Abshalem gathered at the first were but 200. men: which he carried with him from Hierusalem to Hebron, pretending, though impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired vnto him, and many troopes of people from all places, he proclaimed himselfe King, and was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that David doubting to be set vpon on the suddain, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Citie of Hierusalem, nor in any other walled towne for feare of surprisall: but incamped in the fields, & departed with some 600. of his gards, and few else. The priests he left in Hierusalem with the Arke of God from whom he desired to bee aduertised of those things that chanced, to whom he directed Hushai his trustie friend, and seruant, praying him to make himselfe in all his outward actions and counsels of *Abshalem*s partie and confederacie, thereby the better to discouer vnto him the purposes of Achitophel, a reuolted Counsailler, whose practises hee greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his maister Achitophel the sonne of Ionathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred Dauids prosperitie had smothered, but his aduersitie illighted, holding himselfe vpon the aduantage of a mountaine side, cast stones at Dauid, and most despitefully curst him to his face: but Dauid attending no priuate reuenges, forbadde Abisai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the rolle of his reuenge, to his sonne Salemon. Abisai being now possit of Iherusalem, was aduised by Achitophel to vse his fathers concubines in some such publike place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that hee was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being perliuaded they would then resolutely adhere to Abisai and his cause, without feare of being giuen vp vpon a reconciliation betwene them. This saluage and impious (though craftie counsaile) Achitophel indeed vrged for his owne respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Abisai against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold Dauid: I will raise vp euill against thee out of thine owne house, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and giue them vnto thy neighbour, and hee shall lie with thy wives in the sight of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all Israel, and before the Sunne. Hee also gaue aduise to Abisai, that himselfe with an armie of 12000. men might be employed at the instant for the surprizing of Dauid, which had willingly beene embraced by Abisai, had not Hushai Dauids faithfull seruant giuen counter-aduise, and swayed it: perswading Abisai, that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel, to pursue his father: then by such a troope, which Dauids valour, and those of his attendants, might either indaunger or relit. This delay in Abisai, and aduantage of time gained by Dauid, was indeed, after God, the losse of the one and deliuerie of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the successe which followed, disposed of his owne estate, and then forsooke both the partie and the care of Abisai, and of his owne life.

Dauid being aduertised of this enterprize against him marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himselfe of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Ishobab himselfe in the warre against Dauid after Sauls death seated himselfe. To which place there repayed vnto him Shobi, the sonne of Nahsh the Ammonite, whom Dauid loued, the same which Iosephus calleth Shiphur. And though it bee greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hannu, whom Dauid for his fathers sake established in the Kingdome, after *Hannu*s ouerthrow. In thankfulness whereof hee relieved Dauid in this his extremite. There came also to Dauids allitance Atchur of Iadubar, Gardian in former times to Mephiosbeth, and among others Barzilai the Gileadite, who willingly fed Dauid and all his companie.

In the meane time both the King and Abisai prepared to fight, Abisai made Amasa Commander of the armie of Israel, the same place which Isab held with Dauid; an office next the King himselfe, like vnto that of the Maiors of the Palace anciently in France. Dauid, perswaded by his companie, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces hee had to Isab, Abisai, and Itai, giuing them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Abisai. But Isab, besides that hee was very cruel by nature, remembered that Abisai had lately disposed of his Gouernment to Amasa, and therefore the victorie being obtained, and newes brought him that Abisai hung by the haire of his head on a tree, when hee could not perswade the messenger to returne and kill him, hee himselfe with his owne seruants dispatcht him. It appeared also by the sequell that Isab affected Adonijah whom hee afterward acknowledged, Dauid yet liuing; and fearing the disposition of Abisai, hee embraced the present aduantage offered.

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to Dauid, hee mourned and sorrowed, not onely as a man that had lost a sonne, but as one that had outliued all his worldly ioyes, and seene euery delight of life interred. For hee so hid himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward ward after so great a victorie, couered themselves also in the Citie, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deferred death than recompence. Whereupon Isab presenting himselfe before Dauid, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himselfe to the armie. For first hee told him that hee had discountenanced his faithfull seruants, who had that day preferred his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not onely to not acknowledge so great a loue and constancie in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolutely expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrary grieue and lament at their good successe. For, no doubt, they might all haue bought their peace of Abisai at an easie rate. Secondly, hee vrged that it was generally beleued, that hee loued his enemies and hated his friends, and that hee witnessed by this his mourning, that hee had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull seruants, but would more haue ioyed if they had all perished, and Abisai liued, than in the victorie by their faithfulness and approved valour gotten.

Lastly hee vsed this preualent argument, that if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publicly to his men of warre, that they would all that very night abandon him, and returne: concluding with this fearefull threatening: And that will be worse vnto thee than all the euill that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance vttered with a good intent) Isab raised Dauid, from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the Citie among the people, whom hee assured of his loue and affection, especially Amasa who commanded the armie of Abisai, to whom hee promised the office of Lieutenant-shippe; the same which Abisai had giuen him, and which Isab now enioyed. For Dauid doubted that if Amasa were not satisfied, hee might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now vnder his commandment.

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage hee pardoned Shimei, who had lately reuiled him to his face; but this remission was but externall, as appeared afterward. Hee also accepted of Mephiosbeth his excuse, whom Ziba had formerly falsly accused and betrayed.

Hee also intreated Barzilai the Gileadite, his late liberrall hoste, to follow him to Ierusalem, that hee might reward his seruice done him; who excusing himselfe by his age, appointed his sonne Chimham to attend the King.

At Gilgal on this side Jordan, all the tribes assembled, and after some contentment which of them ought to haue most interst in Dauid, the armie brake and Dauid returned to Ierusalem. But Sheba, the sonne of Bichri a Beniamite of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontentment among the Israelites, withdrew them from Dauid, as from a stranger in whom they had no interst; and it seemeth that many of the people of the out-tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. Dauid employed his reconciled Captaine Amasa, to giue him contentment, and to witness his trust, as also because hee conceived that Amasa had interst in those reuolts of Israel more than Isab had. Hee received commandment from Dauid to assemble the armie within three dayes, which hee forelloved: but being onward on his way, Abisai Isabs brother was sent after him, with Dauids guard and best souldiers, whom also Isab accompanied: and overtaking Amasa neere Gibeon, pretending to embrace him, gaue him a wound, whereof hee fell dead, being no lesse ialous of Amasa than hee was of Abner, whom hee murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done hee pursued Sheba, and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the Citie with that furie, that the Citizens by the perswasions of a wife woman there inhabiting, cut off Shebas head, and flung it to Isab ouer the walls: which done, hee retrained his armie to Ierusalem, and commanded as before all the host of Israel.

The next act of Dauids, was the deliuerie of Sauls sonnes or kinsmen to the Gibeonites, whom those Citizens hung vp in reuenge of their fathers crueltie. Dauid had knowledge knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeeres, came by reason of Saul and his house; to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore hee willingly yielded to give them this satisfaction, both because hee had warrant from God himselfe, as also if we may iudge humancly, to rid himselfe of Sauls line, by whom hee and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and endaugered; only he spared Mephibosheth the sonne of Ionathan, both for the loue hee bare to his father, as for his oath and vow to God.

Now where it is written in the Text; The King tooke the two sonnes of RISHAI whom shee bare vnto SAUL, and the five sonnes of MICHEL the daughter of SAUL, whom shee bare to ADRIEL, and deliuered them to the Gibeonites.

Iunius calls this Michol the sister of her that was Dauids wife, shee whom Saul married to Phaltiel; but Michol here named had Adriel to her husband: the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to Dauid, when he slew Goliath in the valley of Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loued Dauid, which perchance Merab did not, whether Dauid had any humane respect in the deliuerie of her children, it is onely knowne to God.

Now whereas the Genea nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel, the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here vsed, hauing an eclipsis or defect, and signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kinred, as in the 19. verse of the same 21. Chapter it is said of Goliath, whose speare was weightie as a weavers beame, when as by the same Eclipse it must be vnderstood by the brother of Goliath: Goliath himselfe being formerlyaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of Dauid, leauing no head vnto rebellion; so hee here strengthened both the King and Nation against foraine enemies, by the valour of many braue Commanders, the like of whom, for number and qualitie, that people of Israel is not knowne to haue had at any time before or after. Thirtie Captaines of thousands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre.ouer these were fixe Coronels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might well be held as miraculous. These Coronels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to haue bene giuen vpon meere consideration of their vertue. For Abisai the brother of Ioshab, who in the warre against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant and commaunded halfe the armie, could not attaine to the honour of the first ranke, but was laine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the second order, notwithstanding his neerenesse in blood vnto the King, the flourishing estate of his owne house, and his well approued seruices. All these Coronels and Captaines, with the Companies belonging to them, may seeme to haue bene such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readinesse for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawne out, if need required into the field, very farre exceeded thirtie thousand, yea or thirtie times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, & bin hardened with his aduersities. Others there were very many, and principall men in their severall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of Saul; but these Captaines and Coronels, (who with Ioshab, that was Generall of all the Kings forces, make vp the number of 37.) were the especiall men of warre, and reckoned as Dauids worthies. The long reigne of Dauid, as it is knowne to haue consumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be gessed to haue wasted the most of those whose deaths we finde nowhere mentioned. For the sonnes of Zeruia, who had bene too hard for Dauid, were worne away, and onely Ioshab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abisai to stand by his side in his last extremitie.

By the actions forepassed in the time of Dauid, it is gathered that hee had reigned now 33. yeeres, or thereabout, when the posteritie of Saul was rooted out, so that hee hee enjoyed about seauen yeeres of entire quiet and securitie, wherein it pleased God to remoue all impediments that might haue troubled the succession of Salomon in his fathers throne. In this time also Dauid hauing established all things in Iuda and Issriel, and the borders thereof, hee againe displeased God by numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which hee employed Iozab with other Captaines of his armie, who after nine monthes and twentie daies trauell, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to beare armes, and they amounted to the number of thirtie hundred thousand, besides Leui and Beniamin; whereof in Iuda and the Cities thereof fixe hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfe to which he pleased; to wit, seauen yeeres famine, three monthes warre, wherein hee should be vnprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three dayes: Dauid made choyce to bowe himselfe vnder the hand of God onely, and left himselfe subiect to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished seauente thousand. And hereby hee both taught all that liue, that is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof hee giueth vs this reason. For his mercies are great.

¶ VIII.

of the last acts of DAVID: ADONIAHS faction: the reuenge vpon IOAB and SHIMEI.

As<sup>1</sup>thly, when hee grew weake and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, hee was yet aduised to lie in the armes of a yong and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake estate of bodie, when he was in a manner bedrid, Adonijah his eldest sonne (Amnon and Abishom being now dead) hauing drawne vnto his partie, that inuincible, renowned and feared Iozab, with Abiathar the Priest, beganne manerly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now liuing of Dauids sonnes, and a man of a goodly personage, Salomon yet young, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adulterie, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beck, Iung, Thomas, and others suppose) he presumed to carrie the matter without resistance. Hereof when Dauid had knowledge by Bersabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in minde of his faithfull promise, that Salomon her sonne should reigne after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing vnto the King, & seconding her report of Adonijah his presumption) the King calling vnto him Zadec the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benaiab the Captaine of his guard, gaue charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the mule whereon himselfe vsed to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon attended and strongly guarded by the ordinary and choyce men of warre, the Cherethites and Peletites, shewed himselfe to the people. Those tydings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safetie of his life he held by the hornes of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, Dauid had remaining two especiall cares, whereof hee was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all meanes to aduance, and make the businesse publique. To bring these intentions to good effect hee summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the severall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mightie, and men of power, who repaired vnto Ierusalem.

In this assembly the King stood vp, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he tooke occasion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Juda (as Jacob in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choice of him among all his fathers sonnes. In like manner he said that God himselfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his successor; whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his sonne, to conforme themselves vnto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced hee the paterne of the worke according to the forme which God himselfe had appointed; and so laying open his owne preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

The Kings proposition was so well approved by the Princes and people, that whereas he himselfe had given three thousand talents of golde, and seauen thousand of siluer, they added vnto it seauen thousand of gold, and ten thousand of siluer, besides brasse, iron and iewels, heartily reioicing in the aduancement of so religious a worke. This businesse being well dispatched, a solemne feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was againe anointed King, and receiued feaite of all the Princes and people of the land, and of all the Princes his brethren the sonnes of King Dauid. Salomon being thus established King, his father Dauid finding himselfe euery in the hands of death, first exhorted his sonne to exercise the same courage and strength of minde, which himselfe had done in all his attempts, and to the end that a happie end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he vttered these mightie words; Take heede to the charge of the Lord thy God, to wake in his waies, and keepe his statutes and his commandments, and his iudgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses &c. to the performance of which God hath endued the succession, and prosperitie of his issues. For this done (saith God himselfe) Thou shalt not want one of thy posteritie to sit vpon the throne of Israel.

Secondly, hee aduised him concerning Ioshab, who out of doubt had serued Dauid from the first assault of Ierusalem to the last of his warres, with incomparable valour and fidelitie, sauing that hee fastened himselfe to Achish (his master yet liuing) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath neuer left crueltie vnuenged, so was it his will that Ioshab should drinke of the same cuppe, wherof he had enforced other men to taste, and suffer the same violence which himselfe had vniuently broken others with all, qui gladius percussit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaued Ahner and Amasa of their liues, hauing against the one the pretence onely of his brothers slaughter, whom Ahner had slaine in the time of waite, and could not auoid him: against the other but a meere ialousie of his growing great in the fauour of Dauid. And though Ioshab assured himselfe that his growing great in the fauour of Dauid, there was none left either to quall him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raised vp Benhuah the sonne of Iehoiadab, to pull him from the Sanctuarie, and to cut him in pieces. For Dauid giueth this cause to Salomon against Ioshab, that he slew the Captaines of the hoste of Israel, and shed blood of battell in peace; and to this apparant and iust cause, it is not improbable but that Dauid remembered the ill affection of Ioshab towards Salomon, which Ioshab made manifest by the vntimely setting vp of Achish, Dauid yet liuing. Some other offence Ioshab had committed against Dauid of which in these words he put his son Salomon in minde; Thou knowest also what Ioshab the sonne of Serviah did to mee, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Abshalom, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words vsed to him when hee mourned in Atchanaim for Abshalom; or whether it were the publishing of Dauids letter vnto him for the killing of Uriah; or thereby to disgrace Salomon as defended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is that those great men of warre doe oftentimes behaue themselves exceeding ding in'olently towards their Princes, both in respect of their seruice done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their masters cannot misse them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kinde of pride hath ouerthrowne many a wortheie man otherwise deseruing great honour and respect.

Hee also gaue order to Salomon, to ridde himselfe of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at Dauid and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise Dauid spared Shimei all the time himselfe liued, yet being dult and in the graue he slew him, by the hand of Salomon his sonne. Hence it seemeth that King Henry the seauenth of England had his paterne, when hee gaue order to Henry the eighth to execute Paol as soone as himselfe was buried, hauing made promise to the King of Spain when hee deliuered Paol vnto him, that while hee liued hee would neuer put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid vpon him.

And yet did not the execution of Ioshab yeeld vnto Salomon any such great profit or assurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Asaph of Samaria, and Rezin of Damascus to vex him: who, as the Scriptures witness, were emboldened to enterprize vpon Salomon, hearing that Dauid slept with his fathers, and that Ioshab the Captaine of the host was dead. Now when Dauid had reigned in all fortie yeeres, to wit, in Hebron seauen yeeres, and in Ierusalem three and thirtie, he died.

For his person he was of smal stature, but exceeding strong. For his internal gifts and graces he so farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailetie apart, he was said by God himselfe to be a man according to his owne heart. The Psalms which he wrote witness his pietie, and his excellent learning; of whom Hieronymus to Paulinus. DAVID SIMONIDES nosse, PINDARVS & ALCAEVS, FLACCVS, GREGORIVS, & SERENVS, Christi am typer sonas, & in dech. choro p. Alterio ab inferis suscitatus regentem. DAVID (saith he) IOU SIMONIDES, PINDARVS, ALCAEVS, HORACE, CATVLLVS, & SERENVS, he playeth Christ on his harpe, and on a ten stringed p. Alterio he raiseth him vprying from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, hee foretelleth Christ more lightomely and liuely than all theret.

The booke of the Psalms saith Gyeras were diuided, ordered and distinguished by Ezekias: but whether all the Psalms were written by Dauid it is diuersly disputed. For Athanasius, Cyprian, Tyrannus, & others conceiue diuers authoras, answering the titles of the seueral Psalms, as Moses, Salomon, and the rest hee after named, and that onely 73. Psalms were composed by Dauid himselfe, namely those which are intituled ipsius Dauid. For the 50. and 72. with the ten that followe are bestowed on Asaph the sonne of Israhiah, eleven other on the sonnes of Korah, and eleven are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 89. and the 100. following, and so they are intituled in the old Hebrew copies, though the vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) stile them otherwise. The supposed nine authoras of these Psalms which Dauid wrote not. Sixt: Scen (is nameth as followeth; Salomon, Moses, whom Aben Ezra contra-rieto Herome, maketh one of Dauid s fingers) Asaph, Ethan, Ezra, Isaiah, Eman, Ezra, Isaiah, Isaiah, Isaiah, and the three sonnes of Chore. But S. Augustine, reasoning in this manner. Al though (saith he) some there are that ascribe those Psalms onely vnto Dauid, which are ouerwritten ipsius Dauid, and the rest intituled ipsi Dauid to others, this opinion (saith hee) Vox Evangelica saluatoris ipsius refutatur, ubi ait quod ipse DAVID in spiritu Christi discretus esse suum Dominum quoniam Psalmus 109. sic incipit. Dixit Dominus Domino meo, sede a dextris meis &c. The voice of the Gospel refutes this opinion, where it saith, that Dauid himselfe in the spirit called Christ his Lord, because the 109. Psalm begins thus. The Lord said vnto my Lord sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his testimonies are vsed both by Christ and the Apostles, and he was as a paterne to all the Kings and Princes that succeeded him.

His Storie and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Semuel, Nathan and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. ver. 19. For the seueral parts of the booke bookes of Samuel which intreat chiefly of Dauid, were as it seemes written by these three holy men.

Constantine Mansueti hath an opinion, that the Troians during the time of the siege, sought for succour from Dauid, and that he stayed neuter in that warre. But it seemeth that Mansueti did miscall the time twixt Dauid and the Troian warre. For it is generally receiued that Troy fell betwene the times of Alden and Samson Iudges of Israel, about the worlds yeere 2848 and Dauid died in the yeere 2991.

Its treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chronicles, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of gold, & a thousand thousand talents of silver, and of brasse and yron passing all weight, which is more than any King of the world possit beids himselfe, and his son to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirtie and three cartload & a third of a cartload of silver, allowing two thousand weight of silver or six thousand pound sterling to euery cartload, besides three score and seuentene millions of 20 French Crownes, or of our money twentie three millions and a thousand pound: a matter but for the testimonie of the Scriptures exceeding all beliefe. For that any riches were left him it doth not appeare, seeing that the Iudges had not any treasure, nor any soueraigne power to make leuies: but when they went to the warres, they were followed by such voluntaries as the feuerall tribes by turnes gaue them: seeing also that Sal who was a meane parentage, and perpetually vexed and inuaded by the Philistins, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part possit by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amisse to consider how Dauid within the space of not very 30 many yeeres, might amasse vp such mightie treasures. For though parsimonie be it selfe a great reuenuer, yet needes there must haue beene other great meanes. It seemes that hee made the vttermost profit of all that hee had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his ninth booke and last Chapter de preparatione Evangelica, citeth the words of Eusepiemus, who reporteth that Dauid among other preparations for the Temple, built a Naue in Atlanis (or as Pallapandus corrects it Achani) a Citie of Arabia, and from thence sent men to digge for gold in the Island Trope, which Orelus thinks, was Ophir, though Eusepiemus in his place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Island is in the red sea; from whence saith this Eusepiemus they brought golde into Iury. Pineda lib. 4. de rebus Salomonis c. 1. thinks that 40 Dauid did this way also enrich himselfe, and citeth this testimonie of Eusepiemus: and yet certainly Dauid had many other waies to gather great riches. Much land doubtlesse hee gained by conquest, from the Cananites and Philistins, besides those fruitful vallies neere Ierusalem in Trachonitis and Basam, and the best of Syria, and other countries bordering the Isr. etc. These demaines belike he kept in his owne hands, and with his infinite number of captiues, which hee tooke in his warres, which were not able to redeme themselves, hee banded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written 1. Chron. 17. that Iehonathan was ouer his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the Cities, in the townes; that Ezer was ouer the labourers, that tilled his ground; Somer ouer the vineyards; and Sabdi ouer the store of the wine; Bath 50 Hanan ouer the olive trees, and Iosab ouer the store of the oyle. also that hee had herdmen that had charge ouer his cattell, both in the high lands, and in the plaines, ouer his sheepe, camels, and asses. And this custome of enriching themselves by husbandry and Cattell the ancient Kings euery where held, both before and after Dauid time. For wee reade of Pharas that hee spake to Ioseph to appoint some of his brethren or of their seruants, to be Rulers ouer his cattell. We reade of Pharis, that hee loued husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dressers of Vines: likewise we reade it in all Greeke Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did especially consist in their Herds and flocks, whereof it were needlesse to cite Arges and Admetus or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning Dauid it is not vnlkely, but that those captiues which were not imploied in husbandrie, were many of them vsed by him in all sorts of gainfull professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner vsed their slaues.

10 To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions which doubtlesse were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tebu and others) wee may adde the great spoiles which hee found in the Cities and Countries which hee conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem capitacionis; By the law of capitacion or head money, euery man rich or poore paying halfe a sicle of the Sanctuarie, which is about as much as fouenteene pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one thousand thousand five hundred and seuentie thousand fighting men were numbred by Iosh. Now although this Law of capitacion be thought by some very learned not to haue beene perpetuall (which opinion of theirs neuertheless 20 they themselues is against the Hebrew expolitions) yet Dauid vpon this occasion is not vnlike to haue put it in practise. And by these meanes might he be able to leaue those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seeme that of this great masse of gold and silver left by Dauid, the least part was his owne in priuate, and so will it appeare the lesse wonderfull that he left so much. Of his owne liberalitie wee finde, that he gaue to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand talents of silver, a great summe: but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the Sanctuarie it selfe were exceeding great, as needes they must haue been, hauing receiued continuall encrease, without any losse or diminution euer since the time of Moses and Iosuah. 30 Thereuenues of the Sanctuarie (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defraied the daily expences, and maintayned the Priest and Leuites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoiles gotten in warre. For all the bootie was diuided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the People which remayned at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the Countrey receiued benefit of the victorie, yet so, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiuing more for euery single share.

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people receiued, and one in five hundred, of that which was giuen 40 to the Souldiers; namely one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootie. So in the spoile of Midian, thirtie two thousand women being taken, the armie had sixteen thousand of them for slaues, and the Congregation had other sixteen thousand; but out of the sixteen thousand giuen to the Armie, were exempted two and thirtie for the Lords tribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twentie. By this meanes, the lesser that the Armie was which had exposed it selfe to danger, the greater profit had euery Souldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaying at home were faine to vndergoe more than ordinarie traualle in domestick affaires, did receiue by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was alwaies certaine, yea many times it was increased, either by 50 some especiall commandement, as when all the gold, and silver, and other metall's found in Iericho, were consecrated vnto God; or by thankfulnessse of the Rulers and People, as when after the victorie obtayned against the Midianites without the losse of one man, all Jewells, Bracelets, Eare-rings, and the like, were offered vp, as voluntarie presents.

Now

Now howsoever the Israelites were many times oppressed, and troden downe by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies neuer got possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuarie must haue bene exceeding great; as containing about one hundredth part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtained against the bordering Nations. For that this treasure was not defrauded of the due portion, it is euident; seeing that before the time of David and his Lieutenant Ioshab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had vied to dedicate of the spoiles obtained in warre, to maintayne the house of the Lord; the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Iudges and Captaines in other Ages. Certaine it is, that the Conquest of David brought into the Land farre greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Iosua perhaps excepted: but these vast summes of an hundred thousand Talents of siluer, may seeme rather to haue bene made vp, by the addition of his winnings and liberalitie, to the treasures laid vp in many former Ages, than to haue bene the mere fruits of his owne industrie.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he receiued of yearly reuenues with his tributes sixe hundred fixtie sixe Talents of gold, besides the Customes of Spices. He had also fixie rich Returnes from the East Indies, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voiage euery three yeares, and he beganne that trade in the two and twentieth yeare of his raigne, and ruled fortie yeares. Besides this, all India and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobab, of Damascus, of Palmyra, of Ituraa; all of Idumaea, Mosab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizzites, Heuites, Iebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished, though subjected.

Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdome of Israel reduced by David, who after fortie yeares raigne, and seuentie yeares of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the Citie of David. It is written by Iosephus that there was hid in David's Tombe a meruailous quantitie of treasures, in so much as Hircanus (who first of the Chasmanai, or race of the Maccabees, called himselfe King) one thousand and three hundred yeares after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himselfe of Antiochus then besieging Jerusalem, and afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding masse of gold and siluer therein. And it was an ancient custome to burie treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they enriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did burie so much treasure in his fathers graue, it would hardly be beleued, in regard of the great exactions with which he was faine to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which he got otherwise, or which were left vnto him: were it not withall considered that his want of monie grew from such magnificent imployments. Particularly of the Sepulcher of David the Scriptures haue no mention, but only the Sepulchers of the Kings of Juda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the Monuments of those Kings, as (by Relation of the Duke of Pluke) they remayned within these thirtie yeares, and are like to remaine still, are able to make any report credible, of the cost bestowed vpon them.

Of the Philistims, whom DAVID absolutely mastered: and of sundry other contemporaries with DAVID.

If the Philistims, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of David's time somewhat here may be spoken. They descended of Caslim, who according to Ifydor and Iosephus, 15d. 19. 19. was one of the sonnes of Misram, and was surname Philistim, as Esa 16. 1. 1. am. 17. was surname Edom, and Jacob Israel. There were of them five Cities of pettie principalities, namely, Azotus or Asdod, Gaza or Azaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron. It seemeth that Caslim was the first founder of this nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Aegyptians.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures haue named, was that Abimelech which loued Sara, Abrahams wife. Gen. 20.

The second Abimelech liued at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar in the border of Idumaea, which Abimelech fancied Isaac his wife: as his father had done Sara. Gen. 26.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembered in the Scriptures, till David's time: perhaps the government was turned into Aristocratick. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, howsoever Achis be named King of Gath, the same to whom David fled, and who againe gaue him Siklag to inhabit in Saul's time. 1. Sam. 27. 1. Sam. 31. 11. 1. Sam. 31. 11.

After him wee read of another Achis who liued with Salomon, to whom Semei trauided to fetch backe his fugitiue seruant, what time the seeking of this seruant was the losse of his life. Ieremie the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palestin or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the warres of the Philistims are remembered in the Catalogue of the Iudges, of Saul and David, and therefore I shall not neede to collect the particulars in this place.

There liued at once with David, the third of the Siluij King of Alba called Latinus Siluius, who is said to haue ruled that part of Italy fiftie yeeres. And about his fourteenth yeere Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Melesionida, without regall name gouerned Athens during their life.

The reasons which moued the Athenians to change their gouernment, was not drawne from any inconuenience found in the rule of Soueraigntie, but in honour of Codrus onely. For when the Gracians of Doris, a region betwene Phocis and the mountaine Oeta, sought counsaile from the Oracle, for their successe in the warres against the Athenians, it was answered that then vndoubtedly they should preuaile and become Lords of that State, when they could obtaine any victorie against the Nation, and yet preserve the Athenian King liuing. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, withdrewe himselfe from his owne forces, and putting on the habit of a common souldier, entred the Campe of the Dorians, and killing the first hee encountered, was himselfe forthwith cut in peeces.

Eupales the 1. King of Affria, which others account but the 30. began to rule 50 that Empire about the 13. yeere of David, and held it 38. yeeres.

Neere the same time began Ixion the second King of the Heracleide, the sonne of Eurythene in Corinth, and Agis the second of the Heracleide in Lacedemon: in honour of which Agis, his succellours were called Agides, for many yeeres after. He restored the *Laconian*s to their former libertie: hee ouercame the Citizens of Helos.

Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: hee condemned them and their to perpetuall slavery; whereof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helotes.

In like sort from the Sclavi came the word Slave. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized vpon the countrie of Illyria and made it their owne by Conquest, their victorie pleased them so highly, that therupon they called themselves by a new name, Slaves, which is in their language glorious. But in after-times (that warmer Climate hauing thawed their northerne hardines, and not ripened their wits) when they were troden down, and made seruants to their neighbours the Italians which kept many of them in bondage began to call all their bond-men Slaves, vying the word as a name of reproche: in which sense it is now current through many countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, about the 23. yeere of Dauid, and saie that Achsestratus was the fourth King of this race, the same whome Eusebius calls Lalates, and sets him in the thirteenth yeere of Salomon.

In the tenth yeere of Achsestratus, Androclus the third sonne of Codrus assisted by the Iones, built Ephesus in Caria, who after the adioyning of the Ile of Samos to his territorie was laine by the Carians whose countrie he vlerped. He was buried (saith Pausanias) in one of the gates of Ephesus called Magnetics, his armed Statue being set ouer him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had subdued the Ionians (the next province to Ephesus on the sea coast of Asia the lesse) he enlarged his Dominions vpon the Aeoles, which ioyneth to Ionians; and that his posteritie gouerned the Cities of Ephesus and Erythrae by the name of the Epistida in Strabo his owne time. Of the expedition of the Iones how they came hither out of Peloponessus, I haue * spoken already vpon occasion of the returne of the Heraclides into Peloponessus, wherein with the Dores, they expelled the Achaes, and inhabited their places in that land: though this of the Iones succeeded that of the Heraclides 100. yeeres.

The Citie of Ephesus became exceeding famous: first, for the temple of Diana therein built: which had in length 425. foote, and 220. in bredth, sustained with 127. pillars of marble, of 75. foote high: whereof 27. were most curiously grauen, and all the rest of choise marble polisht, the worke being first set out by Cleophon of Groffon. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that receiued the Christian faith, of which Timothee was Bishop; to whom, and to the Ephesians, Saint Paul wrote his Epistles so intitled. The other Citie posselt by Androclus in Aeolis was also vniuersally spoken of by reason of Sibylla, surnamed Erythraea: who liued seuen hundred and fourtie yeeres before Christ borne. Saint Augustine auoweth that a Romane Proconsul shewed him in an ancient Greeke copie certaine verses of this Prophetesse: which began (as Saint Augustine changed them into Latine) in these wordes, Iesus Christus Dei filius saluator. Iesus Christi sonne of God the saviour.

About the time that Isab besieged Rabba in Moaab, Vaphres beganne to gouerne in Aegypt, the same that was father in Law to Salomon, whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembered by Eusebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of Dauid, was the citie of Magnesia in Asia the lesse founded, the same which is seated vpon the riuer Meander, where Scipio gaue the great overthrow to Antiochus. In this territorie are the best herbes of the lesser Asia bred, whereof Lacina:

About the same time Cuma in Campania was built by the inhabitants of Chalcid in Euboea according to Seruius; with whom Strabo ioyneth the Cumians of Aeolis, saying that to the one of these people the gouernment was giuen, with condition that the other should giue name to the Citie. Of this Cuma was Ephorus the famous schooler of Isocrates.

Euse-

Eusebius and Cassiodor finde the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. yeere of Dauid, but much mistaken. For the father of Dido was Mecimus the sonne of Badezor brother to Iezabel, who married Achab King of Israel; and betwene the death of Dauid, and the first of Achab, there were waisted about 95. yeeres.

In this time also Acastus liued, the second of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, of which there were thirteene in descent before the State changed into a Magistrate of tenne yeeres. Some writers make it probable that the Aeolians ledde by Grani, the grandnephew of Orestes, posselt the Citie and Island of Leibos about this time. In the 32. yeere of Dauid, Hiram beganne to reigne in Tyre, according to Iosephus, who saith that in his twelfth yeere Salomon beganne the worke of the Temple. But it is a familiar error in Iosephus, to misreckon times, which in this point hee doth so strangely, as if hee knew not how at all to cast any account. For it is manifest that Hiram sent messengers, and Cedars to Dauid, soone after his taking of Ierusalem, which was in the very beginning of *Dauid*s reigne ouer Israel, when as yett hee had reigned onely leauen yeeres in Hebron, ouer the house of Iuda. Wherefore it must needs be that Hiram had reigned about 30. yeeres before Salomon; vntill some credit should be giuen to those Tyrian records which are cited by Iosephus, than to the plain words of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the same Hiram who liued both with Dauid and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifest.

CHAP. XVIII. Of SALOMON.

§ I.

Of the establishing of SALOMON: of his bright, and of the cause of ADONIAHs death, and of SALOMONS wisdomes.

SALOMON, who was brought vp vnder the Prophet Nathan, beganne to reigne ouer Iuda and Israel, in the yeere of the world 2991. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God: hee was also called Iedidias, or Theophilus, by Nathan because the Lord loued him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after *Salomon*s anunting, dispatched Embassadors toward him, congratulating his establishment: a custome between Princes very ancient. Whence we read that Dauid did in like sort salute Hiram King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdome.

The beginning of Salomon was in blood, though his reigne were peaceable. For soone after *Dauid*s death, hee caused his brother Adonijah to bee Raine by Benaiah the sonne of Iehoiada, taking occasion from *Adonijah*s desiring by Bersheba, that the young maid Abisag, which lay in *Dauid*s bosome in his latter daies, to keepe him warme, might be giuen him. Whatsoeuer hee pretended it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and sought the kingdome contrary to the will of Dauid, whom God inclined towards Salomon. And yett it is saide that a word is enough to the wife, and he that sees but the claw, may know whether it bee a lyon or no: so it may seeme that to the quick-sighted wisdom of Salomon, this motion of Adonijah, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had been concubines to a King, might not after bee touched but by a King: whence Achish wished Abialon to take his fathers concubines as a part of the royaltie. And David after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but shut them vp, and they remained widowed vntil their death. And this it seems was the depth of Abialon's quarrel against Alner, for hauing his fathers concubine. And some signification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God by Nathan to David, I haue giuen thee thy masters house, and thy masters wines. And in the word of Saul, vpbraid Jonathan that hee had chosen David to the shame of the nakednesse of his mother. Hereunto perhaps was some reference in this purpose of Adonijah, to marrie with her that was alwaies present with David in his latter daies, and who be like knew all that was past, for the conueying of the Kingdome to Salomon. There might be diuers farther occasions, as either that hee would learne such things by her as might be for the aduantage of his ambition, or that hee would perswade her to forge some strange tale about Dauid's last Testament, or any thing else that might prouide the title of Salomon.

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, and with the customes of the Iewes: yet the Kings of the Iewes were so absolute, as they did therein, and in all else what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of kings) which taught them to vse this paternall authoritie in transferring the birthright to a younger sonne: namely of Isaac's disheriting Reuben, and giuing the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Ioseph: of whom hee made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in Dauid, it appears by the words of Bersabe and Nathan to Dauid, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For as for popular election, that it was necessarie to confirme, or that the refusal of the people had authoritie to frustrate the elder brothers right to the Kingdome, it nowhere appeares in the stories of the Iewes. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Gibeah: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that hee was King long before no man can doubt. In like manner elsewhere the phrase of chusing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon at the same time that he put Adonijah to death, he hidde himselfe also of Isab, and three yeeres after of Shimei, as Dauid had aduised him: he displaced also the Priest Abialbar, who tooke part with Adonijah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed Dauid in all his afflictions, and because hee had borne the Ark of God before his father, he spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdome, hee tooke the daughter of Pharao King of Egypt to wife: for so Eusebius out of Eusebius calls him. Hee offered a thousand sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing vnto him in a dreame, bad him aske what he would at his hands: SALOMON chooseth wisdom, which pleased God. And God said vnto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy selfe long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy selfe, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I haue done according to thy words: by which wee may informe our selues what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the conueying after long life, in respect of our selues, cannot but proceede of selfe-love, which is the roote of all iniquitie: the desire of priuieriches is an affection of couerousnesse which God abhorreth; to affect reuenge, is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand and to distrust his Iustice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his brothers slaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from Dauid, or from from the Law of God. But because Salomon desired wisdom onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to giue him withall that which he desired not. And I haue also giuen thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of wisdom our Commentators stretch to almost all kindes of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plantes and liuing creatures the Scripture testifieth, though no doubt the chiefe excellencie of Salomon's wisdom, was in the knowledge of gouerning his kingdome: whence, as it were for an example of his wisdom, the Scripture telleth how some he iudged the controuersie betwene the two harlots.

Of SALOMON'S buildings and glorie.

He then entered into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom hee had much of his materials, from the Kings palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had received a double charge, one from his father Dauid, and another for God. For like as it is written of Dauid that He called SALOMON his sonne, and charged him to build a house for the Lord God of Israel: so doth Tostatus giue the force of a diuine precept to these words. Behold, a sonne is borne vnto thee, &c. Hee shall build an house for my name.

1. Chr. 2. 2.

Hee beganne the worke of the Temple, in the beginning of the 4. yeere of his reigne, at which time also hee prepared his fleet at Eziongeber to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to lupp the charge of so great a worke. For that the Temple was in building, while his fleetes were passing to and fro it is mainteined. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Amaggin trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the forme and example was giuen by God himselfe) many learned men haue written, as Sabacron, Alonius, Ribera, Buradus, Azorius, Villalpandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I referre the reader.

1. Chr. 2. 6.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which serued that building, Salomon employed thirtie thousand Carpenters, tenne thousand euery moneth by course: hee also vied eightie thousand Masons in the mountaine, and seauentie thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceived, he selected out of the Prescrites, besides three thousand three hundred masters of his worke, so as hee paid and employed in all one hundred eighty three thousand and three hundred men, in which number the Zelomans which were more skilful in hewing timber than the Israelites, may (as I thinke) be included. For Hiram caused his seruants to bring downe the Cedars and Firres from Libanon to the sea, and thence sent them in railes to Ioppe or the next port to Hiernsalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plaine that all but the thirtie thousand Carpenters, and the ouerscers, were strangers, and as it seemeth the vassals of Hiram, and of Pharao King of Egypt. In recompence of all this timber and stone, Salomon gaue Hiram twentie thousand measures of wheate, and twentie measures of pure oyle yeerely. Eusebius out of Eusebius in the ninth booke of his preparation the last Chapter, hath left vs a Copie of Salomon's Letter to Suron (which was the same as Hiram or Hiram King of Tyre in these words.

King

KING SALOMON to King SVRON, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phenicia King, and my fathers friend, sendeth greeting; You may understand that I have received of the great God of my father DAVID, the Kingdom: and when my father commanded mee to build a Temple to God which created heaven and earth, he commanded also that I should write to you. I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would be pleased to send me artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King SVRON made this answer.

SVRON, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phenicia rex, SALOMONI regi salutem. Letti literis gratias regi Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam scribis fabros ministrisq; ad condendum Templum esse tibi mittendos, misi ad te milia hominum octoginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Iudea, virum in rebus architecturæ mirabilem. Curabis igitur ut necessarii non egent, & Templum Dei condito ad nos redeant.

SVRON of Tyre Sidon and Phenicia King, to King SALOMON greeting: when I read your letters, I gave God thanks, who hath installed you in your fathers Kingdom. And because you write, that carpenters and workmen may be sent to build Gods Temple, I have sent unto you four score thousand men, and a Maister builder a Tyrian, borne of a Jewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be careful that all necessities be provided for them, and when the Temple of God is built that they come home to us.

The Copies of these letters were extant in Iosephus time as himselfe affirmeth, and to be scene, saith he, Tam in nostris quam in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our owne as in the Tyrian annals. But he deliuereth them somewhat in different termes, as the reader may finde in his antiquities. But were this intercourse betwene Salomon and Hiram either by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise deliuered in the Scriptures, than either Eusebius or Iosephus set it downe, but, so that in substance there is little difference betwene the one and the other.

The like letter in effect Salomon is said to haue written to Vaphres King of Egypt<sup>30</sup> and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commenters vpon Salomon finde that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Egypt, gaue Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eusebius in Eusebius, I doe not finde any such addition of magnus in Eusebius in the last chapter of that ninth booke; neither is it in Iosephus in the eight booke and second chapter of the Antiquities: it being a vaine title vsed by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and vsed likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, in so much as in latter times it grew common, and was vsurped by meane persons in respect of the great Homes the first which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightinesse.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Ierusalem with a treble wal, & repaired H<sup>12</sup> or which had bene the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Iesusus time: so did he Gaza of the Philistines; he built Bethoron, Gerar and the Asilo or munition of Ierusalem. For Pharaoh (as it seemeth in fauour of Salomon) came vp into the edge of Ephraim, and tooke Gerar which the Canaanites yet held & put them to the sword and burnt their Citie. The place and territorie he gaue Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable that because Salomon was then builed in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the warre, that he entreated his father in law to rid him of those neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But he thereby taught the Egyptians to visite those partes againe before they were sent for; and in his sonne Rehoboams time Shephack this mans successor did sacke Ierusalem it selfe.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Iordan and Balah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolemies Thamoron in the desert of Inda (or as Iosephus phus thinks Palmyra in the desert of Syria, which Palmyra because it stood on the utmost border of Salomons dominion to the northeast of Libanus, and was of Dauids conquest when hee wanne Damascus; it may looke that Salomon therefore bellowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best arte, that that age had. Iosephus calls this place Thadmora, by which name (saith hee) giuen by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hiram in his booke of Hebrew places calls it Thermeth. In after times, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperor it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building Salomon raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twentie talents of gold received from Hiram seruants, Salomon offered Hiram twentie townes in or nere the upper Galilee, but because they stood in an vnfruitfull and marish ground: Hiram refused them, and thereof was the territorie called Chabulh.

These townes, as it is supposed lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Non quod gentes inhabitant: sed quia sub ditone regis gentilis erat; Not that it was possesed by Gentiles: (saith Nanderus) but because it was vnder the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsoever it were, it is true that Salomon in his 27. yeere fortified those places, which Hiram refused. Further, he made a iourney into Syria to Idubab and established his tributes; the first and last warre (if in that expedition hee were driuen to fight) that hee made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his Dominions passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyrena, and so to the Deserts of Idumaea, from whence hee visited Eziongaber and Eloih, the uttermost place of the South of all his territories, bordering to the red sea: which Cities I haue described in the Storie of Moses.

¶ III.

Of SALOMONS sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about SALOMONS riches, and of PINEDAES conceits of two strange passages about Africk.

Ere Salomon prepared his flecte of shippes for Inda with whom Hiram ioynd in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert sea-men. From this part of Arabia, which at this time belonged to Edom: and was conquered by David, did the Flecte passe on to the East India, which was not farre off, namely to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Atalucas, a place exceeding rich in gold: witnesseth the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Islands of the East at Atanilla, and recover a great quantitie from thence, and with lesse labour than they doe in any one part of Peru, or new Spaine.

The returne which was made by these shippes amounted to foure hundred and twentie talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eight, it is written foure hundred and fiftie talents: whereof thirtie talents went in expence for the charge of the flect, and wages of men, and foure hundred and twentie talents, which makes fure and twentie hundred and twentie thousand Crowne meane cleere. And thus must those two places be reconciled. As for the place i. Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of six hundred fixtie and six talents of gold, that summe, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomons which were yerely, and which came to him besides the profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as diuers haue thought) but a countrey in the East Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedie returne to Ierusalem from the East Indies then in 3. yeres; and that Tharfi in Scripture is diuerstimes taken for the Ocean; hath bene already declared in the first booke.

Onely it remaineth that I should speake somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Batavia would faine haue Gades or Calis-malis, in old times called Tartessus, which is the South-west corner of that Prouince, to be the Tharxis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seemes, but for loue of his owne country, and because of some affinitie of sound between Tharxis and Tartessus. For whereas it may seeme strange that it should be three yeere ere they, that tooke shippes in the red sea, should returne from the East Indies to Ierusalem, this hath bene in part answered already. And further the intelligent may conceiue of sundry lets, in the digging and refining of the mettall, and in their other traffike, and in their land-carriages betwene Ierusalem and the red sea, and perhaps also elsewhere: for that wee haue no neede to make Salomons men to goe many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Affrick, that fo they might bee long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Israelites knew not, the Tyrans which went with them, could not haue bene ignorant of) was along the Mediterranean sea, and so (besides many wonderfull inconueniences and terrible nauigation in rounding Africa) they should haue escaped the troublesome land-carriage betwene Ierusalem and the red sea through drie, desert, and theeuish Countries; and within 30. mile of Ierusalem at Ioppe, or some other haven in Salomons owne Country, haue laden and vnladen their shippes.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis in largeness greater than all Affrick and Asia being swallowed vp in the Atlantic Ocean hindered Salomons shippes from passing through the straits of Gibraltar: for this hee alleadgeth Plato in Timæo. But that this calamitie happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the Straights of Gades were filled with mudde and made vnpassable, that there could be no coming to Gades by the Mediterranean sea: or that this indraught where the sea runneth most violently, and most easily scoureth his channell, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Island is supposed to haue stooode: or that Salomons shippes being in the red sea, should neglect the golden mines of the East Indies (which were infinitely better and nearer to the red sea, than any in Spain) to seeke gold at Cadyz by the way of compassing Africa, it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himselfe that hath also the rich Peru in the West, fortifieth in the East Indies and inhabites some part thereof, as in Manila, finding in those parts no lesse quantitie of gold (the small territorie which he there possesseth considered) than in Peru.

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elft where he dreames of: supposing whereas Ionus sailing to Tharxis the Citie of Cilicia was cast out in the Mediterranean sea, and taken vp there by a Whale, that this whale in three dayes swimming about twelue thousand English miles, along the Mediterranean seas, and so through the streights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Africa, cast vp Ionus upon the shore of the red sea, that so hee might haue perhaps some sixe miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Ninurie. This conceit hee grounds onely vpon the ambiguity of the word Synph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the red sea (as if we should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds) for the red sea. But in Ionus 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for weeds, and not as Pineda would haue it, who in this place against his owne rule (which elsewhere he giueth vs) supposeth strange miracles without any neede. For this long voyage of the whale finished in three daies, is a greater miracle, than the very preservation of Ionus in the belly of the whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessity of this miracle, we send it backe vnto him, keeping his owne rule which in this place he forgets; Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And againe, Non sunt miracula gratis danda. nec pro arbitrio noua fingenda. Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessity, nor deliuered without cause, nor fained at pleasure. Therefore to leaue this man in his dreames, which (were hee not otherwise very learned and iudicious) might bee bee thought vnworthie the mentioning. But to proceede with our Storie of Salomon.

The Queene of Sabæe comming from farre to Salomon, (as it seemes from Arabistice, & not as some think from Ethiopia; and her rich presents, and Salomons reciprocal magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult questions, those are set downe at large in the text. But herein Iosephus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queene of Saba Nicaules, the successeur (saith hee out of Herodotus) of thole thirtie and eight Egyptian Kings which succeded Meneus the founder of Alenphus; adding that after this Egyptian, and the father in Law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elsewhere proued that the Queene was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia; so were there other Pharaohs after the father in Law of Salomon. Yea, about three hundred yeeres after Salomon, Pharao Necho slew Iosias King of Iuda.

2. Chron. 3. 1.
1. Es. 4. 2. 3.

It is also written of Salomon that hee kept in garrisons fourteene thousand chariots and twelue thousand horsemen; that he spent in Court euery day thirtie measures of fine flower, threecore measures of wheat, one hundred sheepe, besides stags and fallow deare, bugles and foule; foure thousand stals of horses he had for his chariots and other vses, and for the twelue thousand horsemen of his guard. For, the ten thousand stals in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for 10 many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but foure thousand stals or teemes, and in euery teeme ten horses, as Iunius and the Geneua vnderstand it. He was said to be wiser than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda, to which Iunius addeth a list, to wit, Ezech. For the Geneua maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Iosephus writes them Atban, Aman, Chalcus and Donan the sonnes of Hemon. Hee spake three thousand Proverbs, and his songes were one thousand and fine, whereof either the most part perished in the Captiuitie of Babylon, or else because many actes of Salomons were written and kept among the publique Records of Ciuill causes and not Ecclesiasticall, therefore they were not thought necessarie to bee inserted into Gods booke.

¶ IIII.

Of the full of Salomon, and how long hee liued.

NO was hee had plentie of all other things, so had he no scarcitie of women. For besides his seauen hundred wiues hee kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commaunded that none of his people should accompanie the daughters of Idolators) hee tooke wiues out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heb: and when hee fell a doting, his wiues turned his heart after other Gods, as Asteroth of the Zidonians, Ashtoreth of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of Moab.

These things God punished by Asad of Idumæa, Rezin of Damascus, and by Iero-beam his owne seruant, and one of the masters of his workes, who by the ordinance of God tare from his sonne Roboam, ten of the twelue parts of all the territorie hee had. Deus dum in peccatores animaduertit, aliorum peccatis vitatur, quæ ipsi non fecerunt. God in punishing sinners, vseth the finnes of others, which hee himselfe wrought not.

In the reigne of Salomon (as in tymes of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Fourtie yeeres hee reigned: how many he liued, it is not written, and must therefore bee found onely by coniecture. The most likeliest way to guesse at the truth in this case, is by considering the action, of David before and after Salomons birth, whereby wee may best make estimation of the yeeres which they consumed, and consequently learne the true, or most like-ly yeere of his natiuitie. Seauen yeeres Dauid reigned in Iebryon: in his eight yeere hee tooke Ierusalem, and warred with the Philistims, who also troubled him the yeere following. The bringing home of the Arke seemes to haue bene in the tenth yeere of Dauid, and his intention to build the Temple in the yeere ensuing, at which time he had sufficient leysure, liuing in rest. After this he had warres with the Philistims, Moabites, Aramites and Edomites, which mult needes haue held him fise yeeres, considered that the Aramites of Damasco raised warre against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadezer, and that in euery of these warres, he had the entire victorie. Neither is it likely that these seruices occupied any longer time, because in those daies and places there were no wintering campes in vse, but at convenient seasons of the yeere, Kings went forth to warre, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly vpon the spoyle of the enemies cuntry, partly vpon the priuate prouision which euery souldier made for himselfe. The 17. yeere of Dauid in which hee tooke Stephobeseth the son of Ionathian into his Court, appeareth to haue passed away in quiet; and the yeere following to haue begonne the warre with Ammon; but some what late in the end of summer perhaps, it came to triall of a battaile (for Iob after the victorie, returned immediately to Ierusalem) the causes and preparations for that war hauing taken vp all the summer. Dauids personall expedition against the Aramites wherein hee brought all the tributaries of Hadadezer vnder his owne allegiance, appeares manifestly to haue bene the next yeeres worke, wherein hee did cut off all meanes of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab and Idumaea being now at his owne deuotion. By this reckoning it must haue bene the 20. yeere of Dauids reigne, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which he sent forth Iob to beseege Rabbah, and finished the warre of Ammon: wherein also fell out the matter of Uriahs wife. So one halfe of Dauids reigne was very prosperous: in the other halfe he felt great sorrow by the expectation, execution, and sad remembrance of that heauie iudgement laid vpon him by God, for his foule and bloodie offence.

Now very manifest it is that in the yeere after the death of that child, which was begotten in adulterie, Salomon was borne, who must needes therefore haue bene nineteene yeres old or thereabout, when hee beganne to reigne at the decaile of his father, as being begotten in the 21. yeere of his fathers reigne, who reigned in all fortie.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of Dauid, as may be collected out of ensuing actions: for two yeeres passed ere Abisalem slew his brother Amnon; three yeeres ere his father pardoned him; and two yeres more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horse and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seemes to haue bene one yeres worke. So the rebellion it selfe with that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa and the rest, may well seeme to haue bene in the 30. yeere of Dauids reigne.

Whether the three yeeres of famine should be reckoned apart from the last yeeres of warre with the Philistims or confounded with them, it were more hard than needfull to coniecture. Plaine enough it is, that in the tenne remaining yeeres of Dauid there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for three yeeres of famine, for four yeeres of warre, and for numbring the people, with the pestilence ensuing; as also for his owne last infirmie, and disposing of the Kingdom. Yet indeed it seemes that the warre with the Philistims, was but one yeeres worke, and ended in three or foure fights, of which two or three former were at Gob or Reb neere vnto Gezer and the last at Gath. This warre the Philistims vnderooke, as it seemeth, vpon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by Dauids old age, for hee fainted now in the battaile, and was afterwarde hindered dered by his men from exposing himselfe vnto danger any more. So Dauid had fixe or seuen yeeres of rest, in which time it is likely, that many of his great men of Warre died (being of his owne age) whereby the stirring spirit of Aiongab found little succour in the broken partie of Iob the sonne of Zerua.

At this time it might both truly be said by Dauid to Salomon. Thou art a wise man, and by Salomon to God, I am but a yong child; for nineteene yeeres of age might well agree with either of these two speeches.

Neuertheless there are some that gather out of Salomons professing himselfe a child, that he was but eleuen yeeres old when hee beganne to reigne. Or this Rabbi Salomon seemes the first Authour, whom other of great learning and iudgement haue herein followed: grounding themselues perhapp vpon that which is said of Abisalons rebellion, that it was after fortie yeeres, which they vnderstand as yeeres of Dauids reigne. But whereas Kelubom the sonne of Salomon was 41. yeeres old when hee beganne to reigne, it would follow hereby that his Father had begotten him, being himselfe but a child of nine or ten yeeres old; the difference betweene their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who reigned fortie yeeres) were but eleuen yeeres old when his reigne began. To auoid this inconuenience, Iosephus allows 80. yeeres of fraigne to Salomon; a report so disagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needes no confutation. Some indeede haue in fauour of this opinion construed the words of Iosephus, as if they included all the yeeres of Salomons liue. But by such reckoning hee should haue bene 40. yeeres old at his Fathers death; and consequently should haue bene borne long before his Father had wonne Ierusalem; which is a manifest vntruth. Wherefore the 40. yeeres remembered in Abisalons rebellion, may either seeme to haue reference to the space betweene Dauids first anointment, and the trouble which God brought vpon him for his wickednesse, or perhaps be read (according to Iosephus, Theodoret, and the Latine translation) foure yeeres; which passed betweene the returne of Abisalon to Ierusalem, and his breaking out.

OF SALOMONS writings.

Here remaine of Salomons workes, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Salomon. In the first he teacheth good life and correcteth manners, in the second the vanitie of humane nature, in the third he singeth as it were the Epithalamian of Christ and his Church. For the Booke intituled the wisdomde of Salomon, (which some giue vnto Salomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author thereof) Hierome and many others of the best learned make vs thinke it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri sapientie (saith HIERONIS in scriptis, Græcam reliquit eloquentiam, sum. The stile of the booke of wisdomde, which is ascribed to SALOMON, fauoureth of the Græcian eloquence; and of the same opinion was S. Augustine, and yet hee consisteth in the nineteenth Booke and twentieth Chapter of the Citie of God, that the Author of that Booke hath a direct fore-telling of the Passion of Christ in these wordes. Circumueniamus iustum quantum insuauis est nobis, &c. Let vs encompass the righteous for he is vnpleasing to vs, he is contrarie to our doings, he checketh vs for offending against the Law, he makes his boast to haue the know ledge of God, and he calleth himselfe the sonne of the Lord, &c. and so doth the course of all the following wordes point directly at Christ. The Bookes of Ecclesiastes, Proverbs, and Cantica Canticorum, Rabbi Moset Kimchi ascribeth to Isay the Prophet. Suidas and Cedrenus report that Salomon wrote of the remedies of all diseases, and graued the same on the sides of the porch of the Temple, which they say Ezechias pulled downe, because the people neglected helpe from God by prayer, repaired rather for their recoveries.

Of Salomons bookes of Inuocations and Inchantments to cure diseases, and expell euill spirits, Iosephus hath written at large, though as I conceiue, rather out of his owne inuention, or from some vncertaine report, than truly.

He also speaketh of one Elasarus, who by the roote in Salomons ring dispossest diuers persons of euill spirits in the presence of Rehoboam, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainly so strange an example of humane frailty hath neuer been read of as this King: who hauing receiued wildome from God himselfe, in honour of whom, and for his only seruice, he built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: hee that was made King of Israel and Iudea, nor by the law of Nature, but by the loue of God, and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswasion of a few weeke and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the world, and the giuer of all goodnesse, of which he was more liberal to this King, than to any that euer the world had. Of whom Siracides writeth in this manner. Salomon reign'd in a peaceable time and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that he might build a house in his name, and prepare the Sanctuary for euer; How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with vnderstanding, as with a shield!! Thy minde couer'd the whole earth, and hast filled it with grace and dark sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Isles, and for thy peace thou wast beloued, &c. but thus he concludeth. Thou didst bow thy loynes to Women, and wast ouercome by thy boldy, thou didst staine thine honour, and hast defiled thy posteritie, and hast brought wrath vpon thy children, and felt sorrow for thy folly. cap. 27.

Of the Contemporaries of SALOMON.

NEARE the beginning of Salomons raigne, Agelaus the third of the Illyriades in Corinth, Labotes in Lacedaemon, and soone after Syllius Alibi the fourth of the Syluij, swaied those Kingdomes: Laophtenes then gouerning Aegyptus: Agastius and Archippus the second and third Princes after Codrus, ruling the Athenians.

In the fixe and twentieth of Salomons raigne Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Eliashir succeeded, and reigned fuentene yeares, after Alexandors accompt, who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his sonnes. Iosephus giues him fewer yeares. Theophilus Antiochenus against Antonicus findes Bozorius the next after Hiram, if there bee not some Kinges omitted betwene the death of Hiram, and the raigne of Bozorius.

Raphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sesac or Shishak (as our English Geneua termes him) beganne to gouerne in Aegypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sosachis; Iosephus, Susac; Cleuerus, Suscesmus; Engelium in the column of the Aegyptian Kings Smendes, and in that of the Hebrewes Susac. Iosephus in the eight of his Antiquities reponeth it as an error in Herodotus, that hee ascribeth the acts of Susac to Sesostrius, which perchance Herodotus might haue done by comparison, accompting Sesac another Sesostrius, for the great thinges hee did.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sesostrius I haue spoken already in the storie of the Aegyptian Princes: only in this hee was reprobated that hee caused foure of his captiue Kinges to draw his Carachi, when hee was disposed to bee seene, and to ride in triumph: one of which foure, saith Entropius, at such time as Sesostrius was carried out to take the aire, cast his head continually backe vpon the two fore-most wheeles next him; which Sesostrius perceiving, asked him what hee found worthy the admiration in that motion? to whom the captiue King answered, that he beheld the instabilitie of all worldly thinges; for that both the lowest part of the wheele was suddainly carried about, and became the highest, and the vppermost part was as suddainly turned downe-ward and vnder all: which when Sesostrius had iudicially weighed, hee dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like seruitude in the future. Of this Sesostrius, and that he could not be taken for Sesac, I haue spoken at large in that part of the Aegyptian Kings preceding.

CHAP. XIX.

Of SALOMONS Successors vntill the end of IEHOSAPHAT.

§. I.

Of REHOBAM his beginnings: the defection of the ten Tribes, and IEROBOAMS Idolatrie.

REHOBAM the Son of Salomon by Nahama an Ammonitess, now fortie yeares olde, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was annointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the returne of Ieroboam as yet in Aegypt, since he fled thither fearing Salomon. After his arrival the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father. Sicenim firmius ei fore Imperium, si amari mallet quam metui; So should his Empire (saith IOSEPHVS) be more assured if hee desired rather to be beloued than feared.

whereof he tooke three daies to deliberate before his answer, of whom therefore it could not be said as of Dauid, that he was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himselfe hee knew not how to resolue, so had hee not the iudgement to discern of counsell, which is the very test of wisdome in Princes, and in all men else. But notwithstanding that he had consulted with those graue and aduised men, that serued his Father, who perswaded him by all means to satisfie the multitude: he was transported by his familiars and fauourites, not only to continue on the backs of his subjects those burdens which greatly crusht them; but (vaunting filly of greatness exceeding his Fathers) he threatned in sharpe, or rather in terrible termes, to lay yet heauier, and more vsupportable loades on them. But as it appeared by the successe, those yonger aduisors greatly mistooke the nature of seueritie, which without the temper of clemencie is no other than crueltie it selfe: they also were ignorant that it ought to be vsed for the helpe, and not for the harme of subjects. For what is the strength of a King left by his people? and what cordes or fetters haue cuer lasted long, but those which haue bene twisted and forged by loue only? His witless parasites could well iudge of the Kinges disposition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all thinges else, it sufficed and inabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehoboam did not a little aduance Ieroboams designs. For being fore-told by the Prophet Achiah of his future aduancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples loue into furie) confirmed and gaue courage to his hopes. For he was no sooner arrived, than elected King of Israel: the people crying out what portion haue wee in Dauid? wee haue no inheritance in the Sonne of Israhel. Now though themselves, euen all the Tribes of Israhel, had consented to Daniels anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgot both the bonds of nature, and their dutie to God, and, as all alienated resolute hearts doe, they secured themselves for the present with impudent excuses. And now ouer-late, and after time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hateful to all his Subjects, to pacifie them: whom they instantly beate to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Siehem with all speed; and recovered Ierusalem, where preparing to invade Israhel, with an hundred and foure score thousand chosen men, Shearn in the person of God commanding to the contrarie, all was itated for the present. In the meane time Ieroboam the new King fortified Siehem on this side, and Peniel on the other side of Jordan; and fearing that the Vnion and exercise of one Religion would also ioyne the peoples hearts againe to the House of Dauid; and hauing in all likelihood also promised the Egyptians to follow their Idolatrie: he set vp two Calues of gold for the Children of Israhel to worship, impiously perswading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these hee represented thof. Gods, which deliuered them out of Egypt: and retaining the seruice of the Leuites, hee made Priests fit for such Gods. It muſt needs be that by banishing the Leuites which serued Dauid and Salomon through all Israhel, Ieroboam greatly enriched himselfe: as taking into his hands all those Cities which were giuen them by Abies and Iefai, for as it is written, The Leuites left: ex subtribus, another possession, and came to Iuda, &c. This irreligious policie of Ieroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatrie that neuer could be rooted out, until Israhel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by propheticall and miracles impugned sufficiently when it first beganne; but the affections maintaining it, were loo strong, that neither Propheticall nor Miracle could make them yeeld. Ieroboam could not be moued now by the authoritie of Israhel, who from the Lord had first promised vnto him the Kingdome; nor by the withering of his owne hand as hee stretched it ouer the Altar, which also claue a fonder, according to the signe, which the man of God had giuen by the commandment of God, who againe recovered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obſtinate an Idolater as before, for he held it the safest course in policie to proceede as hee had begunne. This impious inuention of Ieroboam, who forsooke God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a myſticall Historian compared with the policie of late Ages, obseruing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian borne. Sic qui boue (saith he) positum cogunt: & proprii commodi, presensque utilitates sibi tanquam ultimam finem constituunt, easum quemque uolunt in capite communis ponunt: pro ipsa tuenda, promouenda, conseruanda, cupiunt, a pibis non faciem lum putant. Si uinicia proximo irroganda, si iustitia honestasque leges subvertenda, si religio ipsa pessundanda, si denique omnia iura diuina, & humana violanda, nihil ad ipsos, modo id, quod eire sibi esse sibi persuadent, adinueniunt, omnia percont, nihil ad ipsos, modo id, quod eire sibi esse sibi persuadent, adinueniunt, ac si nullus sit qui talia curet, castus uere possit Deum; So they who are now called Politicians, vnderstanding to themselves as their utmost end and scope, their owne commoditie and present profit, are wont to alleges the case of state for sooth, as the principall point to be regarded: for the good of the state, for aduancing, preserving, or encreasing of the state, they thinke they may doe any thing. If they meane to oppress their neighbour, to ouerturne all lawes of iustice and honesty, if religion it selfe must goe to wrack, yea if all rights of God and M. in must be trod, they will trie all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will doe any thing: let all goe to nine, what care they, so long as they may haue what they would; as who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

In deed this allegation of ragione del stato, did serue as well to vp-hold, as at the first it had done to bing in this vile Idolatrie of the ten Tribes. Vpon this ground

Amaziah the Priest of Bethel, consulted the Prophet Amos, not to propheticall at Bethel; For (saith he) it is the Kings Court. Vpon this ground euen Iehu that had murthered the Priests of Bad, in zeale for the Lord, yet would not in any wife depart from that politike finne of Ieroboam the sonne of Nebeai, which made Israhel to sinne. It was reason of state that perswaded the last famous French King Henrie the fourth to change his religion, yet the Protestants whom hee forsooke obeyed him, but some of the Papists whom hee followed murdered him. So strongly doth the painted vizor of wise proceeding delude euen those that know the ioule face of impietie lurking vnder it, and behold the wretched endes that haue euer followed it; whereof of Iehu and all the Kings of Israhel had, and were themselves, very great examples.

§. II.

OF REHOBAM his impietie; for which he was punished by Sesac: of his end and Contemporaries.

*V*hile Ieroboam was occupied in setting vp his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other side hauing now little hope to recouer the Prouinces lost, strengthened the principall places remaining with all endeuour: for he fortified and virtualled fiftene Cities of Iudah and Beniamin: not that he feared Ieroboam alone, but the Egyptians, to whom Ieroboam had not only kistened himselfe, but withall invited them to invade Iuda: laying perchance before them the incountable riches of Dauid and Salomon; which might now easily bee had, being ten of the twelue Tribes were reuolted, and became enemies to the Iudaens. So as by those two waies (of late years often troden) to wit, change of Religion, and inuitation of forraigne force, Ieroboam hoped to settle himselfe in the seate of Israhel, whom yet the powerful God for his Idolatrie in a few years after rooted out with all his. Rehoboam also hauing, as he thought, by fortifying diuers places assured his estate, forsooke the Law of the liuing God, and made high Places, and Images, and Groves on euery high Hill, and vnder euery greene Tree.

And therefore in the fifth year of his raigne, Sesac or Shishac before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom as well Adad of Iudaea, as Ieroboam, were familiar and his instruments, entred Iudaea with twelue thousand Chariots, and three score thousand Horſe, besides foote-men, which Iosephus numbers at foure hundred thousand. This Armie was compounded of foure Nations, Egyptians, Libaens, Succaens, and Cushites. The Libaens were Lybaens, the next bordering Region to Egypt, on the West side. The Cushites were of Petrea, and of the Desert Arabia, which afterward followed Zerah against Asa King of Iuda. The Succaens, according to Iunius his opinion, were of Succoth, which signifieth Tents: he doth suppose that they were the Troglodites, mentioned often in Plinie, Ptolomee, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not farre from the banks of the red Sea, in 22. degrees from the line Northward about fixe hundred English mile from the best and Maritimate part of Egypt: and therefore I doe not thinke that the Succaens or Succa were those Troglodites, but rather those Arabians which Ptolomee calls Arabs Egyptii or Iethiophagi, which possesse that part of Egypt betwene the mountains called Alabastriani and the red Sea farre nearer Egypt, and readier to be lured then those remoued Suages of the Troglodyte.

With this great and powerfull Armie, Sesac invaded Iudaea, and (besides many other strong Cities) wanne Ierusalem it selfe, of which, and of the Temple, and Kings house, he tooke the spoile, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which Dauid recovered from Adadzer, in the Syrian warre: these Rehoboam supplied with Targets of brass, which were fit enough to guard a King of his qualitie: whom Siraides calleth The foolishness of the people.

From this time forward the Kings of Egypt claimed the soueraigntie of Judea, and held the Ieruses their Tributaries: Sesac, as it seemes, rendring vp to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the wordes of God, where promising the deliuerance of Juda after their humiliation, he doth notwithstanding leaue them vnder the yoke of Egypt, in these wordes. Neuerthelesse they (to wit, the Iudeans) shall be his seruants, that is, the seruants of SESAC.

After this ouerthrow and dishonour Rehoboam reigned twelue yeares, and his losses receiued by Sesac notwithstanding, hee continued the warre against Ieroboam all his life time. After his death Ieroboam gouerned Israel foure yeares.

Rehoboam liued 58. yeares, and reigned 17. his storie was written at large by She-maiah and Iddo the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan & therelt.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Terfippus, the third and fourth Arcontes or Gouernours for life after Codrus, gouerned in Athens. Abdastartus or Abstartus, in Tyre. Lorigibus the list of the Heraclides in Sparta according to Ensebius (others make him the sixth) and Priminus the fourth in Corinth. Ouer the Laces reigned Sylanius Aiba and Sylanius Arys, the fourth and fifth of the Syluij.

About the 12. of Rehoboam Abdastartus King of Tyre was murdered by his Nurfes sons, or foster brethren, the elder of which vsurped the Kingdom twelue yeares.

Towards his latter times Periades, or Pyrrhiades, beganne to gouerne Affrica, the 34. King thereof: and not long after Astartus the sonne of Baleastartus recovered the Kingdome of Tyre from the Parspers.

§. III.

Of the great battaile betweene IEROBOAM and ABIA, with a Corollarie of the examples of Gods iudgements.

ABIAH the Sonne of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdome, and his vices. He raised an Armie of foure hundred thousand, with which hee invaded Ieroboam, who encountered him with a double number of eight hundred thousand; both Armies ioyned neare to the Mount Ephraim, where Ieroboam was vtterly ouerthrowne, and the strength of Israel broken; for there fell of that side fife hundred thousand, the greatest ouerthrow that euer was giuen or receiued of those Nations. Abijah being now master of the field, recovered Bethel, Ieshubab, and Ephron, loone after which discomfiture, Ieroboam died: who reigned in all 22. yeares. Abijah, the better to strengthen himselfe, entred into league with Helion, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may be gathered out of the 2. of Chron. he reigned but three yeares and then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Iddo the Prophet, as some part of his Fathers were.

Here wee see how it pleased God to punish the sinnes of Salomon in his Sonne Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and a Traitor: and then by the successor of that Egyptian, whose daughter Salomon had married, thereby the better to assure his estate, which while hee serued God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings, and when hee forsooke him, it was torne a-sunder by his meanest Vassalls; Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sesac. For the sonne Abijah was able to leaue foure hundred thousand men and with the same number hee ouerthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them fife hundred thousand. God giuing spirit, courage, and inuention, when and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were exprest, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People: the same being both before, and at the instant deliuered by Prophets; so the same iust God who lieth and gouerneth all things for euer, doeth in these our times giue victorie, courage, and discouragement, raise, and throw downe Kingdomes, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in in the present: for which reason in these and other the afflictions of Israel, alwaies the causes are set downe, that they might bee as precedents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in Dauids time for three yeeres, For Saul and his bloudie house, &c. And Dauid towards his latter end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrowes in effect, for Vriah. Salomon had tenne tribes of Iudea torne from his idolatrie. Rehoboam was spoiled of his riches and honour by Sesac of Egypt, because the people of Juda made images, high places, and groues &c. And because they suffered Sodomites in the land. Ieroboam was punished in himselfe & his posteritie for the golden Calfes that he erected. Ioram had all his finnes slaine by the Philistins, and his very bowels torne out of his bodie by an excoiating flux, for murdering his brethren. Ahish and Iezabel were slaine, the blood of the one, the bodie of the other eaten with dogs: for the false accusing and killing of Naberth. So also hath God punished the same and the like finnes in all after-times, and in these our daies by the same famine, plagues, warre, losse, vexation, death, sickness, and calamities, howeouer the wise men of the world raise these effects no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents, which, as being next their eyes and eares, seeme to them to worke euery alteration that happeneth.

§. IIII.

Of ASA and his contemporaries.

ASABIAH succeeded Abia, who enioyed peace for his first ten yeeres, in which time hee established the Church of God, breaking downe the altars dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting downe their groues, and taking away their high places. Hee also spared not his owne mother who was an Idolatrice, but depoling her from her regencie, brake her Idoll, stamp it, and burnt it. Hee also fortified many Cities and other places, providing (as prouident King: doe) for the troubles of war in the leasure of peace. For not long after hee was invaded by Zerah, who then commaunded all the Arabians bordering Judea, and with such a multitude entred the territorie of Asa, as (for any thing that I haue read) were neuer assembled of that Nation either before or since. For it is written, that there came against the Judeans Zerah of Ethiopia with an host of tenne hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Asa encountered with an armie of fife hundred and fourescore thousand, letied out of those two tribes of Juda and Beniamin which obeyed him, and with which hee ouerthrew this fearefull multitude, and had the spoile both of their Cities and Campe.

That this Zerah was not an Ethiopian I haue* proued already, and were it but the length betweene Ethiopia and Judea, and the strong flourishing regions of Egypt interiacent (who would not suffer a million of strangers to passe through them) it were sufficient to make it appear how foolish the opinion is that these invaders were Ethiopians. But in that the scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoiled by the Judeans in following their victories, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar standeth vpon the torrent of Bezor, which Dauid past ouer when hee surprized the Amalekites or Arabians, this proueth sufficiently that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Gerar was a frontier towne standing on the vttermost South-border of all Judea, from all parts of Ethiopia six hundred miles. Also the spoiles which Asa tooke, as the 50 cattell, Camels, and sheepe, whereof hee sacrificed fife thousand, shew them to bee Arabians adioyning, and not far off, and not vnknowne Ethiopians. And if it be objected that these desert countries can hardly yeeld a million of men fit for the wars, I answer, that it is as like that Arabia Petraea, and the Desart which compass two parts of the holy land, should yeeld ten hundred thousand, as that two tribes of the the twelve, should arme five hundred and foure score thousand. Besides it answered to the promise of God to Abraham, that these nations should exceed in number; for God spake it of Israel, that he would make him fruitful, and multiply him exceedingly, that he should beget twelve Princes, &c.

Basia a King of Israel began to reigne in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatness of Asa after his great victorie, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adezer, to ioyne with him against Asa; and to the end to block him vp, hee fortified Rama which lieth in the way from Jerusalem towards Samarina.

This warre began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. yeere of Asa his reigne: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Basia died in the 26. yeere of Asa, therefore could not Basia begin this warre in the 35. of Asa his reigne, but in the 35. yeere of the diuision of Juda and Israel: for so many yeeres it was from the first of Rehoboam, who reigned 17. yeeres, to the 16. of Asa. It may seeme strange that Asa being able to bring into the field an armie of five hundred and fourescore thousand good soldiers, did not easily driue away Basia, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Asia against Ieroboam, and of Asa himselfe against Zerib being yet fresh in minde, which might well haue emboldened the men of Juda and much disheartened the enemies. Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the text, which caused Asa to fight at this time with mony. It may be that the employment of so many hundred thousands of hands in the late seruice against Zerib, had caused many mens priuate busineses to lie vndispatched, whereby the people being now intentiue to the culture of their lands and other trades, might be vnwilling to stirre against the Israelites, choosing rather to winke at apparent inconuenience, which the building of Rama would bring vpon them in after-times. Such backwardnesse of the people might haue deterred Asa from aduenturing himselfe with the least part of his forces, and committing the success into the hands of God. Howsoeuer it were, he tooke the treasures remaining in the Temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian again Basia, whose employments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake of confederacie with Basia. For the Israelites were his borderers and next neighbours, whom neither himselfe (after his inuasion) nor his successors after him euer gaue ouer, till they had made themselves masters of that Kingdome. So Benhadad being now entred into Nephthalem without resistance, he spoiled diuers principall cities thereof, and enforced Basia to quit Rama, and to leaue the same to Asa with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which done, Benhadad who loued neither partie, being laden with the spoiles of Israel, and the treasures of Juda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hamani the Prophet reprehended Asa in that he now relied on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himselfe on the fauour and assistance of God, he not onely caused Hamani to bee imprisoned, but hee began to burden and oppress his people, and was therefore brooken with the grievous paines of the gout in his feete, wherewith after he had bene two yeeres continually tormented, he gaue vp the ghost when he had reigned 41. yeeres.

There liued with Asa, Agassilau the sixth of the Heralidae, and Bacis the fifth King of the same race in Corinth, of whom his successors were afterward called Bacidae. Asarimus and Astarmus were Kings in Tyre. Astarmus tooke reuenge on his brother Phelices for the murder of Rehobad priest of the goddesse Astarta, whom Salomon in dotage worshipped. Arys and Capsus ruled the Latines. Pyrrhiades and Ophreaceu the Assyrians: Terlippus and Phorbas the Athenians: Chemmis reigned in Egypt; who dying in the 36. yeere of Asa, left Cheops his successor that reigned fiftie fixe yeeres, euen so to the 16. of Iosus.

¶ V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the Ten Tribes during the reigne of Asa.

IN the reigne of Asa, the Kingdome of Israel felt great and violent commotions, which might haue reduced the ten Tribes vnto their former allegiance to the house of Dauid, if the wisdom of God had not otherwise determined. The wickednesse of Ieroboam had, in his latter dayes, the sentence of heauie vengeance laied vpon it, by the mouth of Asia, the same Prophet which had foretold the diuision of Israel, for the sinne of Salomon, and his reigne ouer the ten Tribes. One sonne Ieroboam had among others, in whom only God found so much pietie, as (though it sufficed not to withhold his wrath from that Familie) it procured vnto him a peaceable end; an honourable testimonie of the peoples loue, by their generall mourning and lamentation at his death; and (whererein hee was most happie) the fauourable approbation of God himselfe.

After the losse of this good sonne, the vngodly father was soone taken away: a miserable creature, so conscious of his vile vnthankfulness to God, that he durst not suffer his owne name to be vsed in consulting with an holy Prophet, assured of the ruine hanging ouer him and his yea of Gods extreme hatred; yet forbearing to destroy those accursed Idolls that wrought his confusion. So loath hee was to forsake his worldly wisdom, when the world was readie to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his hatefull memorie excepted.

Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam, reigned in the second and third yeeres of Asa, which are reckoned as two yeeres, though indeede his fathers last yeere of two and twentie did runne along (how farre is vncertaine) with the second of Asa, whose third yeere was the first of Basia; so that perhaps this Nadab injoyed not his Kingdome one whole yeere. He did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence. It seemes that he little feared the judgements denounced against his fathers house: for as a Prince that was secure of his owne estate, hee armed all Israel against the Philistims, and besieged one of their Townes. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill successe, and recalled to minde their grievous losse of five hundred thousand vnder Ieroboam, counting it an vnluckie familie to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, hee exasperated them) flaine he was by Basia, whom the Armie did willingly accept for King in his stead. Basia was no sooner proclaimed King, than hee began to take order with the house of Ieroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercede, to the sword. That hee did this for priuate respects, and not in regard of Gods will to haue it so, it is euident, by his continuing in the same forme of Idolatry which Ieroboam had begunne. Wherefore hee recieued the same sentence from God that had bene laied vpon Ieroboam; which was executed vpon him also in the same sort. Hee beganne to infect Asa, by fortifying Ramab; but was diuerted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waste his Countrey, destroying all the Land of Nephthalem. Four and twentie yeeres hee reigned: and then dying, left the Crowne to Ela his sonne; who enjoyed it, as Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam had done, two yeeres current, perhaps not one compleare.

Ela was as much an Idolater as his father: and withall a riotous person. He sent an Armie against Gibbethon, the same Towne of the Philistims, before which Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam perished; but hee sate at home the whilst, feasting and drinking with his Minions, whereby hee gaue such advantage against himselfe, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaying with the King at Tirsa, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behaviour so contemptible, conceiued hope of the like fortune as Basia had found, by doing as Basia had done. Wherefore hee did set vpon on Ela in his drunkenesse, and slue him. Presently vpon which fact, he stiled himselfe King of Israel: and began his raigne with massacring all the house of Basbuz; extending his crueltie not only to his children, and kinsfolke, but vnto all his friends in Tirza. These newes were quickly blowne to the Campe at Gibbethon, where they were not welcomed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers in steade of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they saluted King, they (quitting the siege of Gibbethon) presented themselves before Tirza; which in short space they may seeme to haue forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the Citie, not courage to keepe himselfe from falling aliae into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace: consuming it and himselfe together to ashes. Seven dayes he is said to haue raigned: accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Campe. For Zimri was also an Idolater, Isak King in the way of IEROBOM; and therefore is likely to haue had more time wherein to declare himselfe, than the raigne of seven dayes, and those consumed partly in murdering the friends of Basbuz, partly in seeking to haue defended his owne life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; whereby it may seeme, that Zimri had made his partic strong, as being able to set vp a new head, who doubtlesse would neuer haue appeared, if there had not bene readie to his hand, some strength, not unlikely to resist and vanquish the Armie which main- tained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out; I doe not finde; only it appears that his side was decayed, and so he died, leaving no other Successor than his concurrent.

§. V I.

A conjecture of the causes hindring the reunion of Israel with Juda, which might haue bene effected by these troubles.

Any man that shall consider the state of Israel, in those times, may justly wonder how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamities already suffered vnder these vnfortunate Princes, and with the present ciuill warres, did not returne to their ancient Kings, and reuinite themselves with the mightie Tribes of Juda and Beniamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Asa, but rather chose, the one to endure a desperate necessitie of yielding, or burning himselfe, the other to languish away, a man forsaken: than to haue recourse vnto a remedie, so sure, so readie, and so honourable. To say that God was pleased to haue it so, were a true, but an idle answer (for his secret will is the cause of all things) vnlesse it could be proued, that he had forbidden Asa to deale in that busi- nesse, as he forbid Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the restraint laid by God vpon Rehoboam, did only binde his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appears by the Warre continued betweene Israel and Juda, so many years following: wherein Abia so farre prevailed, that he wanne a great battaile, and recovered some Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which he annexed to his owne Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly looke into the second causes, mouing the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing vnder new vpstarts, rather than to cast their eyes vpon that Royall house of Dauid, from which the succession of siue Kings in lineall descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly haue bene laid vpon the meane beginnings thereof: To thinke that Omri had preuented his Competitors, in making peace with Asa, were a conjecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not only an Idolater, but did worse than all that were before him, which as it might serue alone to proue, that Asa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, so the course which hee professed to take at the very first, of reuenging the massacre committed vpon the

the familie and friends of Basbuz, (Asa his mortall enemy) giues manifest reason, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, should more iustly than he haue expected the friendship of Inda in that quarrell. Wherefore, in searching out the reason of this backwardness in the ten Tribes (which was such that they may seeme to haue neuer thought vpon the matter) to submit themselves to their true Princes; it were not amisse to examine the cause, mouing the people to reuenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam, who followed the warres in person, as a man of spirit and courage. Surely it is apparent, that the very first detection of the ten Tribes, was (if we looke vpon humane reason) occasioned by desire of breaking that heauie yoke of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their neckes. Their desire was to haue a King that should not oppress them; not to haue no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Rehoboam had caused them to renounce him, they did immediatly choose Ieroboam in his stead, as a man likely to afford that libertie vnto them, for which hee had contended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it seemes) herein altogether deceived. For his affectation of popularitie appears in his building of decayed townes, and in the institution of his new deified idolatry; where he tolde the people, that it was too much for them, to trauaile so farre as to Ierusalem. But whether it were so, that his moderation, being voluntarie, began to scale, towards the latter end of his reigne, and in the reigne of his sonne, when long time of possession had confirmed his title, which at the first was onely good by courtesie of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in such cases) were more offended by some prerogatives of a King that he still retained in his owne hands, than pleased with his remission of other burdens: it is clearly apparent, that the whole armie of all Israel ioynd with Basbuz, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Ieroboams house.

Now the reigne of Basbuz himselfe, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) euery way vnfortunate; his labour and cost at Rama was cast away; the other side of his Kingdome harried by the Syrrians; neither did hee winne that one towne of Gibbethon from the Philistines, but lest that businesse to his sonne, who likewise appears an vnprofitable sluggard. Wherefore it must needs be, that the fauour of the people toward the house of Basbuz grew from his good forme of Ciuill gouernment, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Ieroboam ever meant to doe. And surely he that shall take paines to looke into those examples, which are extant of the different courses, held by the Kings of Israel and Juda, in administration of iustice, will finde it most probable, that vpon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued so averse from the line of Dauid; as to thinke all aduersitie more tolerable, than the weightie Scepter of that house. For the death of Iab and Shimea was indeed by them deserved; yet in that they suffered it without some of iudgement, they suffered like vnto men innocent. The death of Achenish was both without iudgement, and without any crime obiected, other than the Kings seculousie: out of which by the same rule of arbitrarie iustice (vnder which it may be supposed that many were cast away) he would haue slaine Ieroboam (if hee could haue caught him) before he had yet committed any offence, as appears by his confident returne out of Egypt, like one that was knowne to haue endured wrong hauing not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Iehoram did vpon his brethren: and vpon sundry of his greatest men; as also Iacobi did so put to death Zachariah, the sonne of Iehonada, who had made him King, even in the court of the house of the Lord: and MANASSES did shed innocent blood exceeding much, till he re-templified Ierusalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault, besides his sinne, wherevnto hee made Juda to sinne. Contrariwise, among the kings of Israel we finde no monument of such arbitrarie proceeding, vnlesse perhaps the words of Iehoram the sonne of Ahab (which were but words) may be taken for an instance,

1. King. 21. 16.

<sup>2.King.6.31.</sup> instance, when he said, God doe so to mee, and more also, if the head of ELISHA the sonne of SHAPHAT shall stand on him this day: whereby it is not plaine whether hee meant to kill him without more ado, or to haue him condemned as a false prophet, that had made them hold out against the Aramites, till they were faine to eate their owne children, which he thought a sufficient argument to proue, that it was not Gods purpose to deliuer them. The death of Naboth sheweth rather the liberitie which the Israelites enioyed, than any peremptorie execution of the Kings will. For Naboth did not feare to stand vpon his owne right, though Ahab were euenticke for anger, neither was hee for that cause put to death, as vpon commandement, but made away by conspiracie, the matter being handled after a iudiciall forme, to which might giue satisfaction to the people, ignorant of the deuise, though to God it could not.

The murder of the Prophets is continually ascribed to Iezabel, an impotent woman, and not vnto the King her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made, whereby their liues were taken from them; but certaine it is that the people, being idolaters, were both pleased with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the kings of Iuda (such as are registred) proue them to haue vsed a more absolute manner of command, than the Kings of the tenne Tribes. Neither doe their sufferings witness the contrarie. For of those which reigned ouer Iuda, from the diuision of the kingdom, to the captiuitie of the ten tribes, three were slaine by the people, and two were denied a place of buriall amongst their auncellors. Yea, the death of Ahaziah and his brethren, slaine by Iehoi, with the destruction of all the royall seed by Athalia, did not (for ought that wee can reade) stirre vp in the people any such thirst of reuenge, as might by the Indians and vniuersitie testifie the affection to be general, and proceeding from a louing remembrance of their Princes; vntill we should thinke that the death of Athalia, after seauen yeeres reigne, were occasioned rather by the memorie of her ill purchasing, than by the present fence of her tyrannicall abusing the government, whereon she had seded. On the other side, such of the kings of Israel as perished by treason (which were seauen of the twentie) were all slaine by conspiracie of the great men, who as-
<sup>30</sup>pired by treason to the Crowne: the people being so farre from embruing their hands in the blood of their Soueraignes that (after Ahab) they did neuer forbear to reuenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approve the good successe of treason, vntill seare compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being throughly reuenged vpon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, vpon Zimri and Shibdon, who traitorously got and vsurped, for a little while, their places; on ly three of the seauen remaine, whose ends how the people tooke, it may be doubtfull. Though indeed it is precisely said of the slaughter, committed on Ahabs children by Iehoi, that the people durst not fight with him that did it, because they were exceedingly afraid: and the same feare might be in them at the death
<sup>40</sup>of Pekia, whose historie (as others of that time) is cursorily passed ouer. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of England, that neuer any of them perished by furie of the people, but by treason of such as did succed them, neither was there any motiue vrging so forcibly the death of King Edward and king Richard when they were in prison, as feare least the people should stirre in their quarrell. And certainly (how focuer all that the law calls treason, be interpreted, ascending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which haue here most prevailed, the furie of the multitude hath quenched it selfe with the blood of some great Officers; no such rebellions, how fouler wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruine of their naturall Soueraine, but all the reit of the Gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as signifying, that Monarches need not to feare any courbing of their abolluntell: by mightie subiectes, as long as by wisdom they keepe the hearts of the people, who will bee sure to come in on their side. Though indeed the storie might very well haue borne the same interpretation, as it is rebeked by Hommer, who tels vs that Pallas was one of the conspiracie, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practise, by loosening Briareus. For a good forme of government sufficeth by it selfe to retaine the people, not onely without assistance of a laborious Wit, but euen against all deuises of the greatest and shrewdest politicians: e-<sup>10</sup>uery Sherife and Constable, being sooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalfe, than any ouer-weening rebell how mightie focuer, can against him.

This declaration of the peoples loue, being seldome found in Iuda, makes it very likely, that the rule it selfe of government there was such, as neither gaue occasion of contentment vnto the subiects, nor of confidence in their good affection, to the Kings. Vpon which reasons it may seeme that the multitude was kept vssually disarmed. For otherwise it would haue beene almost impossible, that Athalia the sister of Ahab, a stranger to the royall blood of Iuda, should by the onely authoritie of a Queens mother haue destroyed all the seede of Dauid, and vsurped the Kingdom very neere seuen yeeres without finding anie resistance. Yea whic Iehoi, the high Priest had agreed with the Captains & principal men of the land to set vp Iosaph their lawfull King, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected; he was faine to giue to these Captaines and their men, the speares and the swordes that were King DAVIDS, and were in the house of the Lord. But wee neede not enter into such particulars. Questionless, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their dutie toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their owne choice or admission, holding the Crowne by a more vncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the tenne tribes did neuer seeke to <sup>30</sup>returne to their auncient Lords: but after the destruction of their sixe first Kings, which died in the reigne of Asa, admitted a seauenth of a new family, rather than they would subiect themselves, with those of Iuda and Beniamin, vnder a more honourable, but more heauie yoke.

So, Asa hauing scene the death of seauen kings of Israel, died him selfe after one and fourtie yeeres reigne, leaving Iehosaphat his sonne to deal with Ahab the son of Omri, who was the eight king ouer the tenne tribes.

¶ VII.

Of IEHOSAPHAT and his contemporaries.

IEHOSAPHAT, who succeeded Asa, was a Prince religious and happie; hee destroyed all the groues, altars, and high places dedicated to idolatrie, and sent searchers to all places and people wanting instruction; hee recovered the Tribute due vnto him, by the Arabians and Philistines: from the one hee had silver, from the other sheepe and goates to the number of fiftene thousand <sup>50</sup>and foure hundred. The numbers of his men of warre were more than admirable: for it is written that Ahab had the command of three hundred thousand, Iehobanum of two hundred and fourescore thousand, and Amasias of two hundred thousand; also that hee had, besides these, in Beniamin of those that bare shields, which wee call Targetiers, and of Archers vnder Eliada

two hundred thousand, and vnder the commaundement of Iehozabab a hundred and fourescore thousand : which numbered together, make eleuen hundred and sixtie thousand, all which are said to haue waited vpon the King, besides his garrisons.

✠ That Iuda and Beniamin, a territorie not much exceeding the Countie of Kent, should mulster eleuen hundred and sixtie thousand fighting men, it is very strange, and the number farre greater than it was found vpon any other view. Iosab in David time found five hundred thousand : Rehobeam found but an hundred and foure score thousand : Alia foure hundred and eight thousand : Asa five hundred and foure-score thousand : Amaziah inrolled all that could beare armes, and they amounted to three hundred thousand : Vzzab three hundred and seuen thousand and five hundred. Surely, whereas it is written that when newes was brought to Iehosaphat that Moab and Ammon were entred his territorie to the west of Jordan, and that there numbers were manie, hee feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that hee would haue feared euen the armie of Xerxes, if hee could haue brought into the field eleuen hundred and three-score thousand fighting men, leauing all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my selfe to better iudgement) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the seauenteenth, distributed to severall leaders, were not all at one time, but that the three hundred thousand vnder Adnah, & the two hundred and fourescore thousand vnder Iehozabab, were afterward commaunded and mulstered by Amasiah, Eliada, and Iehosaphat : for the grosse and totall is not in that place set downe, as it was vnder the other Kings formerly named. Again, as the aydes which Iehosaphat brought to Ahab did not shew that he was a Prince of extraordinary power, so the Moabites and Ammonites which hee feared could neuer make the one halfe of those numbers, which hee that commaunded least among Iehosaphats leaders had vnder him.

This mightie Prince notwithstanding his greatnes, yet hee ioyned in friendship with Ahab King of Israel, who had married that wicked woman Iezabel. Him Iehosaphat visited at Samarita, and caused his sonne Ioram to marrie Atalia, this Iehosaphats daughter.

Ahab perswaded Iosaphat to assist him in the warre against the Syrians, who held the Citie of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together foure hundred of his Prophets, or Baltes, to foretell the successe : who promised him victorie. But Iehosaphat beleued nothing at all in those diuiners, but resolu'd first of all to conferre with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Hereupon Ahab made answer that hee had one called Michaiab, but hee hated that Prophet, because hee alwaies foretolde of euill, and neuer of any good towards him. Yet sent for Michaiab was to the King, but by the way the messenger praied him to consent with the rest of the Prophets : and to promise victorie vnto them as they did. But Michaiab spake the truth, and repeated his vision to both Kings, which was that God asked who should perfwade Ahab that hee may goe up and fall at Ramoth Gilead to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that hee would enter into his prophets, and bee in them a false spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ : Non enim vos estis qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris vestri loquitur in vobis. It is not you that speake, but the spirit of your father speakes in you : so in a contrarie kinde did the deuill in the prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Ahab to his destruction. And as P. Martin vpon this place well obserueth, these euill spirits are the ministers of Gods vengeance, and are used as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime employ. For as it pleareth God by his good Angels, to saue and deliuer from destruction of which the Scriptures haue many examples : so on the contrary, it is by the euill that hee punisheth and destroyeth, both which are said to performe the wil of their Creator, sicet non eodem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembereth a second sort of malignant naturals, but they are euery-where visible. There are spirits, faith hee, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on sure fireskes. In the time of destruction they shew forth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michaias hauing by this his reuelation greatly displeased the King, and the Prophets whose spirit hee discerned, was firooken by Zedekiah one of Baals prophets, and by Ahab himselfe committed to prison : where he appointed him to be reuered and fed with bread of affliction till hee returned in peace. But Michaias, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou returne in peace the Lord hath not spoken by me. Nevertheless Ahab went on in that warre, and was wounded to death. Iehosaphat returned to Ierusalem, where hee was reprehended by Iehu the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God.

After this the Avanites or Damascenes, ioyned with the Moabites, Ammonites and Idumeans to invade Iudaea : who passe Jordan, and encampe at Engaddi, and when Iehosaphat gathered his armie, the Prophet Iahaziel foretolde him of the victorie, which should bee obtained without any blood-shed of his part : and so when Iehosaphat approached, this assembly of nations, the Ammonites and Moabites, disagreeing with the Idumeans, and quarrelling for some causes among themselves : those of Ammon and Moab set vpon the Idumeans, and brake them vtterly, which done they also inuaded each other ; in which broile Iehosaphat arriving rooke the spoile of them all without any losse of his part, as it was foretold and promised by God. Notwithstanding this victorie, Iehosaphat forgetting that hee was formerly reprehended for assisting an Idolatrous King, did notwithstanding ioynne with Ochazias, the sonne of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophir, hoping of the like returne which Salomon had : but as Eliээр the Prophet foretold him, his shippes perished and were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and so that enterprize was ouerthrowne.

Yet hee taketh part with Iehoram the brother of Ochazias, against the Moabites, with which Kings of Iuda and Israel the Edomites ioynne their forces, not forgetting, it seemes, that the Moabites, assisted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed their armie.

The Moabites, subiects to David and Salomon, forsaking the Kings of Iuda, gaue themselves for vassals to Ierobeam, and so they continued to his successors till the death of Ahab : but Iosaphat, notwithstanding the Idolatrie of his Colleague, yet as it seemeth, he was drawne into this warre both to bee auenged of the Moabites for their defection from Iuda to Israel, as also because they had lately ioyned themselves with the Syrians against Iosaphat and thirdly to punish their double rebellion who first forsooke Iuda and now Israel.

Both Kings resolu'd to passe by the way of Ierusalem, thereby the better to assure that nation, for wee finde that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the field together at Engaddi against Iehosaphat : But whether they had then declared themselves against Iehosaphat, it is not certaine, for in the 2. of Chronid. 11. vers. 8. it is written that in the time of Iehoram, the sonne of Iosaphat, Edom rebelled, and therefore it seemeth to mee that the Edomites, when they were slaine by Moab and Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such conditions as they required, offered to turne from them, and to ioynne themselves with the armie of Iuda. For that they were numbered among the enemies of Iosaphat it is plaine in the 2. of Chron. the 25. and as plaine e. 2. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Iehosaphats death. Now in the passage of these Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the yeere, or whether the Idumeans hauing a purpose to rebell, mislead the armie of Iuda and Israel with intent to inkeble them for want of water, trus it is, that they suffered the same, if not a greater thirst than the armies of Crispius and M. Antiochus did in their Parthian expeditions ; and had, in all likelihood, vtterly perished, had not Elisba taught them to cut trenches whereinto the water sprang, by which not only Iehosaphat and his armie, but

Iehoram King of Israel an Idolator was relieved: the great mercie and goodnesse of God, hauing euer beene prone to faue the euill for the good, whereas hee neuer destroyed the good for the euill.

The miserable issue of this warre, and how Maab burnt his sonne, or the sonne of the King of Edom, for sacrifice on the rampire of his owne Citie, I haue already written in the life of Iehoram among the Kings of Israel. Iehosaphat reigned twentie five yeeres and died, he was buried in the valley of Iehosaphat, and a part of the Tyrans set ouer his graue is yet to be seene, saith Brochard. His acts are written at large by Iehu the sonne of Manai.

There liued with Iehosaphat, Ophraeues in Assyria, Capetus and Tiberinus Kings 10 of the Abians in Italie; of the latter the riuer Tiber (formerly Albula) tooke name.

In Iehosaphats time also ruled Metades or Mezades in Athens: Agellus or Ageflaus in Corinth; and Archilaus of the same race, of the Heraclide the seauenth in Lacedaemon. Badesorus ruled the Tyrans; Asbab, Ochazias and Iehoram the Israelites.

CHAP. XX.

Of IEHORAM the sonne of IEHOSAPHAT, and AHAZIA.

§. I.

That IEHORAM was made King sundry times.

IEHORAM the sonne of Iehosaphat King of Juda began to reigne at thirtie two yeeres of age, and liued vntill hee was fourtie yeeres olde, being eight yeeres a King: but of these eight yeeres, which Iehoram is said to haue reigned, foure are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Asbab, left this Iehoram King in his stead, as Asbab did his sonne Ahazias. This appeares by the feruall beginnings, which are giuen in Scripture to the two Iehorams Kings 40 of Israel and Juda, and to Ahazias the eldest sonne of Asbab. For Ahazias is said to haue begonne his reigne, in the seauenteenth yere of Iehosaphat, Iehoram the brother of Ahazias succeeded him in the second yere of IEHORAM the sonne of IEHOSAPHAT King of Juda, that is in the next yere after that Iehoram of Juda was digned king by his father; it being (as wee finde elswhere) the eighteenth yere of IEHOSAPHAT himselfe, who went with the Israelite against Asbab. Hereby it appeares that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained still by Iehosaphat, who gouerned absolutely by himselfe, not communicating the rule with his sonne. But in the fift yere of IEHORAM King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Iehosaphat, the olde king tooke vnto him, as partner in the Government, this his eldest sonne, who was at that time thirtie two yeeres olde, his father being fiftie seauen. Now forasmuch as IEHOSAPHAT reigned twentie five yeeres, it is euident that his sonne did not reigne alone till the eighth of Ioram King of Israel. The like regard is to be had and 9.2 *Kin. 8. 16.*1 Kin. 22. 42.

had in accounting the times of other Kings of Juda and Israel, who did not alwayes reigne precisely so long as the bare letter of the text may seeme at first to affirme: but their yeeres were sometimes compleat, sometimes onely current, sometimes confounded with the yeeres of their successors or foregoers, and mult therefore be found by comparing their times with the yeeres of those others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing lesse needfull than curious, to enquire into the reasons mouing Iehosaphat either to affume vnto him his sonne as partner in the Kingdome, whilst hee was able himselfe to commaund both in peace 10 and in warre, the like hauing neuer beene done by any of his progenitors, or hauing once in the seauenteenth of his reigne) vouchsafed vnto him that honour, to resume it vnto himselfe, or at least-wise to deferre the confirmation of it, vntill fower or fife yeeres were passed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may bee a meane to finde some light, whereby wee may more clearly discouer the causes of much extraordinary businesse ensuing, I hold it not amisse to make such coniecture, as the circumstances of the Storie briefly handled in the Scriptures may seeme to approve.

Wee are therefore to consider, that this King Iehosaphat was the first of Iehorams issue that euer entred into any straight league with the Kings of the tenne Tribes. All that reigned in Juda before him, had with much labour and long warre, tired themselves in vaine, making small profite of the greatest advantages that could bee wished. Wherefore Iehosaphat thought it the wisest way, to make a league offensive and defensive betwene Israel and Juda, whereby each might enioy their owne in quiet.

This confederacie made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true roote and fountaine of all wisdom: yet as a peece of sound pollicie, doubtlesse it wanted not faire pretences of much common good thereby likely to arise, with mutuall fortification of both those 30 kingdomes, against the vncircumcised nations their ancient enemies. This apparent benefit, being so inestimable a iewel that it might not easily bee lost, but continue as hereditarie from father to sonne; it was thought a very good counsell to haue it confirmed by some sure bond of affinitie, and thereupon was Athalia the daughter of Omri and sister of Asbab King of Israel, giuen in marriage to Iehoram, who was sonne and heire apparant to the King of Juda. This Ladie was of a masculine spirit, and had learned so much of Queene Iezabel her brothers wife, that shee durst vndertake, and could thoroughly performe a great deale more in Ierusalem, than the other knew how to compass in Samaria. Shee was indeede a fire-brand, ordained by God to consume a great part of the noblest houses in Juda, 40 and perhaps of those men or their children, whose worldly wisdom, regardless of Gods pleasure, had brought her in.

The first fruits of this great league, was the Syrian warre at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Juda and Israel did aduenture equally. But the profite of the victorie should haue redounded wholly to Asbab: as godly Princes verie seldom shurue by matching with Idolators, but rather serue the turnes of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himselfe, cannot be well affected to his seruants. Before their setting forth Asbab digned, as King, his sonne Ahazias; not so much perhaps in regard of the vncertaine euent of warre (for none of his predecessors had euer done the like vpon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Nichias 50 (for he despised them) as inuited Iehosaphat by his owne example, to take the same course, wherein he preuailed.

§. II.

Probable conjectures of the motives inducing the old King IEROM-SAPHAT to change his purpose often, in making his sonne IEROMAM King.

MANIE arguments doe verie strongly prone Iehoram to haue beene wholly ouer-ruled by his wife especially for his forsaking the religion of his godly auncellors, and following the abominable superstitions of the house of Abah.

That he was a woman of intolerable pride, and abhorring to liue a priuate life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vaine matter shee was able to produce, whereby to make her husband thinke that his brethren and kindred were but meane and vnworthy persons in comparison of him, and of his children, which were begotten vpon the daughter and sister of two great Kings, not vpon base women and meere subiects. The Court of Abah, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad, were matter sufficient to make an insolent man thinke highly of himselfe, as being allied so honorably; who could otherwise haue found in his heart well enough, to despise all his brethren, as being the eldest, and heire apparent to the Crowne, whereof already hee had, in a 20 manner, the possession.

How soone his vices brake out, or how long hee dissembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be knowne. Like enough it is, that some smoke, out of the hidden fire, did vey soone make his fathers eyes to water; who thereupon caused the young man to know himselfe better, by making him fall backe into ranke among his younger brethren. And surely the doings of Iehosaphat about the same time, argue no small distemper of the whole country, through the misgovernment of his vngodly sonne. For the good old King was faine to make his progress round about the land, reclaiming the people vnto the seruice of God, and appointing Iudges throughout all the strong Cities of Iuda Citty by Citty. This had bin 30 a needlesse labour, if the religion taught and strongly maintained by Asa, and by himselfe, had not suffered alteration, and the course of Iustice beene peruered, by the power of such as had borne authoritie. But the necessitie that then was of reformation, appears by the charge which the King did giue to the Iudges; and by his commission giuen to one of the priettes in spirituall causes, and to the steward of his house in temporall matters, to be generall ouerscers.

This was not till after the death of Abazia the sonne of Abah; but how long after it is vncertaine. For Iehoram the brother of Abazia beganne his reigne (as hath beene already noted) in the eighteenth of Iehosaphat, which was then accounted the second of Iehoram, Iehosaphats sonne, though afterward this Iehoram of Iuda had another first and second yeere, euen in his fathers time, before hee reigned alone, as the best Chronologers and expositors of the holy text agree. So hee continued in priuate estate, vntill the two and twentieth of his fathers reigne, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignitie are not set downe, yet wee may not thinke, that motives thereto, appearing substantiall, were wanting. Iehoram of Israel held the same correspondencie with Iehosaphat that his father had done; and made vse of it. Hee drew the Iuda into the warre of Abah, at which time it might well bee, that the young Prince of Iuda was againe ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition hee had beene. Or if wee ought rather to thinke, that the preparations for the enterprise against Abah did not occupie so much time, as from the eighteenth of Iehosaphat, in which yeere that nation rebelled against Israel, vnto his two and twentieth; yet the daily negotiations betweene the two Kings of Iuda and Israel, and the affinitie betweene them contracted in the person of Iehoram, might might offer some good occasions thereunto. Neither is it certaine how the behauiour of the younger sonnes, in their elder brothers disgrace, might cause their Father to put him in possession, for feare of tumult after his death; or the deepe dissimulation, of Iehoram himselfe, might winne the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing vsuall in mischieuous fell natures, to be as abiect and scruile in time of adueritie, as insolent and bloody vpon aduantage. This is manifest, that being repossessed of his former estate, he demeaned himselfe in such wise towards his brethren as caused their father to enable them, not only with store of silver, and of gold, and of pretious things, (which kind of liberallitie other Kings 2. Chron. 21. 10 doublelesse had vnto their younger sonnes) but with the custodie of strong Cities in Iuda, to assure them, if it might haue beene, by vnwonted means, against vnwonted perills.

§. III.

The doings of IEROMAM when he resigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Ithra.

BUT all this prouidence auailed nothing; for an higher prouidence had otherwise determined of the sequelle. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the younger sonnes of Iehosaphat found strong Cities, a weake defence, against the power of him, to whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in vpon the summons of the King their brother, then had hee them without more adoe; if they stood vpon their guard, then were they Traitors, and so vnable to hold out against him, who besides his owne power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish Kingdome against them, so that the apparent likelihood of their final ouerthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoeuer it was, they were all taken and slaine, and with them for companie many great men of the Land; such belike, as 30 either had taken their part, when the Tyrant fought their liues, or had beene appointed Rulers of the Countrey, when Iehoram was deposed from his Government, in which Office they, without forbearing to doe iustice, could hardly auoide the doing of many things, derogatorie to their yong Master, which if he would now call treason, saying that he was then King, who durst say the contrarie?

After this, Iehoram tooke vpon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innovations in religion; wherein he was not contented as other Idolatrous Princes, to giue way and safe conduct vnto superstition and idolatrie, nor to prouoke and encourage the people to that sinne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were so much addicted, hauing such knowledge of God, and of his detesting that aboute all other 40 sinnes; but he vsed compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registered, to haue set vp irreligion by force.

Whilest hee was thus busied at home, in doing what hee listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and hauing thider to, since Dauids time, beene gouerned by a Viceroy, did now make vnto themselves a King. Against these Iehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots, with which hee obtained victorie in the field, compelling the rebels to flie into their places of aduantage, whereof hee forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that hee had gotten in beating and killing some of those, whom he should haue subdued, and kept his seruants. Now beganne the prophesie 50 of Isaie to take effect, wherein he fore-told, that Elihu in proceesse of time should breake the yoke of Israhel. For after this the Edomites could neuer be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Iuda, but held their owne so well, that when, after many ciuill and forraigne warres, the Iewes by sundrie Nations had beene brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his Sonne, and others of that race following them, became came Lords of the Jewes, in the decrepitage of Isracl, and raigned as Kings, euen in Ierusalem it selfe.

The first comede of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Isabna, a great Citie within Iudia, which in the time of Isaia had a peculiar King, to rebell against Iehorab, and set it selfe at libertie. Isabna stood in the confines or Bemanim and of Dan, farre from the alliance of any bordering enemies to Iuda, and therefore so vnlikely it was to haue maintained it selfe in libertie, that it may seeme strange how it could escape from vtter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to haue beene taken, by their powerful, cruell, and thoroughly incensed Lord. The Israélite held such good intelligence at that time with Iuda, that he would not haue accepted the Towne, had it offered it selfe vnto him: neither doe we read that it fought how to cast it selfe into a new subiection, but continued a free estate. The rebellion of it against Iehorab, was, Because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to haue not only bene the first and remote cause, but euen the next and immediate reason, mouing the inhabitants to doe as they did: For it was a Towne of the Leuites: who must needs be driuen into great extremities, when a religion contrarie to Gods law, had not only some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsiue authoritie to force vnto it all that were vnwilling. As for the vse of the Temple at Ierusalem (which being deuout men they might feare to loose by this rebellion) it was neuer denied to those of the ten reuolted Tribes by any of the religious Kings, who rather invited the Israélites thither, and gaue them kinde entertainment: vnder Idolaters they must haue bene without it whether they liued free or in subiection. Yet it seemes that priuate reasons were not wanting, which might moue them rather to doe than to suffer that which was vnwarrantable. For in the generall visitation before remembred, wherein Iehosaphat reformed his Kingdome, the good old King appointing new Gouvernours, and giuing them especiall charge to doe iustice without respect of persons, vsed these words: The Leuites shall be Officers before you, Be of good courage and doe it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phralses, it seemes, that he encouraged them against the more powerful, than iust proceedings of his sonne; whom if the Leuites did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect, in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be euen with them, and makethem now to feele, as many Princes of the Land had done, his heauie indignation. How it happened that Isabna was not hereupon destroyed, yea that it was not (for ought that wee can read) so much as belied or molested, may iustly seeme very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mightie Armies which Iehosaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to haue ouerwhelmed any one Towne, and buried it vnder the earth, which they might in one moneth haue cast into it with shouells, by ordinarie approaches.

But it seemes that of these great numbers which his father could haue leui'd, 40 there were not many whom Iehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps he thought it an eulier losse, to let one Towne goe, than to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happinesse to be feared, than to be lou'd; are faine themselves to stand in feare of those, by whom they might haue bene dreadfull vnto others.

ϕ. I I I I.

Of the miseries falling upon IEHORAM, and of his death.

T Hese afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the mind of the wicked Prince: a prophetic in writing was deliuered vnto him, which threatned both his people, his children, his wiues, and his owne body. Herby likewise it appears that hee was a cruell Persecutor of Gods seruants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his Predecessors, both good and euill Kings, but were faine to denounce Gods iudgements against him by letters, keeping them close and farre from him. This Epistle is said to haue beene sent vnto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus prophesied in his stead before this time, even in the daies of Iehosaphat. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this prophetic in writing behinde him, or that (as some coniecture) the error of one letter in writing, was the occasion that we were reade Elias for Elizeus. Indeede any thing may rather be belceued that the Tradition held by some of the Iewish Rabbins, that Elias from heauen did send this Epistle, a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, deuiled by Erasmus, or of the Verbe that was sent from heauen to S<sup>t</sup>. Giles.

But whoſoeuer was the Author of this threatening Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophesie was as terrible, as the sentence. For the Philistims and Arabians brake into Iuda, and tooke the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wives, all which they flew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistims had not presumed since the time of Dauid, to make any offensiue warre till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Townes, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small Territories, by defensive armes, to which they were constrained at Gibbethen by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to haue bene then as they are now, a naked people, all horfemen, and ill appointed; their Countrie affording no other furniture, than such as might make them fitter to robbe and spoile in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities such as were thick set in Iuda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then knowne, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very flately Cities. But it must be considered; that this was when they had learned of the Romanes the art of Warre; and that the provisions which they found, together with the arts which they learned, in one subdued Province, did make them able and skillfull in pursuing their conquest, and going onward in to Regions far removed from them. At this day having lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as liue in Arabia (else are good horsemen, but ill appointed, very dangerous to passengers, but vnable to deale with good Souldiers, as riding stark naked, and rather trusting in the swiftnesse of their horses, than in any other means of resistance, where they are well opposed.
And such, or little better, may they seeme to haue bene, that spoiled Iuda in the time of Iehoram. For their Countrie was alwaies baraine and desert, wanting manu-all force whereby to supply the naturall wealth furniture: neither are thes bands named as chiefe in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may inferre, that one halfe, yea or one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Iuda and Beniamin under Iehaphath (wherein were inrolled three hundred and eightie thousand fighting men) had bene enough to haue driuen away farre greater forces than these enemies are likely to haue brought into the field, had not the people bene vnable to deale with them, for lacke of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes ielousie, as in Sauls time by the policie of the Philistims.

It may seeme that the house of the King which these invaders tooke, was not his

his Palace in Ierusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Countrey, where his wines and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we read not that they did sacke the Citie, or spoile the Temple, which would haue inuited them as a more commodious bootie, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they tooke Ierusalem it selfe by surpris, the people being disarmed, and the Kings guardes too weake to keepe them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous; and therefore hauing done what spoile they could, with-drew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to conuiege away.

The slaughter committed by Iehu vpon the two and fortie brethren of Achazias, or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his brothers Sonnes, and the cruell massacre wherein all the Royall seede perished (only Ieas excepted) vnder the tyrannie of Athalia, following within two yeares after this inuasion of the Philistines, and Arabians, make it seeme probable, that the sonnes of Iehoram were not all slaine at once, but that rather the first murder beganne in his owne time, and was seconded by many other heauie blowes, wherewith his house was incessantly stricken, vntill it was in a manner quite hewed downe.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the body of this wicked King, smiting him with a grievous discale in his bowels, which left him not vntill his guts fell out, and his wretched soule departed from his miserable carcase. The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death; wherefore he was denied a place of buriall among his Ancestors the Kings of Iuda, though his owne sonne succeeded him in the Kingdome, who was guided by the same spirits that had bene his Fathers euill Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous entering of a dead husband. Shee was thinking how to prouide for the future, to maintaine her owne greatnesse, to retaine her fauourites in their authority, and to place about her Sonne such Counsellors, of the house of Ahab, as were fittest for her turne. Wherefore shee thought it vnseasonable to make much ado about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eies, with a stately funeral of a man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things passed be laid vpon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her selfe, and hers, which it now did concerne her to auoid. Such is the qualitie of wicked infligators, hauing made greedie vse of bad imploiments, to charge not only with his owne vices, but with their faults also, the man whose euill inclinations their sinister counsailes haue made worse, when once he is gone and can profit them no longer. The death of Iehoram fell out indeede in a busie time; when his friend and coine the Israhelite, who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramites; and therefore could haue had no better leisure to helpe Athalia in setting of things according to her owne minde, than he had (perhaps through the same hindrance) to helpe her husband, when he was distressed by the Philistines. Yea rather he needed and craved the assistance of the men of Iuda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, whither they had not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly runne thither againe, vnlesse they were very fauorably intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I haue thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as farre as the circumstances remembered in holy Scripture, would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appeare, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the revealed will of God, accomplish neuertheless his hidden purpose, and without miraculous means, confound themselves in the seeming-wisde deuises of their owne folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learne, to submit their iudgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to thinke, that they may safely dispense with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisdom dictateth vnto them. For in such kinde of vnhappy subtilties, it is manifest that

Athalia was able to turnish both her Husband and her Sonne, but the issue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appeare, in that which immediately followeth.

§. V.

Of the reigne of AHAZIAS, and his businesse with the King of Israel.

ACHAZIAS, or Athalia, the sonne of Iehoram and Athalia, beganne his reigne ouer Iuda in the twelfth yeare of Iehoram, the sonne of Ahab King of Israel, and reigned but that one yeare. Touching his age, it is a point of more difficultie than importance to know it; yet hath it bred much disputation, wherof I see no more probable conclusion, than that of Tornelius, alleaging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome. Anna Domini 1588. which saith that he was twentie yeares old in the beginning of his Kingdome, and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that giue him two yeares more. Like enough he is to haue bene yong: for hee was gouerned by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gaue him counsaile by which hee perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his Fathers courses. In matter of State, he likewise vp-held the league made with the house of Ahab. Hee was much busied in doing little, and that with ill successe. He accompanied his Cousen the Israhelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wanne, but not without blowes: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was faine to aduenture his owne person, which escaped not vnwounded. The Towne being wonne was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to bee made by Hazael King of Aram: which done, Iehoram King of Israel with-drew himselfe to the Citie of Ierusalem, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his woundes; and Athalia returned to Ierusalem. It seemes that hee was but newly come home (for hee reigned in all scanty one yeare, wherof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken vp a great part) when he made a new journey, as it were for good manners sake, to vilit the King of Israel, who lay sore of his woundes. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would haue hindered, and therefore sought euery occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vaine peece of worke so to leaue his Kingdome, hauing no other businesse than by way of complement to goe see one whom he had seene yesterday. Certaine it is that the Lord had resolu'd at this time to put in execution that heauie iudgement, which hee had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet, vpon the house of Ahab. And hereunto at this time had hee disposed not only the concurrence of all other things, which in manies might seeme to haue bene accidentally; but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing lesse than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtlesse was one; whose mischieuous purposes it will shortly be needfull for explanation of some difficulties arising, that wee diligently consider and examine.

§. VI.

How AHAZIAS perished with the house of AHAB: and how that Familie was destroyed by IEHU.

THE whole Armie of Israel, with all the principall Captaines lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elihu the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were sitting together, who calling out from among them Iehu, a principall man, tooke him apart, and anointed him King ouer Israel, rehearsing vnto him the prophetic of Elias against the house of Ahab.

Asah, and letting him vnderstand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The falshood of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captaines a desire to know his errand, which Iehu thought meete to let them know, as doubting whether they had ouer-heard all the talke or no. When hee had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forth-with proclaimed him King. For the propheticie of Eliab was well knowne among them, neither durst any one oppose himselfe against him, that was by God ordained to performe it.

Iehu who had vpon the suddaine this great honour throwne vpon him, was not slow to put himselfe in possession of it, but vsed the first heate of their affections who ioynd with him, in setting on foot the buisnesse which nearely concerned him, and was not to be fore-slowed, being no more his owne than Gods.

The first care taken was that no newes of the reuolt might bee carried to Iezabel, where by the King might haue had warning either to fight or flee: this being fore-seene hee marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Iehoram was now so well recovered of his wounds, that hee could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seemes that there was much feasting, and ioy made, especially by Queene Iezabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Abasias comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queene, as to visit the King.

Certaine it is, that since the rebellion of Asah against Israel, the house of Asah did neuer so much flourish as at this time. Seuentie Princes of the blood Royall there were that lued in Samarra; Iehoram the sonne of Queene Iezabel had wome Ramsab Gilead, which his father had attempted in vaine, with losse of his life; and he wonne it by valiant fight, wherein hee receiued wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitie was so great betweene Israel and Juda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leauing no hope of successe, to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the propheticie of Eliab might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembered, than as an vnlikely tale, by them that beheld the majesticall face of the Court, wherein so great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his blood expected.

In the midit of this securitie, whilst these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosecution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Asah, Edom, and other rebells and enemies; or else were triumphing in ioy of that which was already well achieued and the Queene Mother dressing her selfe in the brauest manner to come downe amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discovered a companie comming. These newes were not very troublesome: for the Armie that lay in Ramsab Gilead, to bee readie against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be discharged vpon some notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not stirre. Only the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Iehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to giue the King as little warning as might bee. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the King to bee satisfied, sent out another, that should bring him word how all went; and he was likewise detained by Iehu. These dumbe throwes bred some suspicion in Iehoram, whome the watchmen certified of all that happened. And now the companie drew so neare that they might, though not perfectly, be discerned, and notice taken of Iehu himselfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loath to discover any weakness, caused his Chariot to bee made readie, and issued forth with Abasias King of Juda in his companie, whose presence added majestie to his traine, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee had become more needfull. This could not be done so hastily, but that Iehu was come cunten to the Townes end, and there they met each other in the field field of Naboth. Iehoram beganne to salute Iehu with termes of peace, but receiving a bitter answer, his heart failed him, so that crying out vpon the treason to his fellow King, he turned away to haue fled. But Iehu soone ouer-tooke him with an arrow, where-with he strooke him dead, and threw his carcase into that field, which, purchased with the blood of the rightfull owner, was to be watered with blood of the vniust possessor. Neither did Abasias escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize vpon him.

The Kings Palace was ioyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Iezabel might soone be aduertised of this calamitie, if liue did not with her owne eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose iudgement pronounced against her long before, had ouer-taken her, when she least expected it. But shee, full of indignation, and proud thoughts, made her selfe readie in all hast, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious looks to daunt the Traitor, or at the least to vtter some Apophegme, that should expresse her braue spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for euer. Little did shee thinke vpon the hungrie dogges, that were ordained to deuour her, whose paunches the stibum, with which shee besmeared her eyes, would more offend, than the scolding language where-with shee armed her tongue, could trouble the eares of him that had her in his power. As Iehu drew neare hee opened her window, and looking out vpon him, beganne to put him in minde of Zimri, that had not long ioyed the fruits of his treason, and murder of the King his Master. This was in mere humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeede a part of miserable folly, as are all things, how soeuer laudable, if they haue an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her owne Eunucher that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much lesse was her enemy daunted with her proud spirit. When Iehu saw that shee did vse the little remainder of her life in seeking to vex him; hee made her presently to vnderstand her owne estate, by deedes and not by wordes. He only called to her seruants to know which of them would be of his side, and soone found them readie to offer their seruice, before the very face of their proud Ladie. Hereupon he commanded them to cast her downe head-long: which immediately they performed without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein shee had a few houres before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that considered not the iudgements of God that had been denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude handes of her owne seruants, at the commandment of her greatest enemy, that was yesterday her subiect, but now her Lord: and shee perished miserably struggling in vaine with base groomes, who contumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilst her insulting enemy sate on horse-back, adding indignitie to her griefe by scornfully beholding the shameful manner of her fall, and trampling her bodie vnder foote. Her dead carcase that was left without the walls was deuoured by dogges, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatrie, murder, and oppression, with flow, but sure paiment, and full interest.

Abasias King of Juda fleeing a pace from Iehu, was ouer-taken by the way where he lurked; and receiuing his deadly wound in the Kingdome of Samarra, was suffred to get him gone (which he did in all hast) and seeke his buriall in his owne kingdome: and this fauour hee obtained for his grand-fathers sake, not for his fathers, nor his owne. He died at Magiddo, and was thence carried to Ierusalem, where he was entered with his Ancestors, hauing reigned about one yeare.

CHAP. XXI.

Of ATHALIA, and whose Sonne he was that succeeded unto her.

§. I.

Of ATHALIA her usurping the Kingdome, and what pretences shee might forge.

AFTER the death of Abasia, it is said that his house was not able to retain the Kingdome: which note, and the proceedings of Athalia vpon the death of her Sonne, haue giuen occasion to diuers opinions concerning the Pedegree of Ious, who reigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoiled of her Sonne, vnder whose name shee had ruled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold vpon all the Princes of the blood, and slew them, that so shee might occupie the Royall Throne her selfe, and raigne as Queene, rather than liue a Subiect. Shee had before hand put into great place, and made Counsaillours vnto her sonne, such as were fittest for her purpose, and ready at all times to execute her will: that shee kept a strong guard about her it is very likely; and as likely it is that the great execution done by Iehoram, vpon the Princes, and many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearfull to stirre, whatsoeuer they saw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent soeuer it be, is seldome or neuer so shamelesse as to refuse the commoditie of goodly pretences offering themselves; but rather scrapes together all that will any way serue to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not absurd for vs to thinke, that Athalia when shee saw the Princes of the Royall blood, all of them in a manner, slaine by her husband, and afterwards his owne children destroyed by the Philistines, beganne euen then to play her owne game, reducing by artificiall practise, into faire likelihoods, those possibilities where-with her husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great show of reason, either by her owne mouth, or by some trustie creature of hers, might shee giue him to vnderstand, how needfull it were to take the best order whilest as yet he might, for feare of the worst that might happen. If the issue of Dauid, which now remaine only in his Familie, should by any accident faile (as wofull experience had already shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Iuda were not vnlikely to choose a King of some new stock, a popular seditious man peradventure, one that to countenance his owne vnworthinesse, would not care what aspersions hee laid vpon that Royall house, which was fallen downe. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contriue the destruction of him, and all his seede? Wherefore it were the wisest way to deigne by his authoritie, not only his Successour, but also the reuerfioner, and so to provide, that the Crowne might neuer bee subiect to any risings, but remaine in the disposition of them that loued him best, if the worst that might be feared comming to passe, his owne posteritie could not retaine it.

Such perswasions being vrged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate solicitation of her that gouerned his affections, were able to make the ialous Tyrant thinke thinke that the only way to frustrate all deuises of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heire the last and yongest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queene-Mother, to vp-hold the first and eldest.

If Athalia tooke no such course as this in her husbands times, yet might shee doe it in her Sonnes. For Abasia (besides that he was wholly ruled by his Mother) was not likely to take much care for the securitie of his halfe-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wiues, in respect of his owne high borne-Mother, little better than Concubines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischievous woman forgate her selfe so farre in her wicked policie, that shee lost all opportunitie which the weakenesse of her husband and sonne did afford, of procuring to her selfe some seeming Title; yet could shee afterwards haue some such matter, as boldly shee might: being sure that none would aske to see her euidence, for feare of being sent to learne the certaintie of her sonne or husband in another world. But I rather thinke that shee tooke order for her affaires before hand. For though shee had no reason to suspect or feare the suddaine death of her sonne, yet it was the wisest way to prouide betimes against all that might happen, whilest her husbands issue by other women was yong and vnable to reit. We plainly find that the Bretheren or Nephewes of Abasia, to the number of two and fortie, were sent to the Court of Israel, only to salute the children of the King, and the children of the Queene. The slender occasion of which long journey, considered together with the qualitie of these persons (being in effect all the stocke of Iehoram that could be growne to any strength) makes it very suspicious that their entertainment in Jezebels house would only haue bene more formal, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Iehu. Hee that looks into the courses held both before and after by these two Queenes, will finde cause enough to thinke no lesse. Of such as haue aspired vnto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust our the right Heires by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validitie than the sword of such as claimed by them: could giue, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentifull examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing whereof one may say, behold this is new? it hath bettere disced in the old time that was before vs. That a King might shed his brothers blood, was proued by Salomon vpon Adonia; that he might aliene the Crowne from his naturall Heires, Dauid had giuen proofe: but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practise, as more willingly shewing what they may doe, than acknowledging why Salomon slew his brother that had begunne one rebellion, and was entering into another. Iehoram slew all his bretheren, which were better than he: Dauid purchased the Kingdome, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed; if Iehoram, who had lost much and gotten nothing, thought that he might aliene the remainder at his pleasure; or if Abasia sought to cut off the succession of his bretheren, or of their issue: either of these was to be answered with the wordes which Iehoiada the Priest vsed afterwards, in declaring the title of IOASH. Behold the Kings sonne must raigne; as the Lord hath said of the sonnes of DAVID. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, whatsoeuer it might bee, to the Crowne of Iuda; yet is it most certaine that shee had thereunto no right at all, but only got it by treacherie, murder, and open violence; and so shee held it sixe whole yeares, and a part of the seuenth, in good seeming securitie.

§. II.

How IERU spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest ATHALIA.

IN all this time Ieru did neuer goe about to disturber; which in reason hee was likeli to desire, being an enemy to her whole House. But he was occupied at the first in establishing himselfe, rooting out the posteritie of Abah, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in warres against the Ammites, wherein he was so farre overcharged, that hardly hee could retaine his owne, much lesse attempt vpon others. Of the line of Abah there were seauentie liuing in Samaria, out of which number Ieru by letter aduised the Citizens to set vp some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident hee was, which they well vnderstood to proceede from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they tooke example by the two Kings whom he had slaine, and being exceedingly afraide of him, they offered him their seruice, wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in lesse than one daies warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were inioyned by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, slaying a great sacrifice to their God; by which means he drew them altogether into one Temple, where he slew them; and in the same zeale to God vtterly demolished all the monuments of that impietie.

Concerning the Idolatrie deuided by Ieroboam, no King of Israel had euer greater reason than Ieru to destroy it. For he needed not feare least the people should be allured vnto the house of Dauida; it was (in appearance) quite rooted vp, and the Crowne of Iuda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: he had receiued his kingdom by the vnexpected grace of God; and further, in regard of his zeale exprest in destroying Baal, out of Israel, he was promised, notwithstanding his following the sinne of Ieroboam, that the Kingdom should remaine in his familie, to the fourth generation. But all this would not serue; hee would needes helpe to peece out Gods providence with his owne circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greedie gamester, who by stealing a needlesse Card to assure himselfe of winning a stake, forfeits his whole rest. He had questionlesse displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more hee should offend by taking from them the vse of a superstition, so long practiced as was that Idolatrie of Ieroboam. Yet all these, how many foueuer they were, had neuer once thought vpon making him King, if God, whom, to retaine them, hee now forsooke, had not giuen him the Crowne, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the means of holding it.

This ingratitude of Ieru drew terrible vengeance of God vpon Israel, whereof Hazael King of Damascus was the Executioner. The crueltye of this barbarous Prince we may finde in the prophetic of Ehzeas, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shalt thou set on fire, and their young men shalt thou slay with the sword, and shalt dash their infants against the stones, and rent in peeces their women with child. So did not only the wickednesse of Abah cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatrie of the people bring a lamentable miserie vpon all the Land. For the furie of *Hazael*s victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few Townes, nor wearied with one inuasion; but he smote them in all the coasts of Israel, and wasted all the Countrie beyond the Riuer of Iordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities it seemes that the people repented not of their Idolatrie; For in those daies the Lord beganne to smite Israel, but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble House of Abah, vnder which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had brauely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities ries which his Father had wonne: whereas now they were faine to make wofull shifts, liuing vnder a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his Master that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruell enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can finde all manner of difficulties in seruing him, to whom nothing is difficult, are in stead of the ease and pleasure to themselves propounded by contrarie courses, owerwhelmed with the troubles which they sought to auoide, and therein by God whom they first forsooke, forsaken, and left vnto the wretched labours of their owne blinde widdome, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

§. III.

Of ATHALIAHS Governement.

THese calamities falling vpon Israel, kept Athalia safe on that side, giuing her leisure to looke to things at home; as hauing little to doe abroad, vlesse it were so that shee held some correspondence with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her husbands grand-father King Aza, who had done the like. And some probability that shee did so may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For wee finde that this wicked ATHALIA and her children brake up the house of God, and all things that were dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow vpon BAALIM. Such a sacriledge, though it proceeded from a desire to let out her owne Idolatrie, with such pompe as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some faire pretext of necessitie of the State for requiring: in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successor was faine to doe the like, being therunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the tale of that which was formerly thence extracted for his sake.

Vnder this impious government of Athalia, the denotion of the Priests and Leuites was very notable, and serued (no doubt) very much to retaine the people in the religion taught by God himselfe, how foueuer the Queenes proceedings aduanced the contrarie. For the pouertie of that sacred Tribe of Leui, must needes haue been exceeding great at this time; all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being vtterly lost, the oblations and other perquisites, by which they liued, being now very few, and small; and the store laid vp in better times vnder godly Kings, being all taken away by shamefull robbrie. Yet they vp-held in all this miserie the seruice of God, and the daily sacrifice, keeping duly their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no lesse than in those daies wherein their entertainment was farre better.

§. IIII.

IERODABA then occupied the high Priest-hood, an honourable, wise and religious man. To his carefulnesse it may be ascribed, that the estate of the Church was in some slender sort vp-held in those vnhappy times. His wife was Iehosababeth, who was daughter of King Iehoram, and sister to Ahaziah, a godlie Ladie and vertuous, whose pietie makes it seeme that Athalia was not her Mother, though her access to the Court argue the contrarie: but her discreet carriage might more easily procure her welcome to her owne Fathers house, than the education vnder such a Mother could haue permitted her to be such as shee was. By her care IOAS the young Prince that raigned some after, was conueighed out of the nourserie, when Athalia destroyed all the Kings children, children, and was carried secretly into the Temple, where as secretly hee was brought vp. How it came to passe that this yong child was not hunted out, when his bodie was missing, nor any great reckoning (for ought that we finde) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine: for it was not good in policie, that the people should heare say, that one of the children had auoided that cruell blow; it might haue made them hearken after innovations, and so bee the lesse conformable to the present gouernment. So Iosb was deliuered out of that slaughter, hee and his Nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peraduenture to bee cast away, as hauing no other guard than a poore woman that gaue him suck, who foolishly doubting that shee her selfe should haue bene slaine, was fled away with him into some desolate places, where it was like enough that shee and hee should perish. In such cases flatterers, or men desirous of reward, easily coine such tales, and rather sweare them to bee true in their owne knowledge, than they will loose the thanks due to their ioyfull tidings.

§. V.
W<sup>h</sup>ose Sonne IOAS WAS.

†. I.
Whether IOAS may be thought likely to haue bene the Sonne of AHAZIA.

NOW concerning this Iosb, whose sonne he was, it is a thing of much difficultie to asseme, and hath caused much controuersie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the sonne of AHAZIA, seeme plaine enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might giue that title of Sonne vnto him, in regard that he was his Successor, I neither by my selfe can finde, nor can by any helpe of Authors learne how to answer the difficultie, appearing in the contrarie opinions of them, that thinke him to haue bene, or not, the naturall Sonne of AHAZIA. For whereas it is said, that the house of AHAZIA was not able to retaine the Kingdome; some doe inferre that this Iosb was not properly called his Sonne, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as a sonne in the inheritance of his Father. And herunto the murder committed by Atalia, doth very well agree. For the perceiving that the Kingdome was to fall into their hands, in whom shee had no interest, might easily finde cause to feare, that the tyrannic exercised by her husband, at her instigation vpon so many noble Houses, would now bee reuenged vpon her selfe. The ruine of her Idolatrous religion might in this case terrifie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedie of Iezabel teaching her what might happen to an other Queene. All this had little concerned her, if her owne grand-child had bene heire to the Crowne; for shee that had power enough to make her selfe Queene, could with more ease, and lesse enuie, haue taken vpon her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie shee might haue done her pleasure, and bene the more both obaied by others, and secure of her owne estate, as not wanting an Heire. Wherefore it was not needfull, that shee should be so vnnaturall, as to destroy the child of her owne sonne, of whose life shee might haue made greater vse, than hee could of his death: whereas indeede, the loue of grand-mothers to their Nephewes, is little lesse than that of Mothers to their children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seeme incredible, that all naturall affection should be cast aside, when as neither necessitie vrgeth, nor any commoditie thereby gotten requirith it, yea when all humane policie doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would haue perswaded.

†. II.

That IOAS did not descend from NATHAN.

BUT (as it is more easie to finde a difficultie in that which is related, than to shew how it might haue otherwise bene) the pedigree of this Iosb is, by them which thinke him not the sonne of AHAZIA, set downe in such sort that it may verie easily be suspected. They say that he descended from Nathan the sonne of Dauid, and not from Salomon; to which purpose they bring a Historie (I know not whence) of two families of the race of Dauid, saying that the line of Salomon held the kingdom with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the family of Nathan should succeed it. Concerning this Nathan the son of Dauid there are that would haue him to bee Nathan the Prophet, who as they thinke, was by Dauid adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustine sometime was, but afterward hee reuoked it, as was meet for this Nathan is reckoned among the sons of Dauid, by Bathshua the daughter of Ammiel, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregorie Nazianzen (as I finde him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him, Erasmus, and Faber Stapulensis, haue likewise held the same of Iosb, deriuing him from Nathan. But Nathan, and those other brethren of Salomon by the same mother, are thought, vpon good likelihoods, to haue bene the children of Yria the Hittite; and so are they accounted by sundrie of the fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulenfis, who follow the Hebrew expositors of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himselfe the only begotten of his mother, doe approue this exposition: for wee read of no more than two sons which Bathshua or Bathsheba did beare vnto Dauid, whereof the one, begotten in adulterie, died an infant, and Salomon only of her children by the king did liue. So that the rest must needs haue bin the children of Yria, and are thought to haue bene *Dauid*s onely by adoption. Wherefore, if Iosb had not bene the sonne of AHAZIA, then must that pedigree haue bene false, wherein S. Matthew deriueth him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our blessed Sauour issued from the loins of Dauid, according to the flesh, but had onely bene of his line by courtisie of the Nation, and forme of Law, as any other might haue bene. As for the authoritie of Philo, which hath drawne many late writers into the opinion that Iosb was not of the posteritie of Salomon, it is enough to say that this was Frisar Aunius his Philo: for no other edition of Philo hath anie such matter; but Aunius can make authors to speake what he list.

†. III.

That IOAS may probably be thought to haue bene the sonne of IEHORAM.

IN so doubtfull a case, if it seeme lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought vpon, me thinks it were not amisse to laie open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickednesse of Iehoram the sonne of Iehoshaphat King of Iuda, for which hee and his children perished, rehearteth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of Dauid, that according to his promise he would giue him a light, and to his children for ever: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same IEHORAM, there was not a sonne left him save IOASH as the youngest of his sonnes. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promise to Dauid, that, after those massacres of Iehoram, vpon all his brethren, and of the Philistines and Arabians vpon the children of Iehoram, one of the seed of Dauid escaped; why may it not be thought that he was said to haue escaped, in whom the line of Dauid was preferred? for had all the race of Salomon bene rooted vp in these wofull Tragedies, and the progenie of Nathan succeeded in place thereof; like enough it is that some remembrance more particular would haue bene extant, of an euent so so memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeed apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord; as it is recounted by S. Luke. but the preservation of the house of David, mentioned in the bookes of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Iehoshas in whom the roiall branch of Salomon, the naturall, and not only legall issue remaining of David, was kept aliue. Wherefore it may bee thought that this Iosab, who followed Athalia in the Kingdome, was the yongest sonne of Iehoram, whose life Athalia, as a stepdame, was not vnlikely to pursue. For it were not easilly vnderstood, why the preservation of Dauids line, by Gods especiall mercie in regard of his promise made, should pertaine rather to that time, when besides Athalia himselfe there were two and thortie of his brethren, or (as in another place they are called) sonnes of his brethren remaining aliue, which afterwards were all slaine by Iehu; than haue reference to the lamentable destruction and little lesse than extirpation of that progenie, wherein one onely did escape. Certainly that inhumane murder which Iehoram committed vpon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Historie) reuenged vpon his owne children; then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philistims and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwards prosecuted by Iehu, and finally tooke effect by the hands of that same wicked woman, at whose instigation hee had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heauie iudgement laid vpon Iehoram and all his children, onely Iehoshas his youngest sonne was exempted; whom therefore if I should ascribe to be the same with Iosab, which is called the sonne of Athalia, I should not want good probability. Some further appearance of necessity there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwise haue bene. For it was the youngest sonne of Iehoram in whom the race was preserved; which could not in any likelihood be Athalia, seeing that hee was twentie yeeres old at the least (as is already noted) when he began to reigne, and consequently, was borne in the eighth or twentieth yeere of his fathers age. Now, I know not whether of the two is more vnlikely, either that Iehoram should haue begotten many children before he was eightene yeeres old, or that hauing (as hee had) many wiues and children, he should vpon the suddaine, at his eighteenth yeere, become vnfruitfull, and beget no more in twentie yeeres following: each of which must haue bene true, if this were true that Athalia was the same Iehoshas, which was his youngest sonne. But this inconuenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the causelesse crueltie of Athalia, in seeking the life of Iosab, are easilly cleared, if Iosab and Iehoshas were one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion. For he was seuen yeeres old when he began to reigne; which if wee vnderstand of yeeres complet, hee might haue bene a yeere old at the death of Iehoram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his sickness. Neither is it more absurde to say that hee was the naturall sonne of Iehoram, though called the sonne of Athalia, than it were to say, as great authors haue done, this difficult notwithstanding, that hee was of the posteritie of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answer; which, had it concurred with the rest, might haue serued as the very foundation of this opinion. The name of Iehoshas, that soundeth much more neere to Iosab, than to Athalia, in an English care, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilful in that language) through the diueritie of certaine letters, differ much from that which it moit resembleth in our westerne manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be so that Athalia himselfe be also called Azaria, and must haue had three names, if hee were the same with Iehoshas; in which manner Iosab might also haue had severall names; yet because I finde no other warrant hereof than a bare possibility, I will not presume to build an opinion vpon the weake foundation of mine owne coniecture, but leaue all to the consideration of such as haue more abilitie to iudge, and leisure to consider of this point.

† IIII.

† IIII.

Vpon what reasons ATHALIA might seeke to destroy IO SAB, if he were her owne grandchilde

If therefore we shall follow that which is commonly receiued, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be said that Athalia was not onely blinded by the passions of ambition and zeale to her idolatrous worshipp of Baalim, but pursued the accomplishment of some naturall desires, in seeking the destruction of her grandchilde, and the rest of the blood royall. For whether it were so that Athalia (as proud and cruell women are not alwaies chafly) had imitated the libertie of Iezabel her sister in law, whose whoredomes were vbraided by Iehu to her sonne; or whether she had children by some former husband, before shee was married vnto Iehoram (which is not vnlikely in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and sister to Ahab) certaine it is that shee had sonnes of her owne, and those old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondered at, that to settle the Crowne vpon her owne children, shee did seeke to cut off, by wicked policie, all other claimes. As for Iosab, if she were his grandmother, yet she might mistrust the interest which his mother would haue in him, least when he came to yeeres, it might withdraw him from her deuotion. And hereof (besides that women doe commonly better loue their daughters husbands, than their sonnes wiues) there is some appearance in the reigne of her sonne: for the made him spend all his time in idle iournies, to no other apparent end, than that the might rule at home; and hee liuing abroad, be estranged from his wife, and entertaine some new fancies, wherein Iezabel had cunning enough to be his tutresse. But when the sword of Iehu had rudely cut in sunder all these fine deuises, then was Athalia taine to goe roundly to worke, and doe as shee did, whereby she thought to make all sure. Otherwise, if (as I could rather thinke) she were onely stepdame to Iosab, wee neede not seeke into the reasons mouing her to take away his life; her owne hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

A digression, wherein is maintained the libertie of vsing coniecture in Histories.

Hv smuch concerning the person of Iosab, from whom, as from a new roote, the tree of David was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this Historie, and the diueritie betweene it and others, the lesse, me thinks, I neede to suspect mine owne presumption, as deserting blame, for curiositie in matter of doubt, or boldnesse in libertie of coniecture. For all Histories doe giue vs information of humane counsailes and euents, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can afford; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speake onely at random, and many times falsly. This we often finde in prophane writers, who ascribe the ill successe of great vndertakings to the neglect of some impious rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vchemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the lesse wonder, if we consider the answer made by the Iewes in Egypt vnto Ieremie the Prophet reprehending their idolatrie. For, howsoeuer the written Law of God was knowne vnto the people, and his punishments laid vpon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and euen then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent vnto their owne wils, that they would not by any meanes be drawne to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worshipe the Queen of Heaven, as they and their

their fathers, their Kings and their Princes had vsed to do; For then (said they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no euill: adding that all manner of miserie were befallen them, since they left off the seruice of that Queene of Heaue. So blinde is the wisdom of man, in looking into the counsaile of God, which to finde out there is no better nor other guide than his owne written will not peruerced by vaine additions.

S. Phil. Sid. in his
trie.

But this Historie of the Kings of Israel and Iudah hath herein a singular prerogative aboue all that haue bene written by the most sufficient of meerly humane authours: it setteth downe expressely the true, and first causes of all that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahab to his ouerforwardnesse in battaile; the ruine of his familie, to the securitie of Ierobam in Iezreel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel, by the comming of Iehu; but referring all all vnto the will of God, I meane, to his reuealed will: from which that his hidden purposes doe not varie, this storie, by many great examples, giues most notable prooffe. True it is that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these bookes nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman Sir Philip Sidney, that Historians doe borrow of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but some what of their substance. Informations are often false, records not alwaies true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discouer the passions, which did set them first on foote. Wherefore they are faine (I speake of the best, and in that which is allowed: for to take out of Luie euery one circumstance of Claudius his iourney against Asorubal in Italie, sitting all to another businesse, or any practise of that kinde, is neither Historically nor Poetically) to search in to the particular humours of Princes, and of those which haue gouerned their affections, or the instruments by which they wrought, from whence they doe collect the most likely motives, or impediments of euery businesse, and so figuring, as nere to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they iudiciously consider the defects in counsaile, or obliquitie in proceeding.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to giue assurance, howsoeuer it may giue satisfaction. For the heart of man is vnsearchable: and Princes, howsoeuer their intents be seldom hidden from some of those many eyes which pricke both in to them, and into such as liue about them; yet sometimes either by their owne close temper, or by some subtil miste, they concale the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lie dead, and buried in obliuion, when the preparations which they begate, are conuerted to another vs. The indolence of an Historian, hauing so many things to weare it, may well be excused, when finding apparent cause enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions worke to the same end, that one small matter in a weak minde is more effectuall, than many that seeme farre greater. So 40 comes it many times to passe that great fires, which consume whole houses or Townes, begin with a few straws, that are wasted or not seene; when the flame is discouered, hauing fastned vpon some wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionlesse it is that the warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greekes, proceeded from desire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire: howsoeuer the enterprize of the Athenians vpon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrell: yet Herodotus telleth vs, that the wanton desire of Queene Atossa, to haue the Grecian dames her bondwomen, did first moue Darius to prepare for this warre before he had receiued any iniurie; and when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enioy what was already gotten.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more iustly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for alladging the vaine appetite, and secret speech of the Queene in bed with her husband, as the cause of those great euils following; this I may boldly affirme, (hauing I think, in euery estate some sufficient witnesses) that matter matter of much consequence, founded in all seeming vpon substantiall reasons, haue issued indeed from such petty trifles, as no Historian would either thinke vpon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certaine Friar, comming to visite him in his Popedom, as hauing long before in his meane estate, bene his familiar friend. T his poore Friar, being emboldened by the Pope to vs his old libertie of speech, aduentured to tell him, that he verie much wondered how it was possible for his holinesse, whom he rather tooke for a direct honest man, than any cunning politician, to attaine vnto the Papacie; in compassing of which, 10 all the subtiltie (said he) of the most craftie braines, finde worke enough: and therefore the more I thinke vpon the arte of the conclave, and your vnappetite thereto, the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plain dealing Friar, dealt with him againe as plainly, saying, Hadst thou liued abroad as I haue done, and seene by what folly this world is gouerned, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred vnto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is moued; the Pope said true. For the wisest of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutuall toleration, worke more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needs or can. But if we liue vp our thoughts to that supreme gouernour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was 20 said of Iupiter.

Ventosum, & arbes, regnaque tristia Diuosque, mortalesque turbas, Imperio regit vnus equo.*

Who rules the duller earth, the wind-swolne fireames,
The ciuill Cities, and th' infernall realmes,
Who th' host of heauen and the mortall band,
Alone doth gouerne by his iust commaund.

Then shall we finde the quite contrarie. In him there is no vncertaintie nor change; he foreseeth all things, and all things discouseth to his owne honour; Hee neither deceiueth nor can be deceiued, but continuing one and the same for euer, doth constantly gouerne all creatures by that law, which hee hath prescribed and will neuer alter. The vanities of men beguile their vaine contriuers, and the profperitie of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea, this broad and headlong passage to hell, is not so delightful as it seemeth at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poisons which infect the soule, many cruell thornes 40 deeply wounding the bodie, all which, if any few escape, they haue onely this miserable aduantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the seruice of God is the path guiding vs to perfect happinesse, and hath in it a true, though not compleat felicitie, yeelding such abundance of ioy to the conscience, as doth easilie counteruaile all afflictions whatsoeuer: though indeed those brambles that sometimes teare the skinne of such as walke in this blessed way, doe commonly laie hold vpon them at such time as they sit downe to take their ease, and make them with themselves at their iournies end, in presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serue, in whose presence is the fulnesse of ioy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for euermore.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all Historie, to teach by example of times past, such wisdom as may guide our desires and actions, wee should not meruaile though the Chronicles of the Kings of Inda and Israel, being written by men inspired with the spirit of God, instruct vs chiefly, in that which is most requisite for vs to know, as the meanes to attaine vnto true felicitie, both here, and hereafter, pro-

pounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The fawe of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) bene written by some Prophet after the captiuitie: wee may well beleuee that the counsaile of God therein, and the execution of his righteous will, should haue occupied either the whole, or the principall roome in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his wife, and the businesse at Sardes, with other occurrences, bene the lesse true, though they might haue bene omitted, as the lesse materiall: but these things it had bene lawfull for any man to gather out of prophane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein he should not haue done iniurie to the sacred writings, as long as hee had forborne to derogate to from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the businesse that I haue now in hand: wherein I cannot beleuee that any man of iudgement will taxe mee as either fabulous or presumptuous. For he doth not faile, that recheafeth probabilities as bare coniectures; neither doth he depraue the text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things, which authoritie alone, without further circumstance, ought to haue confirmed in euery mans belief. And this may suffice in defence of the libertie, which I haue vsed in coniectures, and may hereafter vsd when occasion shall require, as neither vnlawfull, nor misbecoming an Historian.

§. VII.

The conspiracie against ATHALIA.

WHEN Athalia had now fixe yeeres and longer worne the Crowne of Iuda, and had found neither any forraine enemy, nor domesticall aduersarie to disturbe her possession, suddainly the period of her glorie, and reward of her wickednesse meeting together, tooke her away without any warning, by a violent and shamefull death. For the growth of the young Prince began to be such, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had bene very visiting that his education should be simple, to make him seeme the childe of some poore man (as for his safetie it was requisite,) when his capacite required to haue bene inducted with the stomach and qualities meete for a King. All this Iehoiada the Priest considered, and with all the great increase of impietie, which taking deepe roote in the Court, was likely to spreade it selfe ouer all the Countrey, if care were not vsed to weede it vp very speedily. Wherefore hee associated vnto himselfe fise of the Captaines, in whose fidelitie he had best assurance, and hauing taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings sonne, hee made a Couenant with them, to aduance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of 40 the principall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first onely, that they should repaire to Ierusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perswasions to win them to the businesse: the promise of the Lord vnto the house of Dauid was enough to assure them, that the action was both lawfull and likeli to succeed as they desired.

But in compassing their intent some difficulties appeared. For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issue; neither were the Captaines, and other associates of Iehoiada able by close working, to draw together so many trustie and seruicable hands as would suffice to manage the businesse. To helpe in this case, the Priest gaue order to such of the Leuites, as had finished their courses in waiting on the Diuine seruice at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that succeeded in their turnes, that they should not depart vntill they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new commers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noise, made vp such a number, as would be able able to deal with the Queenes ordinarie Guard, and that was enough, for it the tyrannesse did not preuaile against them at the first brunt, the fauour of the People was like to shew it selfe on their side, who made head against her. These Leuites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captaines, and other adherents were bestowed in the vtter Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it selfe had store enough; King Dauid had left an Armorie to the place, which was now employed in defence of his issue.

All things being in a readinesse, and the day come wherein this high designe was to be put in execution; Iehoiada deliuered vnto the Captaines, Armour for them and their adherents; appointed a guard vnto the Kings person; produced him openly, and gaue vnto him the Crowne; vsing all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings the Queene was the last that heard any word; which is not so strange as it may seeme: for insolent natures, by dealing outrageously with such as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly loose the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilst yet it may be prevented, and haue no information of danger, till their owne eyes, amazed with the suddennesse, behold it in the shape of inevitable mischiefe.

All Ierusalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. 20 Some carried home the newes, others ranne forth to see, and the common joy was so great, that without apprehension of perill, vnder the windowes of the Court; were the people running and praising the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the extraordinary concourse, and noise, of folkes in the streets, making towards the Temple, with much vnusuall passion in their looks, did presently conceiue, that somewhat worthie of her care was happened; though what it might be shee did not apprehend. Howsoeuer it were, shee meant to vie her owne wisdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may be, that shee thought it some especiall solemnitie vsed in the Diuine seruice, which caused this much adoe; and heretofore the vnaccustomed number of Leuites, and 30 of other deuout men, about the towne, might giue some presumption.

Many things argue that shee little thought vpon her owne Tragedie; although Iosephus would make it seeme otherwise. For we finde in the Text, Shee came to the people into the house of the Lord (which was neare to her Palace) and that when shee looked and saw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was, with the Princes, or great men of the Land by him, and the Trumpeters proclaiming him, shee rent her clothes, and cried Treason, Treason. Hereby it appears that shee was quietly going, without any mistrust or feare, to take her place, which when shee found occupied by another, then shee began to afflict her selfe, as one cast away, and cried out in vaine vpon the Treason, whereby these saw that shee must perish. But that shee 40 came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Iosephus reporteth) and that her companie being beaten back, shee entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the young Tyrant, I finde no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible. For had shee truly knowne how things went, shee would surely haue gathered her friends about her, and vsed those forces in defence of her Crowne, by which shee gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly if it were granted, that shee, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troupe, yet it had bene meere madnesse in her, to enter the place alone, when her assistants were kept out; but if shee perceiving that neither her authoritie, nor their owne weapons, could preuaile to let in her guard, would neuertheless take vpon her to command the death of the new 50 King, calling a child of seven yeares old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom shee saw to be armed in his defence, may wee not thinke that shee was mad in the most extreme degree? Certaine it is that the counsaile of God would haue taken effect, in her destruction, had shee vsed the most likely meanes to disappoint it: yet wee neede not so cut her throat with any morall impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zeale of Iehoiada found more easie successe, through her indiscretion, than otherwise could haue beene expected; so that at his appointment shee was without more adoe carried out of the Temple and slaine, yea so, that no blood saue her owne was shed in that quarrell; her small traine, that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

§. VIII.

Most like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashnesse of her Nephew Iehoram the Israelite, who did foolishly call himselfe into the very throat of danger, gaping vpon him, only through his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant; yet theee her selfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and hauing liued such a life as Iezabel had done, was rewarded with a futable death. These two Queenes were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her husband; was an Idolatresse, and a Murtheresse. The only difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Iezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them suruiuing her husband about eight yeares, did spend the time in satisfying her owne affections; the one vling tyrannie, as the exercise of her haughtie minde; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her vnchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seeme in this world to pertaine vnto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the suddaine by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming vpon the Treason, receiued sentence from the mouth of one that had liued vnder her subjection; in execution whereof, Iezabel was trampled vnder the feet of her enemies horses; Athalia slaine at her owne horse-gate; the death of Athalia hauing (though not much) the more leiscure to vex her proud heart; that of Iezabel, the more indiginitie, and shame of body. Touching their buriall, Iezabel was deuoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatened by the Prophet Eliase; what became of Athalia wee doe not finde. Like enough it is, that shee was buried, as hauing not persecuted and slaine the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument; for shee was a Church-robber. The seruice of Basl erected by these two Queenes, was destroyed as soone as they were gone, and their Chaplaines, the Priests of that Religion, slaine. Herein also it came to passe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who sue them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazeel the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seemes to haue beene her good friend) pretended her reuenge, as any part of his quarrell to Iuda. Concerning children, all belonging to Iezabel perished in few daies after her; whether Athalia left any behinde her, it is vncertaine; shee had sonnes liuing after shee was Queene, of whom, or of any other, that they were slaine with her, wee doe not finde.

This is a matter not vnworthie of consideration, in regard of much that may depend vpon it. For if the children of Athalia had bene in Ierusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely haue followed hers as nearely, and bene registered, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Basl. That Law by which God forbade that the children should die for the fathers, could not haue saued these vngenerous Impes, whom the clause following would haue cut off, which commands, that euery man shall die for his owne sinne. Seeing therefore that they had bene professors & aduancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Basl, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Basl with the spoile of it; likely it is that they should nor haue escaped with life, if Iehoiada the Priest could haue gotten ten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cause enough requiring their death, so the securitie of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craued as much, and that very earnestly. For these had bene elected as heires of their mothers Crowne, and being reckoned as her assistants in that particular buisnesse of frowning the Temple, may be thought to haue carried a great way in other matters as Princes and fellows with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is euident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazeel in his warres against Iehu) absent from Ierusalem; whereby Iehoiada might with the more confidence, aduerture to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate.

By the death of Athalia, the whole Countrie of Iuda was ruled with great ioy and quietnesse; wherein Ioas as a child of seven yeares old or thereabout, began his Raigne, which continued almost fortie yeares. During his minoritie, hee liued vnder the protection of that Honourable man Iehoiada the Priest, who did as faithfully gouerne the Kingdome, as hee had before carefully preferred the Kings life, and restored him vnto the Throne of his auncceltors. When hee came to mans estate, hee tooke by appointment of Iehoiada two wives, and begat sonnes and daughters, repairing the family of Dauid which was a'molt worne out. The first A&T that hee tooke in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needfull peece of worke, in regard of the decay wherein that Holy place was fallen, through the wickednesse of vngodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should vphold the Temple, whome the Temple had vpheld. This buisnesse he followed with so earnest a zeale, that not only the Leuites were more slacke then hee, but even Iehoiada was faine to be quickened by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the worke, partly out of the taxe imposed by Moses, partly out of the liberalitie of the people: who gaue so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of Gold and Silver, and with all other Vntensiles. The sacrifices likewise were offered, as vnder godly Kings they had bene, and the seruice of God was magnificently celebrated.

§. II.

The death of Iehoiada, and Apostasie of IOAS.

BVt this endured no longer than the life of Iehoiada the Priest: who having lived an hundred and thirtie yeares, died before his Countrey could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Iuda, as he well deserved, having preferred the race of them, and reformed the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting vp themselves, and all their issue. Yet his honourable Funerall seemes to have beene given to him, at the motion of the people, it being said, They buried him in the Citie of DAVID. As for the King himselfe, who did owe to him no lesse than his Crowne and life, he is not likely to have beene Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if hee had thereby beene discharged of some heauie debt.

For after the death of Iehoiada, when the Princes of Iuda beganne to flatter their King, he soone forgate, not onely the benefites, received by this worthie man his old Councellour, but also the good precepts which he had receiued from him, yea and God himselfe, the author of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, wherewith Iehoram and Athalia had so infected the Countrey, in fifteene or sixteene yeares, that thirtie yeares, or there about, of the Raigne of IOAS, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to cleare it from that mischief. The King himselfe, when once hee was entred into these courses, ranne on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his libertie, to despise the seruice of God; and a manifest proofe of his being now King indeede, that hee regarded no longer the fowre admonitions of deuout Priests. Hereby it appeares, that his former zeale was onely counterfeited, wherein like an actor vpon the stage, he had striven to expresse much more liuely affection, than they could shew, that were indeed religious.

§. III.

The causes and time of the Syrians invading Iuda in the dayes of IOAS.

BVt God, from whome he was broken loose, gaue him ouer into the hands of men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, hauing taken Gath, a Towne of the Philistims, addrest himselfe towards Ierusalem, whether the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich bootie, did inuite him. He had an Armie heartned by many victories, to hope for more, and for ground of the warre (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough, that the Kings of Iuda had assisted the Israelites, in their enterprises vpon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I thinke he did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdome of Iuda had molested the Aramites, in the time of his predecessour, this was thoroughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Israel, and leaving the ten Tribes in their extreme miserie, to the furie of Hazael himselfe. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should haue gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and stirre vp against himselfe a powerfull enemy, before hee had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay betwene Ierusalem and his owne Kingdome, if some opportunity had not promised such easie and good successe, as might rather aduance, than any way disturbe, his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sonnes of Abiath, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men) to expound their Countreys usually doe) to draw many partakers to their owne side; and not to remaine, as IOAS did, a neutral in the warre betwene him and Israel, but to ioine all their forces with his, as they had caule, for the rooting out of IOAS his posteritie, who, like a bloudie Traitor, had vterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, euen the whole house of Abiath, to which he was a subiect. It thus were so, Hazael had the more apparant reason to inuade the Kingdome of Iuda. Howsoever it were, we find it plainly, that IOAS was afraid of him, and therefore tooke all the hideweed things, and all the Gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his owne house, with which present hee redeemed his peace: the Syrians (questionlesse) thinking it a better bargain, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the assurance of this, for the possibilitie of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich bootie of unhappie treasure, which, belonging to the living God, remained a small while in the possession of this mightie, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the graue. For in the thirtie seuenth of IOAS, which was the fifteenth of Iehoshaphat, he made this purchase; but in the same or the very next yeare he died, leaving all that he had vnto his Sonne Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered none other wise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazael is, by some, confounded with that warre of the Aramites vpon Iuda, mentioned in the second Booke of Chronicles. But the reasons alleged by them that hold the contrarie opinion, doe forcibly prooue, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without bloodshed or fight, in the later, IOAS tried the fortune of a battaile, wherein being put to the worst, hee lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life. In the one, Hazael himselfe was present; in the other, he was not named: but contrariwise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seeme to haue then bene the Sonne of Hazael) is said to haue bene at Demoisius. The first Armie came to conquer, and was so great that it terrified the King of Iuda; The second was a small company of men, which did animate IOAS in vain, for God was against him) to deale with them, as haue a very great Armie.

Now concerning the time of this former inuasion, I cannot perceiue that God forsooke him, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeede some, very learned, who thinke that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Iehoiada the Priest, because that storie is ioyned vnto the restauration of the Temple. This had bene probable, if the death of Iehoiada had bene afterwards mentioned in that place of the second Booke of Kings, or if the Apotaisie of IOAS, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeede to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his owne will and pleasure, neither was he more vnuit in the afflictions of IOAS that righteous man, or the death of Iehoiada that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid vpon Pharaoh, or his iudgments vpon the house of Abiath. But it appeares plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent seruice of God therewithall, which are ioyned together, were vsed in the house of the Lord continually, all the dayes of IOAS, soone after whose death, if not immediately vpon this, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the six, or thirtie seuenth yeare of this IOAS his Raigne, the King falling away from the God of his Father, became a foule Idolater.

And indeede we commonly obstruse, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay vpon his seruants, without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, haue alwayes tended vnto the bettering of their good. In which respect, euen the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of His Saints being precious in the sight of Psalm. 115. vs. the Lord) are to their great aduantage. But with euill and rebellious men, God keepeth a more euill, and more strict account, permitting vially their faultes to get the start of their punishment, and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickednesse be full; or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to runne on in their wicked courses, to their greater miserie. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appeares that he dealt with IOAS. For this unhappie man did not onely continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetfull of God and all goodnesse, as if he had frouen to exceede the wickednesse of all that went before him, and to leaue such auilainous patterne vnto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should indure to imitate.

§. IIII.

How Zacharia was murdered by Ios.

SVndry Prophets hauing laboured in vaine to reclaim the people from their superstitiō, Zacharia, the sonne of Iehoida the Priest, was stirred vp at length by the Spirit of God to admonish them of their wickedness, and make them vnderstand the punishment due vnto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so honourable, and sonne to a man so exceeding beloued in his life time, and reuerenced, that if Ios had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemy, yet ought he in common honour, to haue cloaked his ill affection, and haue vsed at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had borne vnto the King, and the vnrecountable benefits, which they had done vnto him, from his first infancie, were such, as should haue placed Zacharia in the most heartie and assured loue of Ios, yea though he had bene otherwise a man of very small make, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should bee heard with reuerence, how simple soeuer he appears that brings it. But this king Ios, hauing already scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deale with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandman in that parable of our Saviour dealt with the heire of the Vineyard, who said, this is the heire, come let vs kill him, that the Inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commaunder, supposing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as any one durst tell him the plaine truth, how great soeuer that mans deserting were, that did so, yea though Gods commaundement required it. So they conspired against this Holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any forme of open law, as was practised vpon Naboth, or whether surprising him by any close treacherie, I doe neither reade nor can conjecture. The dignitie of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracie, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publique judgement; though the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, by order of Law, inflicted vpon malefactours, may argue the contrarie. Most likely it is, that the Kings commaundement, by which he suffered, tooke place in stead of Law: which exercise of meere power (as hath bene already noted) was nothing strange among the Kings of Iuda.

§. V.

How Ios was shamefully beaten by the Ammites, and of his death.

THis odious murder, committed by an vnthankfull snake vpon the man in whose bosome he had bene fostered, as of it selfe alone it sufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hatefull to men of his owne time, and his memorie detested in all ages; so had it the well-deserued curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompanie it vnto the throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell downe swiftly, and heavily vpon the head of that vngratefull monster. It wasthe last yeare of his raigne; the end of his time comming then vpon him, when he thought himselfe beginning to liue how he list, without controulement. When that yeare was expired, the Ammites came into the Countrey, rather as may seeme to get pillage, than to performe any great action

tion; for they came with a small companie of men: but God had intended to doe more by them, than they themselues did hope for.

That Ios naturally was a coward, his bloudie malice against his best friend, is, in my judgement, prooue sufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hazeael, when hee might haue leauied (as his sonne after him did mutter) three hundred thousand cholen men for the warre, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needes be valiant and make his people know, how stout of disposition their King was, when he might haue his owne will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of rouer, he tooke a verie great Armie, so that wife-men might well perceiue, that he knew what he did, making them as if he would fight for his Countrey, and expose his person to danger of warre, when as indeed all was meere ostentation, and no perill to be feared; he going forth so strongly appointed, against so weak enemies. Thus might wife-men thinke, and laugh at him in secret, considering what adoe he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisdome of this world is foolishnesse, did laugh, not only at this vaine glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Ammites and King Ios met, whether it were by some folly of the leaders, or by some amazement happening among the Souldiers, or by whatsoever meanes it pleased God to worke, so it was, that that great Armie of Iuda receiued a notable ouerthrow, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Iuda, at whose perswasion the King had become a rebell to the King of Kings. As for Ios himselfe (as Abimelefis and others expound the storie) hee was sorely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they thinke) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an excessive ranfome.

And surely all circumstances doe greatly strengthen this conjecture. For the text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised vpon Ios ignominious judgments; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their handes, and handled him illaouerely. Now at that time, Ios the Son of Iehoiachin reigned ouer Israel, and Bombadad the Son of Hazeael ouer the Syrians in Damascus; the one a valiant vnder-taking Prince, raised vp by God to restore the State of his miserable Countrey; the other inferior euery way to his father, of whose purchases he lost a great part, for want of skill to keepe it. The difference in condition found betwene these two Princes, promising no other euent than such as after followed, might haue giuen to the King of Iuda good cause to bee bold, and plucke vp his spirits, which Hazeael had beaten downe, if God had not bene against him. But his fearfull heart being likely to quake vpon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with some shew of warre at his doores, it were ealie to make him craue any tolerable conditions of peace. The vnexpected good success hereof, already related, and the (perhaps as unexpected) ill success, which the Ammites found in their following warres against the King of Israel, sheweth plainly the weaknesse of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almighty. For by his ordinance, both the kingdome of Iuda, after more than fortie yeares time of gathering strength, was vnable to driue out a small companie of enemies; and the Kingdome of Israel, hauing so bene troden downe by Hazeael, that onely fiftie horsemen, tenne Char-riots, and tenne thousand footmen were left, prevailed against his Sonne, and re-couered all from the victorious Ammites. But examples herof are euerie where found, and therefore I will not insit vpon this; though indeed we should not, if we be Gods children, thinke it more tedious to heare long and frequent report of our Heavenly fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore fathers vpon earth.

When the Ammites had what they list, and saw that they were not able, being

ing to few, to take any possession of the Countrey, they departed out of Inda laden with spoyle, which they sent to Lamasus, themselves belike falling vpon the ten Tribes, where it is to bee thought that they sped not halfe so wel. The King of Inda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the Ionnes of an Ammonite, and of a Mabon, whom some (because onely their Mothers names being strangers, are expressed) thinke to haue bene bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or feare, cast (as Tyrants vse) hee should reuenge his disaster vpon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoeuer else it were that animated them to murder their Kings; the Scripture tells vs plainly, that, for the blood of the children of Israhel, this befell him. And the same appears to haue bene 10 vsed as the pretence of their conspiracy, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Ammon, the sonne and successe of Israhel, durst not punish them, till his Kingdome was established: but contrariwise, his bodie was judged vnworthie of buriall in the Sepulchers of the Kings: whereby it appears, that the death of Zecharia caused the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompensed by his Sonne, vpon the Traytours, with wel-deserued death.

§. VI.

Of the Princes living in the time of Ioas: Of the time when Carthage was built; and of Dido.

Here liued with Ioas, Mezades and Diogenes in Athens: Enclemus and Arifomeles in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Syluius, and after him Syluius Alaudius, were Kings of the Calidon in Italie. Verax, commonly called Ancyndax, the thirthe seuenth King succeeding vnto Ophrantes, began his reigne ouer the Assyrians, about the eighteenth yeare of Ioas, which lasted fortie two yeares. In the sixteenth of Ioas, Cephones, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded vnto Cheops in the Kingdome of Egypt, and held it fiftie yeares.

In this time of Ioas, was likewise the Raigne of Pigmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of Carthage by Dido; the building of which Citie is, by diuers Authors, placed in diuers ages, some reporting it to be leuentie yeares yonger than Rome, others about foure hundred yeares elder, few or none of them giuing any reason of their assertions, but leauing vs vncertaine whom to follow: Iosephus, who had read the Annales of Tyre, counting one hundred fortie and three yeares and eight Moneths from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth yeare of Hiram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the leuenth of Pigmalion. The particulars of this account (which is not rare in Iosephus) are very perplexed, and serue not well to make cleare the totall summe. But whether it were so that Iosephus did omit, or else that he did miswrite, some number of the yeares, which he reckoned in Fractions, as they were diuided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hiram to Pigmalion; we may well enough beleuee, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose Bookes hee giues vs the whole summe, had good meanes to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, betweene two workes no longer following one the other, than in the memorie of three or foure generations might easily reach. This hundred fortie and foure yeares current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleuenth yeare of Ioas, was a hundred fortie and three yeares before the birth of Ioas Rome and after the destruction of Tyre, two hundred eightie and nine: a time so long after the death of Aeneas, that we might truly conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Antonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigramme.

Aulon, Ep. 117.

*Ille ego sum Dido vultu quam conficiis hospes, Arimulata modis pulchraq; mirificis.
Talis eram, sed non Maro quam mihi finxit erat mens, Vita nec inceptis leta cupisibus (Namq; nec Aeneas vidit me Troian vngquam Nec Libyam aduenit, elapsibus illacis.
Sed iustus fugiens, atq; arma prociacis larbe,
Seruui, iaceor, morte pudicitiam;
Pectore transisco, castos quod pertulit enses)
Non suor, aut lesa crudus amore dolor.
Sic cecidisse tuat: vixi sine vulnere sama,
Vita virum, positis membris oppeti.
Inuidetur in me stimulaſti Musa Maronem, Fingeret ut nostraſta damna pudicitia?
Vos magis historici lectores credite de me
Quam qui furta Deum concubitusq; canunt.
Falsidici vates: temerant qui carmine verum, Humanisq; deos asimulant vitij.*

Which in effect is this,

I am that Dido which thou here do'it see,
Cunningly framed in beauteous Imagie.
Like this I was, but had not such a foule,
As Maro fained, incestuous and foule.
Aeneas neuer with his Troian host Beheld my face, or landed on this coast.
But flying proud Iarbas villanie,
Not mou'd by furious loue or calousie;
I did with weapon chaste, to save my fame,
Make way for death vntimely, ere it came.
This was my end; but first I built a Towne, Reueng'd my husbands death, liu'd with renowne.
Why did'st thou stirre vp Virgil, enuious Muse, Falsely my name and honour to abuse?
Readers, beleuee Historians; not those Which to the world Ioanes thefts and vice expose.
Poets are liars, and for vertes sake
Will make the Gods of humane crimes partake.

From the time of Dido vnto the first Punicke warre, that Carthage grew and flourish'd in wealth and conquests, we find in many histories: but in particular wee find little of the Carthaginian affaires before that warre, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts vpon the Isle of Sicile. Wee will therefore deferre the relation of matters concerning that mightie Citie, vntill such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed; and prosecute in the meane while the historie that is now in hand.

§. VII.

The beginning of AMAZIA his reigne. Of IOAS King of Iſrael, and ELISHA the Prophet.

AMAZIAS, the sonne of IOASH, being twentie five yeares old when his father died, tooke possession of the Kingdome of Iuda, when in beleaust of so to demane himselfe, as his new beginning might be least offensive. The Law of Moses he protested to observe, yet howsoever it had bene secretly despised since the time of Jeroboam, by 15 many great persons of the Land, yet had it by provision of good Princes, yea and of bad ones (in their best times) imitable the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deepe roote in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conforme himselfe vnto it. And at that present time, the laughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawn the late King from the service of God, being seconced by the death of the King himselfe, even whilst that execrable murder, committed by the King vpon Zecharia, was yet fresh in memorie, did serue as a notable example of Gods justice against idolatours, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amazias from following the way, which led 20 to such an euill end. He therefore, having learned of his father the art of dissimulation, did not only forbear to punish the Traytours that had slaine King IOAS, but gaue way to the time, and suffered the dead bodie to be interred, as that Osai formerly had bene, in the Citie of David, yet not among the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda. Neuertheless after this, when (belike) the noyse of the people having wearied it selfe into silence, it was found that the Conspiratours (howsoever their deed done was applauded as the handie worke of GOD) had neither any mightie partakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as having done well, seeing it was not ill taken; the King, who perceived his government well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the 30 heate of mens affections, being not well allaid, it was easie to distinguish betweene their treasons and Gods judgment, which, by their treasons, had taken plain visible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to liue; which could not but giue contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a iust Prince, rather than of a reuenging sonne. This being done, and his owne life the better secured, by such exemplarie justice, against the like attempts; Amazias carried himselfe outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest about twelue or thirteene yeares.

As Amazias gathered strength in Iuda by the commoditie of a long peace, so IOAS 40 the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the warre hotly against the Aramites. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his predecessours had bene, worshipping the Calues of Jeroboam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Iehu, that the tenne Tribes wanted little of being utterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Iehu and his sonne Iehoahaz. But as Gods benefits to Iehu sufficed not to withdraw him from this politique idolatrie; so were the miseries, rewarding that impietie, vnable to reclaime Iehoahaz from the same impious course: yet the mercie of God beholding the trouble of Israel, condescended vnto the prayers of this vngodly Prince, even then when hee and his miserable sub- 50 jects, were oblitaine in following their owne abominable waies. Therefore in temporall matters the ten tribes recouered apace, but the fauour of God, which had bene infinitely more worth, I do not find, nor beleue, that they sought; that they had it not, I finde in the wordes of the Prophet, saying plainly to Amazias, the Lord is not with Israel neither with all the house of EPHRAIM.

Where

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisha, who liued in those times, did foretell the prosperitie of the Israelites vnder the Raigne of IOAS; or whether Iehoahaz wearied and broken with long aduersitie, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himselfe in part of the heauie cares attending those vnhappie Syrian warres, by laying the burthen vpon his hopeful sonne; we find that in the thirtie seventh year 10 of IOAS, King of Iuda, IOAS the sonne of IEHOAHAZ began to raigne ouer Israel in Samaria, which was in the fiftieth of his fathers raigne, and some two or three yeares before his death.

2 Kings 13. 10.

It appeares that this yong Prince, euen from the beginning of his Rule, did so 10 well husband that poore stocke which he receiued from his Father, of tenne Chariots, fiftie horsemen, and ten thousand foot, that he might seeme likely to proue a thriuer. Among other circumstances, the wordes which he spake to Elisha the Prophet, argue no lesse. For IOAS visiting the Prophet, who lay sicke, spake vnto him thus, O my father, my father, the Chariot of Israel, and the horsemen of the same, by 15 which manner of speech hee did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had stood his Kingdome in more speede, than all the horses and Chariots could doe.

2 Kings 13. 14.

This Prophet who succeeded vnto Elisha, about the first yeare of Ioram the sonne of Ahab King of Israel, died (as some haue probably collected) about the third or 20 fourth yeare of this IOAS, the Nephew of Iehu. To shew how the Spirit of Elisha was doubled, or did rest vpon him; it exceedeth my facultie. This is recorded of him, that he did not only raise a dead child vnto life, as Elisha had done, but when hee himselfe was dead, it pleased God that his dead bones should restore life vnto a carcasse, which touched them in the graue. In fine hee bestowed, as a legacie, three victories vpon King IOAS, who thereby did set Israel in a faire way of recovering all that the Aramites had vsurped; and weakening the Kings of Damasco in such sort, that they were neuer after terrible to Samaria.

§. VIII.

Of AMAZIA his warre against EDOM; His Apostasie; and ouerthrow by IOAS.

THE happie successe which IOAS had found in his warre against the Aramites, was such as might kinde in Amazias a desire of vndertaking 40 some expedition, wherein himselfe might purchase the like honour. His Kingdom could furnish three hundred thousand seruicable men for the warre; and his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these; and the hire of many more. Cause of warre he had very iust against the Edomites, who having rebelled in the time of his grandfather Iehoram, had about fiftie yeares bene vnreclaimed, partly by means of the troubles happening in Iuda, partly through the sloth and timorousnesse of his father IOAS. Yet, forasmuch as the men of Iuda had in many yeares bene without all exercise of warre (excepting that vnhappie fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) he held it a point of wisdom to increase his forces, with Souldiers waged out of Israel, whence hee hired for an hundred talents of siluer, an hundred thousand valiant 2 Chron. 28. 5. 100. Ant. Ind. men, as the Scripture telleth vs, though Iosephus diminish the number, saying that 12. 9. c. 10. they were but twentie thousand.

This great Armie, which with so much cost Amazias had hired out of Israel, he 50 was faine to dismisse, before he had employed it, being threatened by a Prophet with ill successe, if hee strengthened himselfe with the helpe of those men, whom God (though in mercy he gaue them victorie against the cruell Aramites) did not loue, because they were idolatours. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this dismission, as an high disgrace, which to reuenge, they fell vpon 2 a peece of Iuda in their returne, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand men; and some spoile, which they carried away. But Amazias with his owne forces, knowing that God would be assistant to their journey, entered courageously into the Edomites Countrey; ouer whome obtaining victorie, he slew tenne thousand, and tooke other tenne thousand prisoners, all which hee threw from an high rocke holding them, it seemes, rather as Traytors, than as iust enemies. This victorie did not seeme to reduce Edom vnder the subiection of the crowne of Iuda, which might be the cause of that euertie, which was vied to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the liues of their friends and kinsmen at so deare a rate, as the losse of their owne libertie. Some towne in mount Seir, Amazias tooke, as appears by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefensible, in that he left no garrisons there, whereby he might another yeare the better haue pursued the conquest of the whole Countrey. How soeuer it were, he got both honor by the iourney, & gaines enough, had he not lost himselfe.

2. Chron. 25. 14.

Among other spoiles of the Edomites, were carried away their Gods, which being vanquished and taken prisoners, did deserue well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwise, I know not by what strange witchcraft, so besotted this vnworthe King Amazias, that hee see them vp to bee his Gods, and worshipped them, and burned incense vnto them.

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, hee gaue a churlish and threatening answer; asking the Prophet, who made him a Counsellor, and bidding him hold his peace for feare of the world. If either the costly flutes, whereof these Idols were made, or the curious workmanhip and beaurie, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had ruinated the Kings fancy; me thinks, hee should haue rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as household ornaments and things of pleasure, than thereby haue suffered himselfe to be blinded, with such vnreasonable deuotion to wards them. If the superstitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to worke much vpon his imagination; much more should the bad seruice which they had done to their old Clients, haue moued him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seemes to me, that the same affections caried him from God, vnto the seruice of Idols, which afterwards moued him to talke so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. Hee had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such auxiliary forces as he had gathered out of Israel, which done it is said that hee was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by miracle, than let him faile of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason he should haue limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Isaiah, hauing broken the yoke of Isaiah from his necke, accordingly as Isaiah had foretold, should no more become his seruant. If therefore Amazias did hope to reconquer all the Countrey of Edom, hee failed of his expectation; yet so, that he brought home both profit and honour, which might haue well contented him.

2. Chron. 25. 11.

But there is a foolish and a wretched pride, wherewith men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe vnto God the honour of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to vse their owne industrie, courage, or foresight. Therefore it is commonly seeme that they, who entering into battaile are carefull to pray for aide from Heauen, with due acknowledgement of his power, who is the giuer of victorie; when the field is wonn, do vaunt of their owne exploits: one telling how he got such a ground of advantage; another, how he gaue checke to such a battallion; a third, how hee seized on the enemies Canon; euery one striving to magnifie himselfe, whilist all forget God, as one that had not bene present in the action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is, I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better successe, than hee did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Authour of his happinesse; so he whose meere wisdom and labour hath brought things to a prosperous issue, is doubly doubly bound to shew himselfe thankfull, both for the victorie, and for those vertues by which the victorie was gotten. And indeede so farre from weaknesse is the nature of such thanksgiving, that it may well be called the height of magnanimitie; no vertue being so truly heroicall, as that by which the spirit of a man aduanceth it selfe with confidence of acceptation, vnto the loue of God. In which sense it is a braue speech that Euander in Virgil, vseth to Aeneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition,

With this philosophie Amazias (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his head: he had shewed himselfe a better man of warre than any King of Iuda, since the time of Iehosaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should thinke him little inferior to David: of which honour hee saw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him loofe a hundred talents, and done him no pleasure, hee having preuailed by plaine force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That he was distempered with such vaine thoughts at these (besides the witness of his impietie following) Iosephus doth testifie; saying, That hee despised God, and that being puffed vp with his good successe, of which neuertheless hee would not acknowledge God to be the Authour, hee commaunded Isaiah King of Israel to become his subject, and to let the tenne Tribes acknowledge him their soveraigne, as they had done his Ancestors King David and King Salomon. Some thinke that his quarrell to Isaiah was rather grounded vpon the iniurie done to him by the Israelites, whom he dismissed in the iourney against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late wrong had more power to stirre him vp, than the remembrance of an old title, forgotten long since, and by himselfe neglected thirtene or fourteen yeares. Neuertheless it might so be, that when he was thus provoked, he thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old matters into question; that so the Kings of Israel might, at the least, learne to keepe their subiects from offending Iuda, for feare of endangering their owne crownes. Had Amazias desired onely recompence for the iniurie done to him, it is not improbable that hee should haue had some reasonable answer from Isaiah, who was not desirous to fight with him. But the answer which Isaiah returned, likening himselfe to a Cedar, and Amazias in respect of him to no better than a thistle, shewes that the challenge was made in insolent tearmes, fluted perhaps with such proud comparison of nobilitie, as might be made (according to that which Iosephus hath written) betweene a King of Ancient race, and one of lesse nobilitie than vertue.

10. Ant. 19. 6. 10

It is by Sophocles reported of Alexander, that when going to the warre of Troy, his Father did bid him to be valiant, and get victorie by Gods assistance, he made answer, that by Gods assistance, a coward could get victorie, but he would get it alone without such helpe: after which proud speech, though hee did manie valiant actes, hee had small thanks, and finally killing himselfe in a madnesse, whereto hee fell vpon disgrace receiued, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amazias did vtter such wordes, I doe not find: but hauing once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of such wordes, he was rewarded with successe according. The verie first counsaile wherein this warre was concluded, serues to proue that hee was a wise Prince indeed at Ierusalem, among his Parastites; but a foole when hee had to deale with his equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weakle people, trusting more in the site of their Countrey than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Isaiah, who from so poore beginnings had raised himselfe to such strength, that he was able to lend his friend a hundred thousand men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained vp, in a long victorious warre. But as Amazias discovered much want of judgement, in vndertaking such a match; lo in prosecuting the business, when it was set on foote, hee behaued himselfe as a man of little experience, who hauing once onely tried his fortune, and found it to be good, thought that in warre there was nothing else to doe, than send a defiance, fight, and winne. Ios on the contrarie side, hauing bene accustomed to deale with a stronger enemy than the King of Iuda, vied that celeritie, which peraduenture had often stood him in good stead against the Aramite. Hee did not sit waiting till the enemies brake in and waited his Countrey, but presented himselfe with an Armie in Iuda, ready to bid battaile to Amazias, and saue him the labour of a long iourne. This could not but greatly discourage those of Iuda; who (besides the impression of feare which an inuasion beates into people, not inured to the like; hauing deuoured, in their greedie hopes, the spoile of Israel, fully perswading themselves to get as much, and at as easie a rate, as in the iourne of Edom, were so farre disappointed of their expectation, that well they might suspect all new assurance of good lucke, when the olde had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had stomacke enough to challenge the patrimonie of Sidon, thought like another Dani, to winne it by the sword. The issue of which foolhardinesse might easily be foreseene in humane reason, comparing together, either the two Kings, or the qualitie of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the warre. But meere humane wisdom, howsoever it might foresee much, could not haue prognosticated all the mischief that fell vpon Amazias. For as soone as the two Armies came in fight, God, whose helpe this wretched man had despised, did (as Iosephus reports it) strike such terror and amazement into the men of Iuda, that without one blowe giuen, they fled all away, leauing their King to shift for himselfe, which he did so ill, that his enemy had soone caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abiect basenesse. That the Armie which fled, sustained any other losse than of honour, I neither find in the Scriptures nor in Iosephus; it being likely that the soone beginning of their flight, which made it the more shamefull, made it also the more safe. But of the mischief that followed this ouerthrow, it was Gods will that Amazias himselfe should sustaine the whole disgrace. For Ios carried him directly to Ierusalem, where he had him procure that the gates might be opened, to let him in and his Armie; threatening him otherwise with present death. So much amazed was the miserable captiue, with these dreadfull wordes, that he durst doe none other, than perswade the Citizens, to yeelde themselves to the mercie of the Conqueror. The Towne, which afterwarde being in weaker state, held out two yeares, against Nebuchadnezzar, was vtterly dismayed, when the King, that should haue giuen his life to saue it, vsed all his force of command and intreatie to betray it. So the gates of Ierusalem were opened to Ios, with which honour (greater than any King of Israel had euer obtained) hee could not rest contented, but, the more to despight Amazias and his people, hee caused foure hundred cubites of the wall to be throwne downe, and entered the Citie in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the King before him, as in triumph. This done, he sackt the Temple, and the Kings Pallace, and so, taking hostages of Amazias, he dismissed the poore creature that was gladd of his life, and returned to Samarita.

A discourse of the reasons, hindering Ios from uniting Iuda to the crowne of Israel, when he had wonne Ierusalem, and held Amazias prisoner. The end of Ios his raigne.

EE may iustly maruaile how it came to passe, that Ios, being thus in possession of Ierusalem, hauing the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, and his owne entire, could bee so contented to depart quietly, with a little spoile, when hee might haue seized vpon the whole Kingdom. The raigne of Athalia had giuen him cause to hope, that the issue of Dauid might be dispossessed of that crowne, his owne Nobilitie, being the sonne and grand-child of Kings, together with the famous actes that hee had done, were enough to make the people of Iuda thinke highly of him; who might also haue preferred his forme of gouernment, before that of their owne Kings, especially at such a time, when a long succession of wicked Princes had smothered the thanks, which were due to the memorie of a few good ones. The commoditie that would haue ensued, vpon the vnion of all the twelue Tribes, vnder one Prince, is so apparent, that I need not to insinuate it. That any message from God forbade the Israelites (as afterwarde in the victorie which Pekah the sonne of Romel got vpon Amazias) to turne his present aduantage, to the best vse, wee doe not reade. All this maketh the more difficult to resolve the question, why a Prince so well exercised, as Ios had bene, in recouering his owne, and winning from his enemy, should forsake the possession of Ierusalem, and wilfully neglect the possibilities, or rather cast away the full assurance of so faire a conquest, as the Kingdom of Iuda.

But concerning that point, which of all others, had bene most materiall, I meane the desire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their King, it is plainely scene, that entring Ierusalem in triumphant manner, Ios was vnable to concoct his owne prosperitie. For the opening of the gates had bene enough to haue let him not only into the Citie, but into the royall throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by faire intreatie (especially hauing sure meanes of compulsion) hee might haue made his owne, when they saw themselves betrayed, and basely giuen away by him whose they had bene before. The faire mark with this opportunitie presented, he did not aime at, because his ambition was otherwise and more meanely buied, in leuelling at the glorie of a triumphant entrie through a breach. Yet this error might afterwards haue bene corrected well enough, if entring as an enemy, and shewing what he could doe, by spending his anger vpon the walles, he had within the Citie done offices of a friend, and laboured to shew good will to the inhabitants. But when his pride had done, his couetousnesse began, and sought to please it selfe, with that which is commonly most ready to the spoiler, yet should be most forborne. The treasure wherewith Sefek, Uzzabel, and the Philistims, men ignorant of the true God & his religion, had quenched their greedie thirst, ought not to haue tempted the appetite of Ios, who though an idolatour, yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Ierusalem. Therefore when the people saw him take his way directly to that holy place, and lay his rauenous hands vpon the consecrated vessels, calling the family of Obed Edom (whose children had hereditarie charge of the treasury) to a strict account, as if they had bene Officers of his owne Exchequer, they considered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a Noble Prince, an Israelite and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wisely avoided; by stealing a few apples, hee lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a few dayes, might by comparing themselves one to one, perceiue his

Souldiers to be no better than men of their owne mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of so great a Citie. It is not so easie to hold by force a mightie Towne entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by vnadvised feare. For when the Citizens, not being disarmed, recouer their spirits, and begin to vnderstand their first error; they will thinke vpon euery advantage, of place, of provisions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tilletones, and rather chule by desperate resolution, to correct the euils growne out of their former cowardice, than suffer those mischeifes to poyson the bodie, which in such halfe-conquests, are easily talied in the mouth. A more liuely example hereof cannot be desired, than the Citie of Florence, which through the weaknesse of Peter de Medices, gouerning therein as a Prince, was reduced into such hard termes, that it opened the gates vnto the French King Charles the eight, who not plainly professing himselfe either friend or foe to the Estate, entred the Towne, with his Armie, in triumphant manner, himselfe and his horse armed, with his lance vpon his thigh. Manie inolenencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred, betweene them and the Towne-men: so farre forth that the Florentines, to preserve their libertie, were driuen to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intolerable conditions, demanding huge summes of readie monie, and the absolute Signoric of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the Citie in Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secreterie, and tearing them before his face, had him sound his trumpets, and they would ring their bells: which peremptorie wordes made the French bethinke themselves, and come readily to this agreement, that for fortie thousand pounds, and not halfe of that monie to be paid in hand, Charles should not onely depart in peace, but restore whatsoeuer he had of their dominion, and continue their assured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seeme for that braue Armie, which in few moneths after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streetes, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other businesse (and to perhaps had Iouis, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houles, vsually drawes euery Citizen to saue his owne, leauing victorie to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolu'd, women can quench, as fast as the enimie hauing other things to looke vnto, can set on fire. And indeed that Commander is more giuen to anger than regardfull of profit, who vpon the vncertaine hope of destroying a Towne, forsakes the assurance of a good composition. The circutie of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Ierusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How strongly soeuer Iouis might hold himselfe within Ierusalem, he could not easily depart, from thence, with his bootie safe, if the Armie of Inda, which had bene more terrified than weakened in the late encounter, should reinforce it selfe, and giue him a checke vpon the way. Wherefore it was wisely done of him, to take hostages for his better securitie, his Armie being vpon returne, and better laden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more vnapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the Citie and without, seruing to coole the ambition of Iouis, and keepe it downe from aspiring to the Crowne of Inda; it appeares that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisba the Prophet: who when this Iouis had smitten the ground with his arrowes thrice, told him that he should no oner smite the Aramites. The three victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probability, referred vnto the fifth, sixth and seventh yeares of Iouis: after which time, if any losses ensuing had blemished the former good successe, ill might the King of Israel haue likened himselfe to a stately Cedar, and worse could he haue either lent the Iudaean one hundred thousand men, or meete him in battaile, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thousand of his owne. Seeing therefore it is made plain by the

the wordes of Elisba, that after three victories, Iouis should finde some change of fortune, and suffer losse; wee must needs conclude, That the Aramite preuailed vpon him this yeare, it being the last of his Raigne. That this was so, and that the Syrians, taking aduantage of Iouis his absence, gaue such a blow to Israel, as the King at his returne was not able to remedie, but rather fell himselfe into new misfortunes, which increased the calamitie, wee may evidently perceiue in that which is spoken of *Ieroboa*m his sonne. For it is said, That the Lord saw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Israel, and that hauing not decreed to put out the name of Israel from vnder the heauen, he preserved them by the hand of *Ieroboa*m, the sonne of Iouis. This is enough to proue, that the victorious raigne of Iouis was concluded with a sad catastrophe; the riches of the Temple hastning his miserie and death, as they had done with Sesac, Abida, and Thazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Craffus, and other sacrilegious Potentates.

Thus either through indignation conceived against him, by the people of Ierusalem, and courage which they tooke to set vpon him within the Walls: or through preparation of the Armie that lay abroad in the Countrey, to bid him battaile in open field, and recouer by a new charge the honour which was lost at the former encounter; or through the miseries daily brought vpon his owne Countrey, by the Syrian in his absence, if not by all of these; Iouis was driuen to lay aside all thought of winning the Kingdome of Inda; and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all haste homewards, where hee found a sad well-come, and being vtterly forsaken of his wonted prosperitie, forsooke also his life in few moneths after, leauing his Kingdome to *Ieroboa*m the second, his fortunate and valiant Sonne.

§. X.

The end of AMAZIA his Raigne and Life.

Any man is able to ghesse how Amazias looked, when the enimie had left him. Hee that had vaunted so much of his owne great prowess and skill in armes, threatening to worke wonders, and let vp anew the glorious Empire of Dauid, was now vncledd of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing so terrible a beast as he had bene painted. Much argument of scolding at him hee had ministred vnto such, as held him in dislike; which at this time, doubtlesse, were very many: for the shame that falls vpon an insolent man, seldom failes of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amazias (besides that the multitude are alwaies prone to lay the blame vpon their Gouernours, even of those calamities which happened by their owne default) there was no child in all Ierusalem, but knew him to be the roote of all this mischiefe. He had not onely challenged a good man of Warre, being himselfe a Dastard; but when hee was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common Enemie, to haue him let into the Citie, that with his owne eyes he might see what spoile there was, and not make a bad bargain by heare-say. The father of this Amazias, was a beastly man; yet when the Aramites tooke him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his owne life at so deare a rate, as the Citie and Temple of Ierusalem. Had he offered; should they haue made his promise good? Surely the hate which they had made in condescending to this hard match, was very vnfortunate: for by keeping out the Israelite (which was easie enough) any little while, they should haue bene erid of him, seeing that the Aramites would haue made him runne home, with greater speede than he came forth. Then also, when hauing troffed vpon his baggage, he was ready to be gone, a little courage would haue serued to perfwade him to leaue his loade behinde; had not their good King deliuered vp hostages, to secure his returne, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken.

2. Chron. 25. 17.

Such exprobrations could not but vex the heart of this vnhappie King: it had beene well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his faults vnto God, that had punished him by all this dishonor. But we finde no mention of his amendment. Rather it appeares, that hee continued an Idolator to the very last. For it is said of him, that alter his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Ierusalem; a manifest proofe that he was not reclaimed, vnto his liues end. And certainly, they which tell a man in his aduersitie of his faults passed, shall sooner bee thought to vpbraid him with his fortune, than to seeke his reformation. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Priests and Prophets were lesse welcome to him, than euer they had beene. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a heart into him, whereof themselves might alwaies be Masters, wanted not plausible matter to reuiue him. For hee was not first, nor second, of the Kings of Iuda, that had beene ouer-come in battaile. Dauid himselfe had abandoned the Citie, leaving it, before the Enemie was in sight, vnto Abshalem his rebellious sonne. Many besides him had receiued losses, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Ias might so easily haue beene kept out; why did their Ancestors let Sesac in? Asa was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his owne hands hee emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessity of the State. Belike these traducers would commend no actions but of dead Princes: if so, hee should rather liue to punish them, than die to please them. Though wherein had he giuen them any cause of displeasure? It was hee indeede that commanded to set open the gates to Ias; but it was the people that did it. Good seruants ought not to haue obeyed their Masters commandements, to his disadvantage, when they saw him not Master of his owne Person. As his captiuitie did acquite him from blame, of all things that hee did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it selfe, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his losse. For had hee beene as battie to flie, as others were; hee might haue escaped, as well as others did. But seeking to teach the bafe Multitude courage, by his Royall example, he was shamefully betrayed by those in whom hee trusted. Vnworthie creatures that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans wordes, being prisoner, he commanded them to yeeld; hauing neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, he bad them stand to it, and fight like men. The best was that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand liues were saued; the Enemie hauing wisely preferred the surpris of a Lyon that was Captaine, before the chase and slaughter of an Armie of stags, that followed him.

These or the like wordes comforting Amazias, were able to perswade him, that it was euen so indeede. And such excuses might haue serued well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But hee that was vnwilling to ascribe vnto God the good successe foretold by a Prophet; could easily finde how to impute this late disaster, vnto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it seemes that he meant to keepe himselfe safe from her, by sitting still; for in fiftene yeares following (so long hee out-liued his honor) we finde not that he stirred. As for his subjects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his gouernement, yet we may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them, increasing their hatred, to his owne ruine. He that suspecteth his owne worth, or other mens opinions, thinking that lesse regard is had of his person, than he beleueeth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authority, in purchasing the name of a seuerer man. For the affected sowerness of a vaine fellow, doth many times resemble the grauitie of one that is wise: and the feare wherein they liue, which are subject vnto oppression, carries a shew of reuerence, to him that does the wrong; at least it serues to dazle the eies of vnderlings, keeping them from prying into the weakness of such as haue iurisdiction ouer them. Thus the time, wherein, by well vsing it, men might attaine to be such as they ought, they doe vniuallly mispend, in seeking to appeare such as they are not. This is a vaine and decci-deceivable course; procuring, instead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous consequences; especially when an vnstable spirit, being ouerparted with high authority, is too passionate in the execution of such an Office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazias thought by extreme rigour to hold vp his reputation, what did hee else than strue to make the people thinke he hated them, when of themselves they were apt enough to beleuee, that he did not loue them? The best was that he had, by reuenging his fathers death, provided well enough for his owne securitie: but who should take vengeance, (or vpon whom?) of such a murder, wherein euery one had a part? Surely God himselfe, who had not giuen commandement or leaue vnto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in smething the blood of his anointed. Yet as Amazias, carelesse of God, was carried headlong by his owne affections; so his subjects, following the same ill example, without requiring what belonged vnto their duties, rose vp against him, with such headlong furie, that being vnabie to defend himselfe in Ierusalem, he was driuen to forsake the Citie, and flie to Lachis, for safegard of his life. But so extreme was the hatred conceiued against him, and so general, that neither his absence could alliaie the rage of it in the Capitall Citie, nor his presence in the Countie abroad procure friends, to defend his life. Questionlesse, he chose the Towne of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected to him; yet found hee there none other fauour, than that the people did not kill him with their owne hands: for when the Conspiratours (who troubled not themselves about raising an armie for the matter) sent pursuers after him, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the vmoit Citie of his Lominion Westward, standing somewhat without the border of Iuda; so that hee might haue made an easie escape (if hee durst aduenture) into the Territorie of the Philistims, or the Kingdome of Israel. Therefore it may seeme that he was detained there, where certaine it is that he found no kind of fauour: for had not the people of this Towne, added their owne treason to the general insurrection; the murderers could not at so good leisure as they did, haue carried away his bodie to Ierusalem, where they gaue him buriall with his fathers.

§. XI.

Of the Interregnum, or vacancie, that was in the Kingdome of Iuda, after the death of Amazias.

It hath already beene shewed, that the raignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel were sometimes to be measured by compleat yeares; otherwhiles, by yeares current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last yeares of his fathers Raigne, or the foremost of his Sonnes. But we are now arrived at a meere vacation, wherein the Crowne of Iuda laie void eleuen whole yeares: a thing not plainly set downe in Scriptures, nor yet remembred by Iosephus, and therefore hard to be beleued, were it not proued by necessarie consequence.

Twice we finde it written, that Amazias, King of Iuda, liued after the death of Iosias, King of Israel fifteen yeares; whereupon it follows, that the death of Amazias, was about the end of fiftene yeares compleate, which Ieroboam the second (who in the fiftenth yeare of Amazias made King ouer Israel) had raigned in Samarita. But the succession of Uzzias, who is also called Azarias, vnto his father in the Kingdome of Iuda, was eleuen yeares later than the sixteenth of Ieroboam: for it is exprest, that Azarias began to Raigne in the tenth and twentieth yeare of Ieroboam; the sixteenth yeare of his life, being ioyned with the first of two and thirtie that hee Raigned. So the Interregnum of eleuen yeares cannot be diuided, without some hard meanes vsed, of interpreting the text otherwise than the letter soundes.

Yet

Yet some coniectures there are made, which tend to keepe all euen, without acknowledging any voided time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the seuen and twentieth year of Ieroboam, we should perhaps vnderstand the seuen and twentieth year of his life; or else (because the like wordes are no where else interpreted in the like sence) that Azaria was cleauen yeares vnder age, that is five yeares old, when his father died; and so his sixteenth year might concur with the seuen and twentieth of Ieroboam; or that the text it selfe may haue suffered some wrong, by miswriting twentie seuen for fouteene yeares, and so, by making the sixteenth year of Ieroboam to be newly begun, all may be salued. These are the coniectures of that worthy man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which, it may suffice, that the author himselfe doth easily let it passe, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that vpon euerie doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be satisfied in all copies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may be held with some qualification, that Azaria began his reigne being five yeares old; but then must we adde those eleauen yeares, which passed in his minority, to the two and fiftie that followed his sixteenth year, which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an interregnum.

But why should we be so carefull to auoide an interregnum in Iuda, seeing that the like necessitie hath enforced all good writers, to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few yeares, in the Kingdome of Israel? The space of time betweene Ieroboams death, and the beginning of Zacharias Reigne, and such another gap found betweene the death of Pekia, and the beginning of Hosea, haue made it easily to be admitted in Samarita, which the consideration of things as they stood in Iuda, when Amazias was slaine, doth make more probable to haue happened there, yea although the necessitie of computation were not so apparant.

For the publique furie, hauing so farre extended it selfe, as vnto the destruction of the Kings owne person, was not like to be appeased without order taken for obtaining some redresse of those matters, which had caused it at the first to break forth into such extremitie. We need not therefore wonder how it came to passe, that they which already had throwne themselves into such an horrible treason, should afterwards dare to withhold the crowne from a Prince of that age, which being invested in all ornaments of regalitie, is neuertheless exposed to many iniuries, proceeding from headstrong and forgetfull subiects.

As for their coniecture, who make Azaria to haue bene King but one and fortie yeares, after he came out of his nonage; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too hardly with the text. The best opinion were that, which giues vnto Ieroboam eleauen yeares of reigne with his father, before hee beganne to raigne single in the fifteenth of Amazias; did it not swallow vp almost the whole reigne of Iosias, and extending the yeares of those which reigned in Israel (by making such of them compleat, as were only current) and take at the shortest the Reignes of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: euery man may follow his owne opinion, and see mine more plainly in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for these purposes.

§. XII.

Of Princes Contemporarie with AMAZIA, and more particularly of SARDANAPALVS.

THe Princes liuing with Amazias, and in the eleuen yeares that followed his death, were Iosias and Ieroboam in Israel; Cepheus and Astynermus in Egypt; Sylusius Atladius; and Sylusius Auentinus in Albia; Agememon in Corinth; Diogenes Phereus; and Aripbron in Athenis; in Iudea Simon Thelecius, in whose time the Spartans wan from the Acadians, Geranthia, Amycia, and some other townes.

But

But more notable than all these, was Assyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth year of Amazias succeeding his father Oeraspes or Anacyndaraxes, reigned twentie yeares, and was slaine the last of the eleuen void yeares which forewent the Reigne of Azaria. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thousand two hundred and fortie yeares. A most luxurious and effeminate Palliard hee was, passing away his time among trumpets, whom hee imitated both in apparell and behauiour.

In these voluptuous courses hee liued an vnhappie life, knowing himselfe to bee so vile, that he durst not let any man haue a sight of him; yet sene hee was at length, and the sight of him was so odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who gouerned Media vnder him, finding means to behold the person of his King, was so incensed with that beastly spectacle, of a man disguised in womans attire, and struing to counterfeite an harlot, that hee thought it great shame to liue vnder the command of so vnworthy a creature. Purposing therefore to free himselfe and others from so balefull subiection, hee was much encouraged by the prediction of Beleus or Belusius a Chaldean, who told him plainly, that the Kingdome of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleased with this prophesie, did promise vnto Beleus himselfe the gouernment of Babylon; and so concluding how to handle the busines, one of them stirred vp the Medes, and alured the Perians into the quarrell, the other perswaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themselves in the same cause. These foure Nations armed fortie thousand men against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himselfe, but gathering such forces as hee could, out of other Nations, encountered the rebels, as one that would by deedes refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that warre, answer to the manner of his reticdnesse. For in three battailes hee carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such fearful termes, that had not Beleus promised them constantly some vnexpected succours, they would forthwith haue broken vp their Campe. About the same time, an Armie out of Bactria was coming to assist the King; but Arbaces encountering it vpon the way, perswaded it strongly by promise of libertie, that those forces ioynd themselves with his. The sodaine departure of the enimie seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to feast his Armie, triumphing before victorie. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came vpon him by night, and forced his Campe, which through ouer great securitie, was vnprepared for resistance.

This ouerthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leauing his wiues brother Salmenus to keepe the field, he withdrew himselfe into the Citie of Ninus, which, till new aides that he sent for should come, hee thought easily to defend; it hauing bene prophesied, that Ninus should neuer be taken, till the Riuer were enimie to the towne. Of the greatnesse and strenght of Ninus, enough hath bene spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so well victualled, that Arbaces (hauing in two battailes ouerthrowne the Kings Armie, and slaine Salmenus) was faine to lie two whole yeares before it, in hope to winne it by famine; whereof yet hee saw no appearance. It seemed that hee wanted Engines and skill to force those walles, which were a hundred foot high, and thicke enough for three Chariots in front to passe vpon the rampire. But that which hee could not doe in two yeares, the Riuer of Tigris did in the third: for being high swolne with raines, it not only drowned a part of the Citie through which it ranne, but threw downe twentie furlongs of the wall, and made a faire breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the olde Oracle, or seeing no means of resistance left, shutting vp himselfe into his Pallace, with his wiues, Eunuches and all his treasures, did set the house on fire, where with hee and they were together consumed. Strabo speaks of a monument of his, that was in Strabologia; Anchale a Citie of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that hee built that Citie and Tharsus vpon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men care and and drinke, and make merrie, encouraging other, with verses well knowne, to a voluptuous life, by his owne example, to witte that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any vertue becoming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end; saying that Arbece, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that sodainly hee slew him with a dagger. But the more generall consent of writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greeke writer, that lived in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be knowne.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Assyria, from the time of Senniramus, vnto Sardanapalus, though I beleene that they were sometimes (yet not, as Ctesias hath it, incessantly) buied, in offensive or else defensive armes: yet for the most part of them I doe better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were overpassed by Ctesius; because they did nothing wortheie of memorie. Whatsoever they did; that which Theophrastus Antichienus hath said of them is verie true; Silence and oblivion hath oppressed them.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of VZZIA.

§ I.

The prosperitie of VZZIA, and of IEROBOAM the second, who reigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchie that was in the tenne Tribes after the death of IEROBOAM. Of ZACHARIA, SAL-

LVM, MENAHEM and PEKACHIA.

VZZIA, who is also called Azaria the sonne of Iotham, was made King of Juda, when he was sixteen years old, in the seuen and twentieth yere of Ieroboam the sonne of Iois King of Israel. Hee serued the God of his father Dauid, and had therefore good successe in all his enterprises. Hee built Elath, a Towne that stood neare to the Red Sea, and restored it to Juda. Hee overcame the Philistims, of whose Townes hee dismantled some, and built others in sundrie partes of their Territories. Also hee got the matrike ouer some partes of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruites of his prosperous warres, wherein (as Iosephus rehearseth his acts) hee beganne with the Philistims, and then proceeded vnto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armie consisted of three hundred and seuen thousand men of warre, ouer which were appointed two thousand six hundred Captaines. For all this multitude the King prepared shields, and speeres, and helmes, and other Armes requisite; following therein happily a course quite opposite vnto that which some of his late predecessors had held, who thought it better policie to vse the seruice of the Nobilitie, than of the multitude; carrying forth to warre the Princes and all the Chariots.

As the victories of Vzzia were farre more important, than the atchieuements of

of all that had reigned in Juda, since the time of Dauid; so were his riches and magnificent workes, equall, if not superior to any of theirs that had been Kings betweene him and Solomon. For besides that great conquests are wont to repay the charges of warre with triple interest, hee had the skill to vse, as well as the happinesse to get. Hee turned his lands to the best vse, keeping Ploughmen and Dresseers of Vines, in grounds conuenient to such husbandrie. In other places hee had cattell feeding, whereof he might well keepe great store, hauing wonne so much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abundance of waste ground fruing for pasture. For defence of his cattell and Heardsmen, hee built Townes in the wilderness. He also digged many cisternes or ponds. Iosephus calls them water-courses; but in such drie grounds, it was enough that hee found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Townes hee so commanded the water, that none could without his consent, releue themselves therewith; questionlesse hee tooke the onely course, by which hee might securely hold the Lordship ouer all the wilderness; it being hardly passable, by reason of the extreme droughth, when the few springs therein found, are left free to the vse of trauiilers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Elath by the Red Sea, and of sundrie Townes among the Philistims; hee repaired the wall of Ierusalem, which Iozab had broken downe, and fortified it with Towers, whereof some were an hundred and fiftie Cubites high.

The State of Israel did neuer so flourish, as at this time, since the diuision of the twelve Tribes into two Kingdomes. For as Vzzia prevailed in the South, so (if not more) Ieroboam the sonne of Iois, King of the tenne Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories, against the Syrrians, hee wanne the Royall Citie of Damascus, and hee wanne Hamath, with all the Countrie thereabout from the entring of Hamath, vnto the Sea of the Wilderness, that is (as the most expound it) vnto the vast deserts of Arabia, the end whereof was vndiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in the time of this Ieroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had bene in the raigne of Dauid.

But it was not for the pietie of Ieroboam, that hee thrived so well; for hee was an Idolater: it was only the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction, whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the successe of warre, and to throw the victorious Aramites, vnder the feet of those, whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Iehu, to which God had promised the Kingdome of Israel vnto the fourth generation, was now not farre from the end; and now againe it was invited vnto repentance, by new benefites, as it had bene at the beginning. But the sinne of Ieroboam the sonne of Zebai, was held so precious, that neither the Kingdome it selfe giuen to him by God, was able to draw Iehu from that politike idolatrie; nor the miserie falling vpon him and his posteritie, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperitie, of Ieroboam the sonne of Iois, to make him render the honour that was due, to the onely giuer of victorie. Wherefore the promise of God, made vnto Iehu, that his sonnes, vnto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but, being almost expired, gaue warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that wee, who find no particulars recorded, can hardly gesse at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

When Ieroboam the sonne of Iois, after a victorious raigne of one and fortie yeres, had ended his life, it seemes in all reason that Zacharia his Son, should forthwith haue bene admitted, to reigne in his stead; the Nobilitie of that race hauing gotten such a lustre, by the immediate succession of foure Kings, that any Competitor, had the crowne passed by election, must needs haue appeared base; and the vertue of the last King, hauing bene so great, as might well serue to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the alreadie confirmed right of a familie so rooted in possession. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twentie yeares did passe before Zacharia the Sonne of Ieroboam was, by vnitorne consent, receiued as King. The true originall causes hereof were to be found at Dauid and Beihel, where the golden Calues did stand: yet second instruments of this disturbance, are likely not to haue beene wanting, vpon which, the wisdome of man was ready to cast an eye. Probable it is that the Captaines of the Armie (who afterwards slew one another, so fast, that in fourteene yeares there reigned fise Kinges) did now by headstrong violence, rent the Kingdome asunder, holding each what he could, and either despising or hating some qualities in Zacharia; vntill, after many yeares, wearied with dissention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they consented to yield all quietly to the sonne of Ieroboam. That this Anarchie lasted almost three and twentie yeares, we find by the difference of time, betweene the fifteenth yeare of Vzzia, which was the last of Ieroboam his one and fortieth (his leuen and twentieth concurring with the first of Vzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the same Vzzia in the last fixe moneths whereof, Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are foueindeed that by supposing Ieroboam to haue reigned with his father cleauen yeares, doe cut off the interregnum in Iuda (before mentioned) and by the same reason, alledge this Anarchie, that was before the reigne of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leaue twelve yeares long: which is time sufficient to proue that the Kingdome of the ten Tribes, was no lesse distempred, than as is already noted. But I choote rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the world, than this doubtfull coniecture, that giues to Ieroboam two and fittie yeares, by adding three quarters of his fathers reigne vnto his owne, which was it selfe indeed so long, that hee may well seeme to haue begun it very yong: for I doe not thinke, that God blessed this Idolater, both with a longer reigne, and with a longer life, than he did his seruant Dauid.

Thus much being spoken of the time, wherein the throne of Israel was voide, before the reigne of Zacharia, little may suffice to be said of his Reigne it selfe, which lasted but a little while. Sixe moneths onely was he King; in which time he declared himselfe a worshipper of the golden Calues; which was enough to iustifie the iudgement of God, whereby hee was slaine. He was the last of Iehu's house, being (inclusiuely) the first of that line; which may haue bene some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly succession: the prophetic hauing determined that race in the fourth generation. But (besides that Gods promise was extended vnto the vtmost) there was no warrant giuen to Sallum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had bene giuen to Iehu, for the slaughter of Ieroboam, and for the eradication of Ahabs house.

Zacharia hauing bene fixe moneths a King, was then slaine by Sallum, who reigned after him, the space of a moneth in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I doe not finde; saue onely that he was a Traitor, and the sonne of one Iehoshaphat, whereby his father got no honour. It seemes that hee was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himselfe; and now, when all other Competitors were sitten downe, thought easily to preuaile against that King, in whose person the race of Iehu was to faile. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong partie: for Tijshab or Thapsa, and the coast thereof euen from Tirzah, where Menahem, his enemy and supplanter, then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallum receiued the reward of his treason, and was slaine by Menahem who reigned in his place.

Menahem the sonne of Gadi, reigned after Sallum tenne yeares. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane, For he not onely destroyed Tijshab, and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ript vp all their women with child, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty bene vied in reuenge of Zacharia's death, it is like that he would haue bene as earnest, in procuring vnto him his fathers crowne when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was vied such long deliberation, that we may plainly discouer Ambition, Disdaine, and other priuate passions, to haue bene the causes of this beaulty outrage.

In the time of Menahem, and (as it seemes) in the beginning of his reigne; Pul, King of Assyria, came against the Land of Israel; whom this new King appealed, with a thousand talents of siluer, leaued vpon all the substantiall men in his Countie. With this monie the Israhelites purchased, not only the peace of his Kingdome, but his owne establishment therein: some factious man (belike) hauing either inuited Pul thither, or (if he came vncalled) fought to vie his helpe, in deposing this ill beloued King. Iosephus reports of this Menahem, that his reigne was no milder than his entrance. But after ten yeares, his tyrannie ended with his life: and Pekahias, his Sonne, occupied his roome.

Of this Pekahias the storie is short: for hee reigned only two yeares; at the end whereof, he was slaine by Pekah, the Sonne of Remah, whose treason was rewarded with the crowne of Israel, as, in time coming, another mans treason against himselfe shall be. There needes no more, to be said of Menahem, and his Sonne, saue that they were, both of them, Idolaters; and the Sonne (as we finde in Iosephus) like to his Father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Assyrian King, who first opened vnto those Northerne Nations the way into Palestina; it will shortly follow in order of the storie, to deliuer our opinion: whether he were that Belshazzar (called also Belsazar, and by some, Belus Belochus) who ioyned with Arbaces the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. At the present it is more fit that we relate the end of Vzzia's life, who out-lived the happinesse wherein we left him.

P. II.

The end of VZZIA his reigne and life.

S the zeale of Iehoiada, that godly Priest, was the meane, to prefrue the lineage of Dauid, in the person of Ioua; so it appeares, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Vzzia, to bring him vp, and aduance him to the crowne of Iuda, when the hatred borne to his Father Azarias, had endangered his succession. For it is said of Vzzia, That he sought God in the daies of Zacharia (which vnderstand the visions of God) and when he was young, his heart was lifted up to his destruction: for he transgressed against the Lord his God: and went into the Temple of the Lord to burn incense, upon the Altar of incense. T thus he thought to enlarge his owne authority, by meddling in the Priests office, whose power had in euery extremitie bene so helpfull to the Kings of Iuda, that meere gratitude, and ciuill policie, should haue heid back Vzzia from inroaching thereupon; yea, though the law of God had bene silent in this case, and not forbidden it. Howsoeuer the King forgot his dutie, the Priests remembered theirs; and God forgate not to assist them. Azarias the high Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gaue him to vnderstand, how little to his honor it would proue, that he tooke vpon him the office of the Sonnes of Aaron. There were with Azarias fourescore other Priests, valiant men, but their valour was shewed, onely in assisting the high Priest, when (according to his dutie) hee reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himselfe performed. We finde in Iosephus, that the King had appalled himselfe in Priestly habit, and that hee sought Azarias and his Companions, to punish them with death, vnlesse they would be quiet. Iosephus, indeede, enlargeth the storie, by inserting a great earthquake, which did teare downe halfe an Hill, that rowled foure furlongs till it rested against another Hill, stopping vp the high waies, and spoiling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this earthquake, hee faith, that the roote of the Temple did cleaue, cleave, and that a Sunne beame did light vpon the Kings face, which was presently infected with leprosie. All this may haue beene true; and some there are who thinke that this earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos, wherein they doe much misse- reckon the times. For the earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the daies of Ieroboam King of Israel, who died seuen and thirtie yeares before Vzzias, so that Iotham the Sonne of Vzzias, which supplied his Fathers place in gouernement of the Land, should, by this account, haue beene then vnborne: for he was but liue and twentie yeares old, when hee beganne to raigne as King. Therefore, thus farre only we haue assurance; that while Vzzias was trist with the Priests, he leprosie rose vpon him, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caused, in all haste, to depart the place, and to liue in a house by himselfe, vntill he died; the ruler ouer the Kings house, and ouer all the Land, being committed to Iotham, his Sonne, and Successor. Iotham tooke not vpon himselfe the stile of King, till his Father was dead; whom they buried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred, yet in a Monument a part from the rest, because he was a Leaper.

Of the Prophets which liued in the time of Vzzias; and of Princes then ruling in Aegypt, and in some other Countreies.

IN the time of Vzzias were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Ied, Amos, Obadiah, and Ionas. It is not indeede set downe, when Ied, or Obadiah, did prophesie: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to be ranged (according to S. Hieromes rule) with the next before them; then must these two bee judged contemporarie with Hosea and Amos, who liued vnder King Vzzias. To enquire which of these fue was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer liued, hath so painfully bene sought, without reprehension; how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquitie of these holie Prophets? It seemes to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Ionas; who foretold the great victories of Ieroboam King of Israel; and therefore is like to haue prophesied in the daies of Ionas, whilst the affliction of Israel was exceeding bitter; the Text it selfe intimating no lesse: by which consequence, he was elder than the other Prophets, whose workes are now extant. But his prophecies, that concerned the Kingdome of Israel, are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seemes, not without reason, vnto some very learned, to haue belonged vnto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose daies Ninine was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expresse promises of the Messiah.

Hier. in prof. per Ezechiam.

In the raigne of Vzzias likewise it was, that Esaï, the first of the foure great Prophets, beganne to see his visions. This difference of greater and lesser Prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they haue left written (as S. Augustin giues reason of the distinction) because the greater haue written larger Bookes. The Prophet Esaï was great indeede, not only in regard of his much writing; or of his Nobilitie, (for their opinion is rejected, who thinke him to haue beene the sonne of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he liued; but for the excellencie, both of his stile, and argument, wherein he so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole historie of our Saviour, with the calling of the Gentils, that he might so well be called an Euangelist, as a Prophet; hauing written in such wise, that (as Hierome saith) one would thinke he did not foretell of things to come, but compile an Historie of matters already past.

Bocchoris was King of Aegypt, and the ninth yeare of his raigne, by our computation (whereof in due place we will giue reason) was current, when Vzzias tooke possession of the Kingdome of Iuda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Ashchis followed in the Kingdome of Aegypt, vnto him succeeded Anylis; and these two occupied that crowne lixe yeares. Then Sabac, an Ethiopian, became King of Aegypt, and held it fiftie yeares, whereof the ten first ranne along with the last of Vzzias his raigne and life. Of these and other Aegyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affaires shall come to be intermeddled with the businesse of Iuda.

In Achens, the two last yeares of Ariphron his twentie, the senen and twentieth of Thespis, the twentieth of Agamnestor, and three the first of Aeschylus his three and twentie, made euen with the two and fiftie of Vzzias: as likewise did in Alia the last seuen of Siluius Auentinus his seuen and thirtie, together with the three and twentie of Siluius Probus, and two and twentie the first of Siluius Anulius. In Media Arbaces beganne his new Kingdome, in the first of Vzzias, wherein, after eight and twentie yeares, his Sonne Sosarmus succeeded him, and raigned thirtie yeares. Of this Arbaces, and the diuision of the Assyrian Empire, between him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it conuenient to vñ more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great vncertaintie in the storie of the Assyrian Kings, who haue already found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to forget it.

§. IIII.

Of the Assyrian Kings, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belosys were one person; or heads of sundrie Families, that raigned a-part in Ninine and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly bene shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not only submit themselves in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to be judged by him, receiving by his authoritic sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited liues. The first example of this his power, was shewen vpon Belosus the Babylonian, by whose especial aduise and helpe, Arbaces himselfe was become so great. Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannical manner, as might giue offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generalitie of the people. For in the condemnation of Belosus, he vñed the counsaile of his other Captaines, and then pardoned him of his owne Grace; allowing him to hold, not only the Citie and Prouince of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embezzeling whereof his life had bene endangered.

In like manner, he giue rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Prouinces; retaining (as it appears) only the Soueraigntie to himselfe, which to vse immoderately he did naturally abhorre. He is said, indeede, to haue excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding vnto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, hee destroyed the Citie of Ninine; permitting the Citizens neuertheless to take and carrie away euerie one his owne goods. The other Nations that ioyned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians, he drew to his side, by the allurements of libertie; which he himselfe so greatly loued, that by slackning too much the reins of his owne Soueraigntie, hee did more harme to the generall estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enioyed, could recompence. For both the Territorie of that Countreie was pared narrower by Selmansar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom wee finde, in the Scriptures, to haue held some Townes of the

Meues; and the civill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deuces, the filth of Arbaces his Line, did make in that government, by reducing them into stricter termes of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to be such, as might in foure score yeares, if not sooner, both extend it selfe vnto the conquest of Israel, and teare away some part of Meues, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Nimue, and subuersion of the Assyrian Kingdome, whereof the Assyrians, vnder Arbaces, had the honour, who may seeme at that time to haue kept the Assyrians vnder their subiection, when the rest of the Prouinces were set at libertie; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who reigning afterwards in Babylon and Nimue, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their historie is made vncertaine.

I will first therefore deliuer the opinion generally received, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the objections made against it; I will compare together the determination of that wortheie man Ioseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereunto, and the iudgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or haue followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it be needfull to set downe a part the severall authorities and arguments of sundrie men, adding somewhat of weight or clearness one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: which I will doe as briefly as I can, and without feare to be taxed of partialitie, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancie of mine owne, but merely led by those reasons, which vpon examination of each part, seemed to me most forcible, though to others they may perhaps appeare weak.

That which, vntill of late, hath passed as current, is this; That Belofus was the same King who, first of the Assyrians, entred Palestina with an Armie; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annins his Authors with such as follow them, Phul Delochus. Of this man it is said, that he was a skillfull Astrologer, subtilie, and ambitious; that hee got Babylon by compulsion made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Assyria: finally, that he reigned eight and fortie yeares, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglat phalasar his Sonne, in whose Posteritie it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach prevailed. The truth of this, if Annins his Metasthenes were sufficient proofe, could not be gainesaid: for that Author (such as he is) is peremptorie herein. But, howsoever Annins his Authors deferre to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, who maintaine this Tradition, iustifie it by diuers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant vnto no Historie at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Isaaias (which is indeede the foundation whereupon all haue built) that Arbaces and Belofus were Partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Babylons, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie, as likewise other Captaines were with governments: but that any third Person was so eminent, as to haue Assyria it selfe, the chiefe Countrey of the Empire, bestowed vpon him, it is a thing whereof not the least appearance is found in any Historie. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians should be committed vnto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meete to trust them in their owne walls and houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Nimue by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policie, because thereby the people of that Nation might be kept downe, from aspiring to recover the Soueraignetie, which else they would haue thought to belong, as of right, vnto the Seate of the Empire.

Vpon such considerations did the Romans, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage, and dissolve the Corporation, or Bodie politike, of the Citizens of Cyprus; because those two Townes were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed dangerous dangerous euen to some it selfe, that was Mistris of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Assyrians in three or foure yeares had erected their Kingdome anew, vnder one Pul? or what must this Pul haue bene (Of whose descending, or entangling, or indeede of whose very name, we finde no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principall part of the Empire fell, either by generall consent in diuision of the Prouinces, or by his owne power and purchase very soone after? Surely he was none other than Belofus; who neare Neighbourhood gaue him opportunitie (as he was wise enough to play his owne game) both to get Assyria to himselfe, and to empeach any other man, that should haue attempted to ere vpon it. The Prouince of Babylon, which Belofus held, being (as Herodotus Headline reports) in riches, and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a businesse: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his owne hands all the gold and silver that had bene in the Palace of Nimue. And questionlesse to restore such a Citie as Nimue, was an enterprise fit for none to take in hand, except he had such means as Belofus had; which Pul, if he were not Belofus, is likely to haue wanted.

Besides all this, had Pul bene a distinct person from Belofus, and Lord of Assyria, which lay beyond the Countreies of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not haue bene an ealie matter for him, to passe quite through another mans Kingdome with an Armie, seeking bootie a farre off in Israel: the only action by which the name of Phul is knowne. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the same whom prophane writers haue called Belofus, Beleses, and Belefish, (in like manner as Iosephus acknowledgeth, that hee, whom the Scriptures called neuer otherwise than Darius the Mede, was the Sonne of Astages, and called of the Greekes by another name, that is, Cyrus) then is this scruple vtterly removed. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border vpon Syria and Palestina: so that Belofus, hauing led his affaires in Assyria towards the East and North, might with good leisure encroach vpon the Countreies that lay on the other side of his Kingdome, to the South and West. He that looks into all particulars, may finde euery one circumstance concurring, to proue that Phul who invaded Israel, was none other than Belofus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who joyned with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was ouerthrowne, did enter into that action, merely for the loue of Belofus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of maine importance, to those that were to passe our Euphrates with an Armie into Syria. Wherefore Belofus, that held good correspondence with them; and whose most fruitfull Prouince, adjoining to their barraine quarters, might yearly doe them inestimable pleasures; was not only like to haue quiet passage through their borders, but their utmost assistance; yea, it stands with good reason that they, who loved not Israel, should for their owne behoofe haue giuen him intelligence, of the destruction and ciuill broiles among the ten Tribes; whereby, as this Pul got a thousand talents, so it seemes that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heauie Neighbour of Ieroboam, recovered their owne, setting vp a new King in Damisco, and clearing the coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wilderness to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations diuided by Euphrates hold together in so good termes of friendship: it was ancient consanguinitie, the memorie whereof was available to the Syrians, in the time of Dauid, when the Aramites beyond the River came out willingly, to the succour of Helezer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belofus had good reason to looke in to those parts; what a King reigning so farre off as Nimue, should haue to doe in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to shew.

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Chaldeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, least it should seeme to haue ill coherence with that which hath bene said of the long Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes.

For if the Crowne of Iſrael were worne by no man in three and twentie yeares, then is it likely that Belſhus was either unwilling to ſurre, or vnable to take the advantage when it was faire, and ſhould diſcoured. This might haue compelled thoſe, who alone were not ſtrong enough, to ſeeke after helpe from ſome Prince that lay further off; and for the opinion of thoſe that diſtinguiſh Phul from Belſhus, would be ſomewhat confirmed. On the other ſide, if we lay, that Belſhus did paſſe the River of Euphrates, as ſoone as hee found likelihood of making a proſperous journey, then may it ſeeme that the inter-regnum in Iſrael was not ſo long as we haue made it; for three and twentie yeares leiſure would haue afforded better opportunities, which ouer not to haue bene loſt.

For if we hereunto, we are to consider; what Orosius and Eusebius have written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they prevailed and grew mighty, between the times of Arbaces and Lisaces the Medes. Now, though it be held an error of Orosius, where he supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldeans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Assyres; yet herein he and Eusebius doe concur, that the authoritie of Arbaces did retainne the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull only of it selfe. Now, though some have conjectured that all Assyria was given to Belusius (as an overplus, belides the Province of Babylon, which was his by plain bargain made aforehand) in regard of his high deservings, yet the opinion more commonly received is, that hee did only encroach vpon that Province by little and little, whilst Arbaces lived, and afterwards dealing more openly got it all himselfe. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelue yeares betweene the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Nabuchodonosors raigne; manifest it is, that the conquest of Assyria, and setting of that Countrey, was worke enough to hold Belusius occupied, belides the retournation of Ninive, which alone was able to take vpon all the time remaining of his raigne, if perhaps hee lusted to see it finished in his owne daies. So that this argument may rather serve to prove that Phul and Belusius were one person; forasmuch as the journey of Phul against Israel was not made vntill Belusius could finde leisure; and the time of advantage which Belusius did let slip, argued his businesse in some other quarter, namely in that Province of which Phul is called King. Briefly, it may be said, that he who conquered Assyria, and performed somewhat vpon a Countrey so farre distant as Assyria, was likeli to have bene, at least, named in some historie, or, if not himselfe, yet his Countrey to have bene spoken of for those victories: but we neither heare of Phul, in any prophane Author, neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victories or Acts whatsoever of the Assyrians, done in those times; whereas of Belusius, and the power of the Chaldeans, wee finde good record.

Surely, that great slaughter of so many thousand Affrians, in the quarrell of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and vntunefull warre, which ouerwhelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the ruine and vtter desolation of Nimue, must needs have so weakened the state of Affrya, that it could not in thirtie yeares space be able to innade Palastina, which the ancient King Sennacherib, reigning in Nimue, had, in all their greatnesse, forborne to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Countrey, did helpe to enable Belsus to subdue it; who hauing once extended his dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interposition of that Countrey, secure of the Scythians, and other warlike Nations on that side, might very well turne Southward, and trie his fortune in those Kingdomes, whereinto ciuile dissention of the inhabitants, and the bordering enuie of the Arabians and Armenians about Danabes, friends and coulins to the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians, did inuite him. For these, and the other before alledged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Pal in the Scriptures, ought to be vnderstood of Belsus; euen as by the names of Achab ne, Arctas, the Cyclops, Arctophila, and Arctophila, with the like, are thought, or known, to be meant the same, whom prophane Historians, by names better known in their owne Countries, haue called Nepolydes, Cyclopes, and Arctas: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath bene written of old, nor neede to trouble our felues and others with framing new coniectures. This in effect is that, which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly receiued.

Now this being once graunted, other things, of more importance, will of themselves easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Phul were Israels, or some other man: the whole race of these African and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Nabonassar, Marodoncampadius, and Nabodonassar (famous for the Astronomical obseruations recorded during their times) is the main ground of this contention. If therefore Belsus or Beldis were that Phul which invaded Israels; if he and his posterity reigned both in Astine and in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Asar, from whence Salmanassar, Sennacherib, and Asorhaddon descended; then is it manifest, that we must take Nabonassar, the Babylonian King, among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other then Salmanassar, who is knowne to haue reigned in those yeares, which Protonius the Mathematician hath assigned vnto Nabonassar. As for Menech, who (supplanted Asorhaddon, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all this difputation.

But they that maintaine the contrarie part, will not be satisfied with such conie-dures. They lay hold vpon the conclusion, and by shaking that into peeces, hope to ouerthrow all the premisses, vpon which it is inferred. For (say they) if Nabon-asar, that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanassar, or any of those other Assyrian Kings, then it is manifest, that the races were distinct, and that Phul and Belusur were several Kings. This consequence is so plaine, that it needs no confirmation. To proue that Nabonassar was a distinct person from Salmanassar, are brought such argu-30 ments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworn to hold the contrarie.
 For first, Nabonassar was King of Babylon, and not of Assyria. This is proued by his name, which is merely Chaldean, whereas Samus, the first part of Salmanassar name, is proper to the Assyrians. It is likewise proued by the Astronomical observations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Assyrians, doe shew, that Nabonassar, from whom Ptolemy draws that Ephemeris or account of time, was a Babylonian, and not Assyrian. Thirdly, and more strongly, it is confirmed by the successer of Nabonassar, which was Mordochapinus, called in his owne language Mero-dach-ban-pa, but more briefly in Esay his prophetic, Meredach, by the former part of his name; or Mordach Beladan, the sonne of Beladan. Now if Meredach, the 40 sonne of Beladan, King of Babel, were the sonne of Nabonassar, then was Nabanassar none other then Beladan King of Babel, and not Salmanassar King of Assyria.

What can be plain? As for the cadence of these two names, Salmassar and Salmassar, which in Greek or Latine writing hath no difference, were as taught by Scylax, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the paces of Babylonia, wherein Salmassar carried captive some part of the ten Tribes; it may well be granted, that in the Proxime of Babylon Salmassar had gotten somewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it selfe. To conclude, Mevlach becomme hisraigne over Babylon in the sixt year of Hezechai; at which time Salmassar tooke Samaris; therefore, if Salmassar were King of Babylon then 50 must we say that he and Mevlach, yea and Salmassar, were all one man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Nephes Baruch; who not contented to follow the common opinion, founded upon likelihood of conjectures, hath drawne his proofes from matter of more necessarie inference.

Touching all that was said before of Phil Be'lofus, for the proving that Phil and Be'lofus

Belus were not sundrie Kings; Ioseph Scaliger pitties their ignorance, that haue spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painfull men be confelseth that they were, who by their diligence might haue wonne the good liking of their Readers, had they not by mentioning Annus his Authors given such offence, that men refused therupon to reade their Bookes and Chronologies. A short answer.

For mine owne part, howeouer I beleue nothing that Annus his Berosus, Metasthenes, and others of that stampe affirme, in respect of their bare authoritie; yet am I not so squeamish, but that I can well enough digeit a good Booke, though I finde the names of one or two of these good fellows alleged in it; I haue (somewhat peradventure too often) already spoken my minde of Annus his Authors; neuerthelesse, I may say here againe, that where other Histories are silent, or speake not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we finde, and seruethe to expaine or enlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeede are those honest and painfull men (as Scaliger termes them, meaning, if I mistake him not, good filly fellows) who set downe the Assyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belus, and Sardanassus for Nabonassar, such Writers as a man should be ashamed or vnwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annus, though disliking him ingenerall) Gerard Mercator is not so slight a Chronologer, that hee should bee laughed out of doores, with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons betwene Scaliger and Mercator, they were both of them men notably learned: let vs examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force, as cannot either be refuted or auoided. It will easily be granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Assyria, some men doubt whether Scaliger's reasons be enough to proue. For though Nabonassar be a Chaldean name, and Sardanassus an Assyrian; yet what binders vs from beleeuing, that one man in two languages might bee called by two severall names? That Astronomie flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to proue Nabonassar either an Astrologer, or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himselfe calls them, prophetis nescio quos, qui Nabonassarum Astronomum fuisse in somnis viderunt; Propheti I know not who, that in their sleepe haue dreamt of Nabonassar that hee was an Astrologer.

Whether Nabonassar were an Astrologer or no I cannot tell; it is hard to maintain the negative. But as his being Lord ouer the Chaldeans, doth not proue him to haue beene learned in their sciences; so doth it not proue him, not to haue bene also King of Assyria. The Emperor Charles the first, who was borne in Germany, and Philip his Sonne, King of Spaine, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men farre more learned in all Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks; among their Subjects of the Low Countries, then were any that I read of then liuing in Spaine, if Spain at that time had any; yet I thinke, Posteritie will not vse this as an argument, to proue that Spain was none of theirs. It may well be, that Sardanassus for or Nabonassar, did vse the Assyrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Scholars: but it seemes, that he and his posteritie, by giuing themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued; as likewise King Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two vnsauerable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them, being me thinks none other than answers to somewhat that is or might be alleged on the contrarie side) one of them which is drawn from the like found and writing of those names, Sardanassus and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is not likeliesse of sound, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Sardanassus might be Lord of some places in the Prouince of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it selfe: this indeede might bee so, and it might bee otherwise.

Hitherto

Hitherto there is nothing false conjecture against conjecture. But in that which is alleged out of the Prophet Esaie, concerning Merodach the Sonne of Babylon; and in that which is said of this Merodach, or Mardochapadus, his being the Successor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to raigne in the sixt yeare of Heceta, I finde matter of more difficultie, then can be answered in hatt. I will therefore deferre the handling of these objections, untill I meete with their subject in his proper place, which will be when we come to the time of Heceta, wherein Merodach liued and was King. Yet that I may not leaue too great a scruple in the minde of the Reader, thus farre will I here fauour him; that how strongeouer this argument may seeme, Scaliger himselfe did liue to retract it, ingenuously confelting, that in thinking Merodach to be the Sonne of Nabonassar, he had beene deceived.

Now therefore let vs consider, in what sort they haue fashioned their storie, who taking Pul to be a distinct person from Belus or Belesus, haue in like sort, as was needfulle, distinguished their offspring, making that of Pul to faile in Sardanassus, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And here I must first confesse mine owne want of Bookes, if perhaps there be many, that haue gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present vnto vs the bodie of this Historie, in one view. Diuers, indeede, there are, whom I haue seene, that since Ioseph Scaliger delivered his opinion, haue written in fauour of some one or other point thereof:

22 But Seimus Calvisius himselfe, who hath abridged Scaliger's learned Worke, De emendatione Temporum, hath not bene carefull to giue vs notice, how long Belesus, Baldan, Pul, or Tiglat Palassar, did raigne, (perhaps because he found it not expresse in Scaliger); but is content to set downe Baldan, for the same person with Nabonassar, which Scaliger himselfe reuoked. In this case the more I must lay downe the plot of these diuided Kingdomes, in such sort as I finde it contriued by Angelus Tornielus; who only of all that I haue seene, sets downe the succession, continuance, and acts, of those that raigned in Assyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belus, and his Posteritie, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Tornielus is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annals were printed the last yeare; he appears to me a man of curious indutrie, sound iudgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Bookes hee hath receiued good information, and enriched his workes by inserting somewhat of theirs. But in this businesse he hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose helpe, without wrong or dishonour to himselfe, he hath both vsed and acknowledged. For mine owne part, I will not spare to doe right vnto Tornielus; but confesse my selfe to haue receiued benefit by his writing; and wish that his Annals had sooner come to light; for that as hee hath much confirmed mee in some things, so would hee haue instructed and emboldened mee, to write more fully and lesse timorously in other things, 49 which now I haue not leisure to reuise. Particularly in that conjecture (which I had faintly deliuered, and yet feared least it had ouer hastily palled out of my hand, and beene exposed to other mens constructions) of the foure Kings that invaded the Vallie of Araxes, and were slaine by Abraham, I finde him aduenturing, as I haue done, to say, that they may probably be thought to haue bene some pettie Lords; the contrarie opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let vs consider how he hath ordered these last Assyrian and Babylonian Kings.

After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Araxes being the most mightie, sought to gett all to himselfe, but was opposed by Belus, in which contention, one Phid, a powerfull man in Assyria, sided with Belus, and they two preuailed so farre, that finally Araxes was content to share the Empire with them, making such a diuision thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire, betwene Octavian, Anthony, and Leptinus.

Another conjecture is (for Tornielus offers not this, or the rest, as matter of conjecture) that Araxes made himselfe Soueraigne Lord of all, and placed the seat of

of his Empire in Assyria, appointing Belofus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Assyria. But in short space, that is, in foure yeares, it came to passe, by the iust judgement of God, that Phul and Belofus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sardanapalus, and in stead of being his Viceroyes, made themselves absolute Kings. And to this later opinion Tornellius himselfe leans, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former supposition, refusing to hold the later, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to guess. Having thus deuided, how Phul and Belofus might, at the first, attaine to be Kings, hee orders their time, and their successors, in this manner.

Foure yeares after Arbaces, Phul begins to raigne, and continues eight and foure yeares. Theglathphasar (whose name, and the names of other Princes, I write diuerly, according as the Authors whome I haue in hand are pleased to diuulge them) succeeding vnto Phul, raigned three and twentie. Salmansar followed him, and raigned tenne. After him Senacherib raigned seuen: and when he was illane, Asahaddon his sonne tenne yeares; in whome that Line failed.

The same time that Phul tooke vpon him as King of Assyria, or not long after, (why not rather afore? for so it had bene more likely) Belofus usurped the Kingdom of Babylon, and held it threecore and eight yeares; at the least threecore and eight yeares did passe, before Nabonassar followed him in the possession.

To Nabonassar, whome (with Scaliger) he thinks to be Babaiian, are assigned fixe and twentie yeares: then, two and fittie to Merodach, or Mardocempden: foure and twentie to Ben Merodach: and lastly, one and twentie to Nabulassar, the father of Nabuchodonosor, who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the originall of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truly say, That the conjectures of other men, who giue all to Belofus, and confound him with Phul, appeare to me more needrely resembling the truth. Neither doe I thinke, that Tornellius would haue conceiued two different wayes, by which Phul might haue gotten Assyria (for how Belofus came to get Babylon, it is plaine enough) if either of them aloue could haue contented him. He adheres to the later of the two, as better agreeing with Viodore, and other Historians. But he perceiued, that to make Phul on the Iudeiine King of Assyria; or to giue him so noble a Prouince, as would, of it selfe, inuite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing most unlikely to haue happened, vntill his deserts (whereof wee finde no mention) had bene proportionable to so high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) he deuided the meanes, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arise, VVhy this Phul, being one of the three that diuided all betweene them, was vtterly forgotten by all Historians? yea, why this Diuision it selfe, and the ciuile Warres that caused it, were neuer heard of. Questionlesse, the intruding of some Treasures by Belofus, with his Iudgement, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre lesse note. Therefore I doe not see, how one of the two inconueniences can this way be auoided; but that either we must confesse, the Dominion giuen to Phul to haue bene exceeding his merits, or els his merits, and name withall, to haue bene strangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make vs thinke, that rather the conjecture, inferring such a sequele, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul and Belofus against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Assyrians to recouer such strength in foure yeares, as might serue to hold out in rebellion: for Belofus, it was needlesse to rebell, considering, that Arbaces did not seeke to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an extraordinary fauourer of libertie) euen the Medes, that were vnder his owne Government, to doe what they listed.

But it is now fit that wee peruse the Catalogue of these Kings: not passing through them all (for some will require a large discourse in their owne times) but speaking of their order and time in generall. It it bee so vniuersall to thinke, that some of Annius his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may bee true, especially such, as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparant likelihood, why then is it said, that Phul did raigne in Assyria eight and fortie yeares? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true, that painefull and judicious Writers haue found this number of yeares, to agree vnto with the course of things in Historie: yet all of them tooke it from Annius. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annius his forgerie (as questionlesse he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tells truth, or probable, he be not beleeued for his owne sake; though for our owne sakes we make vse of his boldnesse, taking his wordes for good, whereas (nothing els being offered) wee are vnwilling our selues to be Authors, of new, though not vnprobable conjectures. Herein we shall haue this commoditie, that wee may without burling alter a litle, to helpe our owne opinions, and lay the blame vpon Annius, against whome we shall bee sure to find friends that will take our part.

The raignes of Theglathphasar and Salmansar did reach, by Annius his measure, to the length of nine and twentie yeares the one, and seauenteene the other; To. medus hath cut off two from the former, and seuen from the later of them, to fit (as it thinketh) his owne computation; vnto the libertie wherof I spake last: for that any Author, saue our good Metaphrastes, or those that borrow of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did raigne, it is more then I haue yet found. To Senacherib and Asahaddon, Tornellius giues the same length of raigne, which is found in Metaphrastes. I thinke there are not many, that will arrogate so much vnto themselves, as may well be allowed vnto a man so iudicious as is Tornellius: yet could I wish, that he had forborne to condemne the followers of Annius in this business, wherein he himselfe hath chosen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as els he must haue done, almost nothing.

The like libertie we finde that he hath vsed in measuring the raignes of the Chaldeans; fitting vp all the space betweene the end of Sardanapalus, and the beginning of Nabonassar, with the threecore and eight yeares of Belofus. In this respect it was, perhaps, that hee thought Belofus might haue begonne his raigne somewhat later then Phul: for threecore and eight yeares would seeme a long time for him to hold a Kingdom, that was no yong man when he tooke possession of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by shortning his raigne, seeing his life reacheth to the end of such a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a private man, enough for a long liuer. Indeede, eight and fortie yeares had bene somewhat of the most, considering that hee seemes by the storie to haue bene little lesse, at such time as hee joyned with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twentie yeares did well deserve that note (which Tornellius aduisedly giues) that if his raigne extended any so farre, then the raigne of such as came after him, occupied the middle time, vnto Nabonassar.

I neither doe reprehend the boldnesse of Tornellius, in conjecturing, nor the modestie of Scaliger and Seibius Caluissius, in forbearing to set downe as warrantable, such things as depend only vpon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from vs by Antiquitie, must be described in Historie, as Geographers in their Maps describe those Countries, whereof as yet there is made no true discovery: that is, either by leauing some part blanke, or by inserting the Land of Pigmes, Rocks of loadstones, with Head-lands, Bayes, great Riueres, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrarie to truth. Yet indeede the ignorance growing from distance of place, allowes not such libertie to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remediesse obliuion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet saith;

— Nec, seruidis
Pars inclufa caluibus
Asundi, nec Koreæ finitimum latus, Duratæq; solæ Nines,
Stercoratorem abigunt: horrida callidis Vincunt æquora Naxitæ.

Nor Southerne heate, nor Northerne snow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The subject Regions can fence,
And keepe the greedie Merchant thence.
The subtil Shipmen way will finde, Storme neuer so the Seas with winde.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe serue only to misleade such discouersers as rashly belecue them; drawing vpon the publishers, either some angrie curses, or well deserued scorn; but to keepe their owne credit, they cannot serue alwaies. To which purpose I remember a pretie jest of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthie Spanish Gentleman, who had bene employed by his King in planting a Colonie vpon the Streights of Magellan: for when I asked him, being then my Prisoner, some question about an Iland in those streights, which me thought, might haue done either benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters wines Iland; saying, That whilest the fellow drew that Mappe, his wife sitting by, desired him to put in one Countrie for her; that free, in imagination, might haue an Iland of her owne. But in filling vp the blankes of old Histories, we neede not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time should runne backward, and by restoring the things themselves to knowledge, make our conjectures appeare ridiculous: What if some good Copie of an ancient Author could be found, shewing (if wee haue it not already) the perfect truth of these vncertainties? would it be more shame to haue beleued the meane while, Annius or Tornellius, than to haue beleued nothing. Here I will not say, that the credit, which we giue to Annius, may chance otherwise to be giuen to one of those Authors whose names hee pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authoritie, I had rather trust Scaliger or Tornellius, than Annius; yet him than them, if his assertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approved Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it seemes to me; it hauing moreover gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meaneely learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions, as haue once gotten the credit of being generall, so to deale as Pacumini 40 Caput did with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senators of the Citie to death. He lockt the Senators vp within the State-houise, and offered their liues to the Peoples mercie; obtaining thus much, that none of them should perish, untill the Commonalty had both pronounced him worthe of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was hastie; for as fast as euery name was read, all the Towne cryed, Let him die: but the execution required more leisure; for in substituting another, some notorious vice of the Person, or baseness of his condition, or insufficiencie of his qualitie, made each new one that was offered to be rejected: so that finding the worke and lesse choise, the further and the more that they fought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept for lack of better. 50 of the Olympiads, and the time when they beganne.

After this diuision of the Affirrian Empire, follows the institution of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the raigne of the same King Vezia, and in his one and fiftieth year. It is, I know, the generall opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Iulian: yet is not that opinion so generall, but that Authors, weightie enough, haue giuen to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things vnto the sacred Historie, which are found in prophane Authors, we should not bee too carefull of drawing the Hebrewes to those workes of time, which had no reference to their affaires; it is enough, that setting in due order these beginnings of accompts, we joyne them to matters of Israell and Inda, where occasion requires.

The Olympian games and exercises of actiuitie, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the race by his owne foot; by which Pythagoras found out the stature and likely strength of Hercules his bodie. They tooke name, not from the Mountain Olympus, but from the Citie Olympia, otherwise Pisa, neare vnto Elis, where also Iupiter Temple in Elis, famous among the Grecians, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was knowne by the name of the Temple of Iupiter Olympius. These games were exercised from cuertury fourth year complete, in the plaines of Elis, a Citie of Peloponnesus, neare the Ruer Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many yeares, till Iphitus by aduise from the Oracle of Apollon, re-established them, Lycorgus the Law-giuer then liuing: from which time they were continued by the Grecians, till the raigne of Theodosius the Emperour, according to Cædrenus: other thinke that they were disolued vnder Constantine the Great.

From this institution, Varro accompted the Grecian times, and their stories, to be so certain: but reckoned all before either doubtfull, or fabulous: and yet Plinie giues little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the raigne of Cyrus, who beganne in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eusebius out of Liodore, Cyslor, Polybius, and others hath gathered, in whose time the seuen wise Grecians flourished. For Selen had speech with Craesus, and Craesus was ouerthrowne and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing Braines haue laboured to finde out the certaine beginning of these Olympiads, namely to set them in the true yeare of the World, and the raigne of such and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first accompt, that is, of the Worlds yeare, they can hardly iumpe in particulars thereon depending. Cædrenus against Iulian, and Didymus, beginne the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Troas or Azuth.

Eusebius who is contrarie to himselfe in this reckoning, accompts with those that find the first Olympiad in the beginning of the foure hundredth and sixth yeare after Troy, yet he telleth vs that it was in the fiftieth yeare of Vezia, which is (as I find it) two yeares later.

Eusebius placeth the first Olympiad foure hundred and seuen yeares after Troy, reckoning the yeares that passed betweene; to whom Dionysius Halicarnassensis, Dionidius Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere.

The distance betweene the destruction of Troy, and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Erastophilus. From the taking of Troy to the descent of Hercules his Posteritie into Peloponnesus, were fourescore yeares; thence to the Ionian expedition, threescore yeares; from that expedition to the time of Lycorgus his gouernement in Sparta, one hundred fiftie nine; and thence to the first Olympiad, one hundred and eight yeares. In this account the first yeare of the first Olympiad is not included.

Ddd

Eet

But vaine labour it were, to seeke the beginning of the Olympiads, by numbering the yeares from the taking of Troy, which is of a date farre more vncertaine. Let it suffice, that by knowing the instauration of these games, to haue bene in the foure hundredth and eight yeare current after Troy, wee may reckon back to the taking of that Citie, setting that, and other accidents, which haue reference thereto, in their proper times. The certaintie of things following the Olympiads, must teach vs how to finde when they beganne.

To this good vse, we haue the ensuing yeares, vnto the death of Alexander the Great, thus diuided, by the same Eratosthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads, to the passage of Alexis into Greece, two hundredth fourescore and seuenteen yeares; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre, eight and fortie yeares; forwards to the victorie of Lysander, seuen and twentie; to the battaile of Leuctra, thirte ioure; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, siue and thirte; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelue. The whole summe ariseth to foure hundred fiftie and three yeares; which number he otherwise also collecteth, and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth yeare of Vzziah, we haue arguments, grounded vpon that which is certaine, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his raigne, and the death of Alexander; as also vpon the Astronomical calculation of sundrie Eclipses of the Sunne as of that which happened when Alexes set out of Sardis with his Armie to invade Greece; and of diuers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his raigne as King, before hee was Lord of the great Monarchie, began the first yeare of the siue and fiftieth Olympiad, and that he reigned thirte yeares; they who giue him but twentie nine yeares of raigne (following Herodotus, rather than Tullie, Iustine, Eusebius, and others) beginne a yeare later, which comes all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander let by all good Writers, in the first yeare of the hundredth and fourteenth Olympiad. This later note of Alexander's death, serues well to leade vs back to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like observations doe. For if we reckon vpwards from the time of Alexander, we shall finde all to agree with the yeares of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus beganne his raigne, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to signifie a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first yeare of the siue and fiftieth Olympiad, vnto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundredth and twelfth Olympiad, we finde two hundred and thirte yeares compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchie, which lasted but seuen yeares, we finde compleat two hundred and seuen yeares, which was the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first yeare of Cyrus his Monarchie (which was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundredth and fortieth yeare from the institution of those games by Iphitus, followed the last of the seuentie yeares, of the captiuitie of Iuda, and desolation of the Land of Israel; manifest it is, that we must reckon back those seuentie yeares, and one hundred threescore and ten yeares more, the last which passed vnder the Kings of Iuda, to finde the first of these Olympiads; which by this accompt is the one and fiftieth of Vzziah, as wee haue already noted.

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serue well to the same purpose. For examples sake, that which was scene when Alexes mustered his Armie at Sardis, in the two hundredth threescore and seuenth yeare of Nabonessors, being the last of the threescore and fourteenth Olympiad; leades vs back vnto the beginning of Alexes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we haue a faire way through the threescore and ten yeares, vnto the destruction of Ierusalem; and so vpwards through the raignes of the last Kings of Iuda, to the one and fiftieth yeare of Vzziah.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads beganne.

To tell the great solemnitie of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say, that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running, Wrestling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they only contend for the Maistrie in those feats, whereof there was good vse, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bats, and other the like ancient kinds of exercises, that serued only for ostentation. Thither also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselves excellent in any laudable qualitie, to make triall of their skill. Yeatie very Cryers, which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them should get the honour, of hauing plaied the best part.

The Elems were Presidents of those Games; whose iustice, in pronouncing without partialitie, who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards giuen to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Paime, or Oliue, without any other commoditie following, then the reputation. Indeede there needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Diagoras had scene his three Sonnes crowned for their seuerall victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Morre DIAGORAS, non enim in calum ascensus es; that is, Die DIAGORAS, For thou shalt not clime up to heauen: as if there could bee no greater happinesse on earth, than what already had befallen him. In the like sense Horace speaks of these Victors, calling them,

Palma caelestis.

Horat. Carm. l. 4
Etc.

Such as like heauenly wights doe come
With an Eleian Garland home.

Neither was it only the voice of the People, or the Songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had wonne these Olympian prizes; but euen graue Historians thought it a matter worthe of their noting. Such was (as Tullie counts it) the vanitie of the Greekes, that they esteemed it almost as great an honor, to haue wonne the victorie at Running or Wrestling in those games, as to haue triumphed in Rome for some famous victorie, or conquest of a Prouince.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moone, and vpon the fiftieth day of the Moneth Hecatombion, which doth answer to our Iune; and what means they vsed to make the Moneth beginne with the new Moone, that the fiftieth day might be the full; I haue shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now returne vnto the Kings of Iuda, and leaue the merrie Greekes at their games, whom I shall meeete in more serious employments, when the Persian quarrells draw the bodie of this Historie into the coasts of Ionia and Ilellespont.

IOHAM the Sonne of Vzziah, when he was siue and twentie yeares old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was annointed King in Ierusalem, his Father yet liuing. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple of threescore cubits vpright, and therefore called Ophel: besides diuers Cities in the Hills of Iuda, and in the Forrests, Towers, and Palaces: he enforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundredth talents, and of Wheate and Barly two thousand measures: hee reigned siue and twentie yeares: of whom Iosephus giues this testimonie. Eusebius vero Princeps

Princes his just, yet unalloyed in eo virtutis genus desideres: ut qui Deum adeo pre colunt, hominibus suis adeo in se prestant, ut eos ipsam mente sibi cura esse passus sit, & tunc pere auerit, et uniuersum regnum habilius quicquam minime contemnendum, domesticum autem eius in eis atque ciuibz felix, fasces et fortunatum sua virtute effecerit; This was such a Prince, as a man could find no kinde of vertue wanting in him: he was so religiously, he governed his men so righteously, he was so provident for the Citie, and did so greatly amplify it, that by his vertue and proesse he made his whole Kingdome not contemptible to his enemies, but to his Seruants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperous and happy.

This is all that I finde of Iotham: his raigne was not long, but as happy in all things, as he himselfe was deuout and vertuous.

Auchomenes about this time succeeded Pheloxenus in Corinth: after whome, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which gouerned from yeare to yeare. And yet Pausanias in his second Booke, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places are of opinion, That Corinth was gouerned by Kings of the race of the Esarids, to the time of Cypselus, who droue them out.

Tiglatphalsar, or Tiglathepher, the sonne of Plul, the second of the Babyloniens and Assyrians that was of this new race, about this time invaded Israel, while Iehak (who murdered his Master Pekadus) was King thereof. In which Expedition he tooke most of the Cities of Neptali and Gad, with those of Gilead, ouer Irach, and carried the inhabitants captiue. This Tiglat reigned fife and twentie yeares, according to Metathenes. But Isentzenius findes, that with his sonne Salmassar he reigned yet two yeares longer: which yeares I would not ascribe to the sonne, because the era of Nabonissar begins with his single raigne, but reckon them to Tiglat Phalsar himselfe, who therewith reigned seuen and twentie yeares.

Aschylus, the sonne of Aganestor, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled fife and twentie yeares. Alcmenes gouerned Sparta: after whome, the Estate changed, according to Eufebius: but therein surely Eufebius is mistaken. For Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others, witness the contrarie. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and reigned threethree yeares, and out-lived the Assyriack Warre: which was ended by Theopompus, the sonne of Alexander, his royall companion.

At this time liued Nabunus the Prophet, who fore-told the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the Citie of Nimue; which succeeded (sayth Iosephus) a hundred and fiftene yeares after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Meditia, Salsarius and Medicus reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

§. VII.

Of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

2. Kings, 16. 1.
A. Chron. 32.

AS, or Achaz, succeeded vnto Iotham in the fifteneenth yeere of Pek, the sonne of Remas: the same being also the last yeare of his fathers raigne, who began in the second of the same Pek, and reigned sixteen, but not complete yeares. This Achaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. He made molten Images for Babilon, and burnt his sonne for sacrifice before the Idoll Atach, or Saturne, which was represented by a man-like brazen bodie, bearing the head of a Calf, set vp not farre from Ierusalem, in a Valley so shadowed with Woods, called Gehennom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is vied for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the carcasse of this Idoll, and as the fire encreased, so the sacrificers, with a noyse of Cymbals and other Instruments, filled the ayre, to the end the pitifull cries of the children might might not be heard: which vnnatural, cruell, and diuillish Oblation, Ieremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome vpon the tenth of Mattheu hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leuiticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible inue was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomie, it is called an abomination which God hateth. That it was also practised elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Iudea, diuers Authors witness: as Vergil in the second of his Aeneids, — Sanguine placuisse, &c. and Silius, — Poscere caele Deos. Saturne is said to haue brought this custome into Italie, besides the casting of many soules into the Riuer of Tyber, in stead of which, Ereules commanded that the waxen Images of men should be throwne in and drowned. The Deuill also taught the Carthaginians this kinde of butcherie, in so much that when their Citie was besieged, and in distresse, the Priest made them beleue, that because they had spared their owne children, and had bought and brought vp others to bee offered, that therefore Saturne had stirred vp and strengthened their Enemies against them: whereupon they presently caused two hundred of the noblest youths of their Citie to be slaine, and offered to Saturne or Satan, to appeale him: who besides these fore-named Nations had instructed the Rhodiens, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Messina, of Galatia, with the Masagets, and others, in these his seruices: Further, as if hee were not content to destroy the soules of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa, (as Asella writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Deuill vnder this fearful scrutide, in which he also holdeth the Floridians and Verginians at this day.

For the wickednesse of this King Achaz, God stirred vp Rezin of Damascus, and Pekab the Sonne of Remalah, King of Israel against him, who invaded Iudea, and besieged Ierusalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, posselt himselfe of Elab by the Red Sea, and cast the Jew out of it, and Pekab slaughtered in one day twelue hundred thousand Iudeans, of the ablest of the Kingdome, at which time Stasferas the Sonne of Achanath was also slaine by Ziebrhi, with Azyrikam the Gouernour of his house: and Achanath the second person vnto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand prisoners of women and children, the Israelites led away to Sennaria: but by the counsell of the Prophet Osai, they were returned and deliuered back againe.

As Israel and Aram vexed Iuda on the North; so the E.ionites and the Phalissins, who euermore attended the ruine of Iudea, entred vpon them from the South; and tooke Bethemes, Aidon, Gaderoth, Sacho, Tinnash, and Gemoza, slew many people, and carried away many prisoners. Whereupon when Achaz saw himselfe enuironed on all sides, and that his Idolls and dead Gods gaue him no comfort, hee sent to the Assyrian Tiglatphaser, to desire some aide from him against the Israelites and Aramites, presenting him with the silver and gold both of the Temple, and Kings Houle.

Tiglatphaser wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that rose in Palsima. His Father hauing lately made himselfe from a Prouincial Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Assyria, had a little before led him the way into Iudea, invited by Menahem King of Israel. Wherefore now the Sonne willingly hearkened to Achaz, and embraced the advantage. As for Belacius himselfe, he was content to assigne some other time for going through with this enterprise: because (as I haue said before) he was not firmly settled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet strong both in men and fame. But Tiglat, hauing now, with the treasures of Ierusalem, prepared his Armie, first invaded the Territory of Damascus, wanne the Citie, and killed Rezin, the last of the race of the Adads, who beganne with Dauid and ended with this Achaz. At Damascus Achaz met Tiglat, and taking thence a patterne of the Altar sent it to Ysieh the Priest, commanding the like to be made at Ierusalem, whereon at his returne hee burnt Sacrifice to the Gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglat posselt all Basan, and the rest beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Tribe of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse. And then passing the River, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the Kingdome of Israel, and made them his Vassalls. And notwithstanding that he was invited and wooed by Achaz, yet after the spoile of Israel, he posset himselfe of the greater part of Juda, and as it seemeth enforced Achaz to pay him Tribute. For in the second of Kings the eighteenth it is written of Ezechia, that he revolted from Assur, or rebelled against him, and therefore was invaded by Sennacherib. After Achaz had beheld and borne these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth year of his raigne hee died: but was not buried in the Sepulchers of the Kings of Juda.

With Achaz lived Mediasus, the third Prince in Media, who governed forty years, 10 saith Eusebius: Diodorus and Ctesias finde Anticarmus in stead of this Mediasus, to have beene Sosanus his Succellour, to whom they giue fiftie yeares.

Tiglath Phileser held the Kingdome of Assyria, all the raigne of Achaz: yet so, that Salmansassar his Sonne may seeme to haue raigned with him some part of the time. 10
For we finde that Achaz did send unto the Kings of Assyria to helpe him. The Geneua note saies, that these Kings of Assyria were Tiglath Phileser, and those Kings that were vnder his Dominion. But that hee or his Father had hitherto made such conquests, as might giue him the Lordship ouer other Kings, I doe neither finde any Historie, nor circumstance that proueth. Wherefore I thinke that these Kings of Assyria were Tiglath, and Salmansassar his Sonne, who raigned with his Father, as 20 hath bene said before: though how long hee raigned with his Father, it bee hard to define.

At this time beganne the Ephori in Lacedaemon, a hundred and thirtie yeares after Lycurgus, according to Plutarch. Eusebius makes their beginning farre later, namely in the fiftenth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first, Theopompus and Polydorus, being then joynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen euery yeare, were controuersers, as well of their Senators as of their Kings, nothing being done without their aduise and consent. For (saith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls. In the time of Achaz died Aeschylus, who had ruled in Athenes euery since the fiftith yeare of Vezias. Alexandron the thirteenth of the Medontide, or Gouernours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Cadmus) succeeded his Father Aeschylus, and was the last of these Gouernours: he ruled only two yeares. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Cadmus) to Gouernours for life: which ending in this Alexandron, they erected a Magistracie whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of Burgomaster or Gouernor of their Citie for ten yeares.

This alteration Pausanias in his fourth Booke beginnes in the first year of the eight Olympiad. Eusebius and Hieronymus in the first of the seventh Olympiad: at which time indeede, Careus the first of these, beganne his ten yeares rule.

The Kingdome of the Latines gouerned about three hundred yeare by the Sylluij, of the race of Aeneas, tooke end the same Achaz time: the foundation of Rome 40 being layed by Romulus and Remus in the eight yeare of the same King. Coleman buildeth the eleuenth of Achaz, Bucholzer in the eighth as I thinke he should, others somewhat later, and in the raigne of Ezechia. Cicero, Eutropius, Orosius, and others, square the time of the foundation to the third yeare of the sixth Olympiad. But Hieronymus, Solinus, Antiochenus, Clement, Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first yeare of the seventh: who seeme not only to mee, but to many very learned Chronologers, to haue kept herein the best account.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Antiquities of Italie, and foundation of Rome in the time of Achaz.

§. I.

Of the old Inhabitants, and of the name of Italie.

N here to speake of the more ancient times of Italie, and what Nations posselt it before the arriual of Aeneas, the place may seeme to inuite vs: the rather because much fabulous matter hath bene mixed with the truth of those elder plantations. Italie before the fall of Troy, was knowne to the Greekes by diuers names: as first Hesperia, then Ausania, the one name arising of the Seate, the other of the Ausones, a people inhabiting part of it: one ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri: whom Hieronymus thinks to haue beene the first, that brought a Colonie of Arcaidians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italie of Italus: concerning which changes of names, Virgil speaks thus.

Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque vberis gleba:
Oenotrij coluere viri, nunc famaminores
Italiam dixisse, datus de nomine, gentem.

There is a Land which Greekes Hesperia name, Ancient, and strong, of much fertilitie.
Oenotrians held it, but we haue by fame,
That by late ages of Posteritie,
T is from a Captaines name called Italus.

Who this Captaine or King may haue beene, it is very vncertaine. For Virgil 40 speakes no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued so long vpon the whole Countrey, and worne out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to finde out the originall of this name, and the first planters of this noble Countrey, Remenius hath made a very painfull search, and not improbable conjecture. And first of all he grounds vpon that of Hieronymus, 45 who speaks of a Colonie which the Eleans did leade into Italie, before the name of Italie was giuen to it: Secondly, vpon that of Isidore, who saith, that Brundisium was a Colonie of the Aetolians: Thirdly, vpon that of Strabo, who affirms the same of Temesa or Templa, a Citie of the Brutij in Italie: Lastly, vpon the authority of Plinie, who shewes that the Italians did inhabit only one Region of the Land, whence afterward the name was deriued ouerall. Concerning that which is said of the Eleans and Aetolians, who (as he shewes) had one originall; from them hee brings the name of Italus. For the word Italis, differs in nothing from Attolis, saue that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greeke word:

Hieronymus, 12.

Isidore, 12.

Plinie, 13. 4.

word is common, and the letter (o) is changed into (a): which change is found in the name of Attila, an Island neere Itale, peopled by the Æthiops: and the like changes are very familiar in the Æolic Dialect, of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Ætolians, the accent and pronunciation, together with many words, little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionysius Halicarnassensis, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach. Hercunto appertaines that of Iulian the Apostata, who called the Greekes cousins of the Latines. Also the common originall of the Greekes and Latines from Ianus; and the Fable of Ianus, whose Image had two faces, looking East and West, as Greece and Itale lay, and was stamped on Coynes, with a Shippe on the other side; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Ianus, father of the Greekes and Latines: who sayling over the Ionian Sea, that lyes betweene Ætolia and the Westerne parts of Greece and Itale, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reynecius thinks, that the names of Atlas and Italus belonged both to one man, and thereto applies that of Hercules, who called Cethum, Italus; though it may seeme strengthened by the marriage of Dardanius, whilest he abode in Itale with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, easily disproved. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moyses: and if Atlas were Cethum or Italus, then was he the sonne of Ianus and nephew of Ispheth, the eldest sonne of Rebus: which antiquitie farre exceeds the name of Itale, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the Countrey, not long before the Warre of Troy.

Likewise Virgil, who speaks of Atlas, and of Dardanius his marriage with Electra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Itale; but calleth Electra and her sister Maia (poetically) daughters of the Mountaine Atlas in Æties, naming Italus among the Kings of the Aborigenes; which he would not haue done, had Atlas and Italus bene one person.

As for the authoritie of Berosus in this case, we neede the lesse to regard it, for that Reynecius himselfe, whose conjectures are more to be valued then the dreames wherewith Annus hath filled Berosus, holdes it but a figment.

That the name of Itale began long after Atlas, it appeares by the Verses of Virgil last rehearsed, wherein hee would not haue said, — Nunc forma minores Italiam dixisse duces de nomine gentem, — had that name bene heard of ere Dardanius left the Countrey. But seeing that, when Hercules, who died a few years before the Warre of Troy, had left in Itale a Colonie of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the same Nation with the Ætolians, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Pausanias teach) then the name of Itale began: and seeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldnesse to say, that Italus was Commander of these Eleans. For though I remember not, that I haue read of any such Greeke as was named Italus, yet the name of Ætolus, written in Greece Attilus, was very famous both among the Ætolians, and among the Eleans, he being sonne of a King of Elis, and founder of the Ætolian Kingdome. Neither is it more hard to deriue the name Italus from Ætolus, then Italia from Ætolia. So may *Virgil*s authoritie stand well with the collections of Reynecius; the name of Itale being taken both from a Captaine, and from the Nation, of which he and his people were.

§. II.

of the Aborigenes, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reason of the names of Latini and Latium.

IN Itale the Latines and Hetrurians were most famous; the Hetrurians having held the greatest part of it vnder their subjection; and the Latines by the vertue and felicitie of the Romans, who were a branch of them, subduing all Itale, and in few ages whatsoever Nation was knowne in Europe: together with all the Westerne parts of Æs, and North of Asick.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigenes, whom Halicarnassensis, Varro, and Reynecius (following them) thinke to haue bene Arcadians: and this name of Aborigenes (to omit other significations that are strained) imports as much as originall, or native of the place, which they possessed: which title the Arcadians are knowne in vaunting manner to haue alwaies vsurped, fetching their antiquitie from beyond the Moone; because indeede, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponnesus enforced to forsake their seats so oft as other Greekes were, who dwelt without that halfe Island, neither had the Arcadians so vnure a dwelling as the rest of the Peloponnesians, because their Countrey was lesse fruitful in land, mountainous, and hard of access, and they themselves (as in such places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of these therefore hauing occupied a great part of Latium, and held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, stile themselves Aborigenes, in that language, which either their new Scate, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might bee that the Arcadians who dwell somewhat farre from Sea, and are alwaies noted as vnapt men to proue good Mariners, should haue bene Authors of new discoveries, were a question not easie to be answered, were it not so, that both fruitfulness of children, in which those ages abounded, inforceth the superstitious companie to seeke another scate, and that some expeditions of the Arcadians, as especially that of Eumander, into the same parts of Itale, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigenes, were the Pelasgi, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gaue name to all Greece: but their antiquities are long since dead, for lack of good records. Neither was their glorie such in Itale, as could long sustain the name of their owne Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Ausones, Aurunci, Ruthi, and other people, did in ages following disturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to some ciuilitie; and he therefore canonized as a God.

This Saturne S. Augustine calleth Stercor or Stercilius, others terme him Stercorinus, and say, that hee taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium tooke his name of Saturne, because he did leuere, that is he hidde there, when he fled from Iupiter, it is questionlesse a fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanitie to thinke that any thing could be hidde from God, or that there were many Gods of whom one fled from another; so in the truth of Historie, it is well knowne, that no King reigning in those parts was so mighty, that it should bee hard to finde one Countrey or an other, wherein a man might be safe from his pursuif. And yet, as most fables and poeticall fictions, were occasioned by some ancient truth, which either by ambiguity of speech or some allusion, they did mainly and darkely expresse: (so for they fained a passage ouer a Riuer in Hell, because death is a passage to another life, and because this passage is hatefull, lamentable, and painefull, therefore they named the Riuer Styx of Hate, Cocytus of Lamentation, and Acheron of Pain: so also because men are stonie hearted, and because the Greeke neust people, and neust stones, are neare in found, therefore they fained in the time of Dedalion (stones converted into men, as at other times men into stones) in like manner it may borne before Tecubus came into Italie. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Hieronymus call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Vare, who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might be deriued from the Grecke name Pallas. Amata, which significth beloued, or decre, was the name by which the High Priest called euery Virgin, whom he tooke to serue as a Nunne of Vesta; wherefore it is the more easily to be thought a surname, howsoever Virgil discoure of her and Penelia her sister.

Lauius, the daughter of Latium, being giuen in marriage to Æneas, the Kingdome of Latium, or the greatest part of that Countrey, was established in that race: wherein it continued vntill it was ouer-grown by the might and greatnesse of the Romans.

§. IIII.

Of Æneas, and of the Kings and Governours of Alba.

Æneas himselfe being of the royall blood of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Troians. By his wife Cressa, the daughter of Tricus, he had a sonne called Ascanius, whose surname was Iulus, (as Virgil notes) became surname Iulus. But when Æneas was dead, his wife Lauius, the daughter of Latium, being great with child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fledde into the Woods, where she was deliuered of a sonne, called thereupon Sylvius, and surname Posthumus, because he was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lauius was so cuill taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her returne, entreated her honourably, and visiting her as a Queene, did foster her young sonne, his halfe-brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards, whether to auoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place; Ascanius leaving to his mother in law the Citie Lutetia, which Æneas had built, and called after his new wifes name, founded the Citie Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his reigne was, according to some, eight and twentie yeares: Virgil giues him thirtie; others siue and thirtie, and eight and thirtie. After his deceale, there arose contention betwene Sylvius, the sonne of Æneas, and Iulus the sonne of Ascanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lauius, Iulus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leauing the Kingdome to Sylvius Posthumus, whose posteritie were afterward called Sylui.

The reigne of the Alban Kings, with the continuance of each mans reigne, I finde thus set downe.

1. Sylvius Posthumus.	29
2. Sylvius Æneas.	31
3. Sylvius Latinius.	30

Ilia, called also Rhea and Sylvia.

Romulus. Remus.

The

The most of these Kings liued in peace, and did little or nothing worthe of remembrance.

Latinius founded many Townes in the borders of Latium: who standing much vpon the honour of their originall, grew thereby to be called Prisci Latini. Of Tiberinus some thinke that the Riuer Tiber had name, being formerly called Albulas: but Virgil giues it that denomination of another called Tiberis, before the coming of Æneas into Italie. The Mountaine Auentinus had name (as many write) from Auentinus King of the Albanes, who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Iulius, the brother of Auentinus, is named by Eusebius as father of another Iulius, and grandfather of Iulius Proculus, who leauing Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome. Numitor, the elder sonne of Procius, was depriued of the Kingdome by his brother Amulius, by whom also his sonne Aggeus was slaine, and Iulia his daughter made a Nunne of Vesta, that thereby the illue of Numitor might be cut off. But she conceiued two sonnes, either by her vncl Amulius, as some thinke, or by Mars, as the Poets saie; or perhaps by some man of warre: both the children their vncl commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quicke, according to the Law, which so ordained, when the Vestall Virgins brake their chastitie. Whether it was so, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Antiocha, the daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preserued, who afterward reuenged the crueltie of their vncl, with the slaughter of him and all his, and restored Numitor their grandfather to the Kingdome: wherein how long he reigned I finde not, neither is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latium were presently eclipsed by the swift encrease of Rome, vpon which the computation of Time following (as farre as concerns the things of Italie) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdome of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male issue. Romulus chose rather to liue in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were governed by Magistrats; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Clulius, who in the dayes of Tullius Hostilius, King of the Romans, making Warre vpon Rome, died in the Campe; and Metius Sufestus, the successor of Clulius, who surrendered the Estate of Alba vnto the Romans, having committed the hazard of both Signories to the successe of three men of each side, who decided the quarrell by Combat: in which, the three brethren Horatii, the Champions of the Romans, preuailed against the Curiatii, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullius Hostilius with the Alban forces against the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battaile, hoping thereby to leaue the Romans to such an ouerthrow, as might make them weake ynough for the Albanes to deale with. Tullius notwithstanding this falsehood obtaining the victorie, rewarded Metius with a cruell death, causing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and so torne in peeces. Then was Alba destroyed, and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patriians; among which were the Iulij: of whom C. Iulius Cesar being descended, not onely gloried in his auncient, royall, and forgotten pedigree, in full assemblie of the Romans, then governed by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare industrie, valour, and iudgement obtained the Soueraignetic of the Roman Empire, much by him enlarged, to himselfe and his posteritie; whereby the name of Æneas, and honor of the Troian and Alban Race, was so reuiued, that seldom, if euery, any one Familie hath attained to a proportionable height of glorie.

of the beginning of Rome, and of ROMULVS birth and death.

Rome, which deuoured the Alban Kingdome, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat vncertaine) depend much vpon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-child of Numerus, the last that reigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations betweene Euphrates and the Ocean were broken in peeces by the yron teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to be described in one place, hauing bene the worke of many Ages; whereof I now doe handle onely the first, as incident vnto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius, Pictor, Portius, Cato, Calpurnius Piso, Semprenius, and others, seeke to deriue the Romans from Ianus: but Herodotus, Marcellus, and many others of equall credit, giue the Grecians for their ancestors; and as Strabo reporteth in his fifth booke, CAECILIUS rerum Romanorum scriptor eo argumento colligit, Romam à Graecis esse conditam quod Romani Graeco ritu, antiquo instituto HERCVLI rem sacram faciunt, matrem quoque EVANDRI venerantur humani; CAECILIUS (saith he) a Romane Historiographer, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greekes, because the Romans, after Greekish fashion, by ancient Ordinance doe sacrifice to HERCVLES: the Romans also worship the mother of EVANDER.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembers many founders of that Citie: as Romulus, the sonne of Phylus and Circe; Romus the sonne of Enathion, whome Dionides sent thither from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who drave the Tuscan out of that Countrey, built it. Solinus bestowes the honour of building Rome vpon Euander, saying, That it was before times called Valentia. Heraclides giues the denomination to a captiue Ladie, brought thither by the Grecians: others say, That it was auiently called Febris, after the name of Februs, the mother of Mars; witnesse Saint Augustine in his third Booke de Ciuitate Dei. But Linc will haue it to be the worke of Romulus, euen from the foundation: of whome and his conforts I haue tolde a Roman Citizen vaunting of their originall, answered in these Verles:

Maiores quisquis primus fuit ille tuorum, Aut pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.*

Yet though thou fetch thy pedigree so farre;
Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepherd was, or else, that Ile forbear, meaning either a Shepherd, or a Theefe.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and prefection, it is said, That hee had Rhea for his mother, and Mars was supposed to be his father; that he was nursed by a Wolfe, found and taken away by Faustula, a Shepherds wile. The same vnnatural nursing had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch saith, it is like ynough that Amulius came couered with armor to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with child; and therein it seemeth to me that he might haue two purposes: the one, to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heire of his elder brother, from whom he iniuriouly held the Kingdome; the other to satisfie his appetite, because shee so was faire and goodly. For shee being made a Nunne of the Goddesse Vesta, it was death in her, by the Law, to breake her chastitie. I also finde in Faustulus his Antiquities de Gaule, that Aterouus, King of the Franks, was begotten by a monster of the Sea: but Faustulus sayes, Let them beleue it that list; ille error qui vult.

also of Alexander, and of Scipio Africanus, there are poetically inuentions: but to auerue these imaginations in generall, it is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatrie, and when there were as many Gods as there were Kings, or passions of the minde, or as there were of vices and vertues; then did many women greatly borne, couer such slips as they made by prostituting to be forced by more then humane power: to did Oeneas confesse to Pallas, that hee had bene rauished by Apollo. And Andrius boasted that hee had knowne Venus. But Alex was made with child by some man of Warre, or other, and therefore called Alex, the God of battell, according to the sense of the time. Oeneas was overcome by a strong wit, and by such a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Aterouus might fancie a Sea Captaine to be gotten with young by such a one: as the Daughter of Isachus fancied, according to Licetio, Aeneas was a ballard and begotten vpon some faire Harlot, called for her beaultie Pallas, and was therefore the child of lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nursed by a Wolfe, which was Lupa, or Lupina, for the Curtians in those daies were called Wolues, que nunc (saith HALICARNASSAEVS) honestiori vocabulo antea appellatur; quia nunc ly abominabili nunciatu si videtur. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken vp into heauen, or rather our of the world by his Father Mars, in a great forme of thunder, and lightning: so was it said that Aeneas vanished away by the River Acheron: but the poet Linc saith so aketh modestly, for hee reuerenteth the other opinion, that the forme was the furie of the Senators, but seemeth to adhere partially to this taking vp; and many Authors agree that there was an vnnatural darkensse, both at his birth and at his death, and that he might bee slaine by thunder or lightning, it is not vnlike. For the Emperour Augustus was slaine with lightning, so was Strabo the Father of Pompey slaine with a thunder-bolt: so Cassius the Emperour (who succeeded Probus) whilst he lodged with his Armie vpon the River Tigris, was there slaine with lightning. But a Mars of the same kinde might end him that beganne him; for he was begotten by a man of Warre, and by violence destroyed. And that he died by violence (which delitie followed most of the Roman Emperours) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus; who was but the fourth King after him: who when he had murdered his father in law, commanded that he should not be buried, for (saith he) Romulus himselfe dyed and was not buried. But let Italian assents end this dispute: whose words are these. They (saith he) who are nearest to the truth, say that he was slaine by his owne Citizens; and that his crueltie in punishments of offenders, together with his arrogancie over the ease of his flatterers. For it is reported that both when his mother was rauished, whether by Iane man, or by a God, the whole body of the sunne was eclipsed, and all the earth couered with darknesse like unto night, and that the same did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historified by Plutarch, doth containe (besides what is here already spoken of him) the conquest of a few miles which had soone bene forgotten, if the Roman greatness built vpon that foundation, had not giuen it memorie in all ages following, euen vnto this day. A valiant man he was, very strong of body, patient of trauell, and temperate in diet, as forbearing the vse of wine and delicacies: but his raging ambition hee knew not how to temper, which caused him to slay his brother, and neglect reuenge of the death of Tatius his companion in the Kingdome, that he himselfe might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He reigned euen and thirtie yeares: first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death single, till he was slaine, as is already shewed: after which time the Soueraignetie fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him vnknowne, and more Priest-like than King-like: wherein Rome it selfe in her later times hath somewhat resembled this King. For hauing long bene sole Gouvernesse till Constantinople shared with her: afterwards, when as the Greeke Emperour was crushed by foraine enemies, and the Latines dispoiled of Imperiall power, the fell into the subjection of a Prelate, swelling by degrees from the Sheepe-hooke to the Sword, and therewith victorious to excellenue magnificence, from whence by the same degrees it fell, being driuen from luxurie to defensive armes, and therein hauing bene vnfortunate, at length betakes her selfe againe to the Croisiers flathe.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occasion of the storie of the times of King Ahaz, during whose raigne in Iurie, the foundations of this famous Citie were laied.

CHAP. XXV.

Of EZEKIA, and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

Of the beginning of EZEKIAS, and of the agreeing of PTOLOMES, NABONASSAR, NABOPOLASSAR, and MARDOCEM-PADUS, with the Historie of the Bible.

THE first year of Ahaz his raigne was confounded with the last of his Father Iotham, so was the later end of his sixteene yeares taken vp in the three first of Ezekias his Sonne. This appeares by the raigne of Hosea, ouer Israel, which beganne in the twelfth of Ahaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Ahaz his fourteenth. But the third of Hosea was the first of Ezekias, so it followes, that Ezekias beganne to raigne in his Fathers fourteenth year. Like enough it is, that the third year of Hosea, the same being the fourteenth of Ahaz, was almost spent when Ezekias beganne, and so the fifteenth year of Ahaz may haue bene concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezekias.

By supposing that Hosea beganne his Kingdome, when the twelfth year of Ahaz was almost compleat, some would finde the meanes how to disioyne the first of Ezekias from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one year later, of which year, Ahaz may perhaps haue liued not many daies. But seeing that the fourteenth and fifteenth yeares of Ezekias, may not be remoued out of their places; it is vaine labour to alter the first year.

In the fourteenth of EZEKIA, SENACHERIB invading Juda, and the Countries adioyning, lost his Armie by a miraculous stroke from heauen, fled home, and was slaine. The year following it was that God added fifteene yeares to the life of Ezekias, when he had already reigned foureteen of his nine and twentie: and the same year was that miracle scene of the Sunnes going back; of which wonder (as I heare) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Aſtronomie, hath by calculation found the very day, which answered vnto the twentie fifth of April, in the Iulian year, being then Thursday. I haue not scene any workes of Seniur; but surely to finde a motion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessarie that he produce some record of obseruation made at such a time. Howsoever it be, the fifteenth year of Ezekias is agreed vpon; and therefore wee may not alter the first. As for that saying, which is vsual in the like cases, that Ahaz first with his Father, and Ezekias in his Sonne reigned in his stead, it doth no more proue that Ezekias reigned not with his Father, than the like saying doth inferre the like at the death of Iotham.

figure, and succellion of Iehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Sonne to raigne whilst his Father liued, we haue already said enough.

Of this godly King Ezekias, we finde, that his very beginning testified his deuotion and zeale. For whether it were so that his vnfortunate and vngracious Father (who had out-worne his reputation) gaue way to his Sonnes proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather thinke) the first year and first month of his raigne, wherein Ezekias opened the doores of the Temple, were to be vnderstood as the beginning of his sole gouernement; we plainly finde it to haue bene his first worke, that he opened the doores of the house of the Lord, which Ahaz had shut vp, cleaned the Citie and Kingdome of the Idolls, reitorred the Priests to their offices, and estates, commanded the Sacrifices to bee offered which had bene for many yeares neglected, and brake downe the brazen Serpent of Nefes, because the people burnt incense before it, and hee called it Nehushtan, which signifieth a lump of brasie. He did also celebrate the Passe-ouer with great magnificence, inviting therunto the Israelites of the ten Tribes: many there were, euen out of those Tribes, that came vp to Ierusalem, to this feast. But the generall multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezekias to scorne.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memoriall of their deliuerance out of the Egyptian seruitude, fell into a new seruitude, out of which they neuer were deliuered. For in the fourth of Ezekias his raigne, Salmansar the Sonne of Tiglath, the Sonne of Belochus, hearing that Hosea King of Israel had prattised with the King of Egypt, against him: invaded Israel, besieged Samaria, and in the third year (after the Inhabitants had endured all sorts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Affyr and Media: among whom Tobias and his Sonne of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Ninive, in whose Seats and Places the *Affyr*ians scut strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Israelites, as those of Cutha, Eni, Hamab, and Sphenon, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I haue formerly described in the Treatise of the holy Land.

The later *Affyr*ian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first, of whom wee finde mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore serue most aptly to ioyn the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets haue written otherwise than labulouly) with the Ages following that were better knowne, and described in course of Historie. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we finde in the Bible the same names by which other Authors haue recorded them: but of Phul and Salmansar, with other *Affyr*ian, Chaldean Kings, diuerſitie of name hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe speake of Salmansar, King of Affur, who reigned in the time of Ahaz, and Ezekias, Kings of Juda, and of Hosea King of Israel, whom he carried into captiuitie: and whereas Ptolome makes mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he liued; it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmansar and Nabonassar were one and the same man. The like reason also requireth, that it bee shewed of Nebuchadnezzar, that hee was the same, whom Ptolome calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Bucholerus hath well collected sufficient prooffe from the exact calculations of sundrie good Mathematicians. For by them it appeares that betwene Nabonassar and the birth of Christ, there passed vnder hundred fortie and sixe yeares: at which distance of time the raigne of Salmansar was. One great prooffe herof is this, which the same Bucholerus allegeth out of Erasmus Reinholdus, in the Prutenick Tables. Mardocephadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolome, speaking of these Eclipses of the Moone, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who sent Embassadors to Hzekias, King of Juda. So that if we reckon backwards to the difference of time, betwene Merodach and Salmansar, we shall finde it the same which is betwene Mardocephadus and Nabonassar.

nasir. Likewise Funtius doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samsar, to the deuallation of Ierusalem, in the nineteenth of Nabuchadnessar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirtie and three yeares: the selfe same distance of time is found in Ptolome, betwene Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For, whereas Ptolome seemeth to differ from this account, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and fortie yeares, than the destruction of Ierusalem, we are to vnderstand that he took Samsar in the eighth yeare of his raigne; so that the seuen foregoing yeares added to these one hundred thirtie and three, make the accomps of the Scriptures fall euen with that of Ptolome. Ptolomes computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twentie and seuen yeares. Now if we add to these one hundred twentie seuen, the thirtie ensuing of Nabuchadnessars yeares, before the Citie and Temple were destroyed, we haue the summe of one hundred and fortie yeares. In so plaine a case more proofes are needlesse, though many are brought, of which this may seruet for all, that Ptolome placeth the first of Nabopolassar one hundred twentie and two yeares, after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians: which in account of times I hold more free than the authoritie of any Historie; and therefore I thinke it folly to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall obseruations doe so thoroughly concur.

Yet forasmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest vnanswered, whereby he proueth Baldan the Father of Merodach, to haue bene this Nabonassar, I will not spare to looke a word or two inuinging the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the next obseruations of the heauenly Bodies, which Ptolome recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the raigne of Mardacempadus; the second yeare of whose raigne, is, according to Ptolome concurrent in part with the twentie seuen of Nabonassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which he calculates, being in the second yeare of Mardacempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twentie seuen yeares, seuentene daies, and eleuen houres: the account from Nabonassar, beginning at high noone the first day of the Egyptian moneth Thot, than answering to the twentie sixt of February; and this Eclipse being fittie minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February; so that the difference of time betwene the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardacempadus, is noted by Ptolome, according to the Egyptian yeares. But how does this proue, that Mardacempadus or Merodach, was the Sonne of Nabonassar? yea, how doth it proue, that he was his next Successor, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to falsifie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himselfe did afterwards beleue Mardacempadus to haue bene rather the Nephew, than the Sonne of Baldan, or Nabonassar. For if he might be either the Nephew, or the Sonne, he might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Countre-man Lydiate hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Tornelius, who follows Scaliger herein, and Sabius Celsius, who hath drawne into forme of Chronologie, that learned worke, De vniuersali Temporum, doe hold vp the same assertion, confounding Baldan with Nabonassar: I haue taken the paines to search, as farre as my leisure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might proue the Kindred or succession of these two. Yet cannot I finde in the Almagest (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or aduersie to Scaliger; and other good authoritie, I know none, in this businesse) any sentence more nearly prouing the succession of Merodach to Nabonassar, than the place now last rehearsed: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was Father to the other, than (that I may vse a like example) the as neare succession of William the Conqueror, declares him, to haue bene Sonne, or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. This considered, we may safely goe on with our account from Nabonassar, taking him for Sabonassar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driuen from our booke, when they finde something in it, agreeing with Amnius, inasmuch as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, raigned in Babylon, and Affrica, in those very times which by Diodorus and Ptolome are assigned to Belusius, Nabonassar, and Mardacempadus, and the rest: no good Historie naming any others, that raigned there in those ages, and all Astronomical obseruations, fitly concurring, with the yeares that are attributed to these, or numbered from them.

¶ II.

of the danger and deliuerance of India from SENNACHERIB.

When Sabonassar was dead, and his sonne Sennacherib in possession of the Empire, in the fourteenth yeare of Ezechias, he demanded of him such Tribute as was agreed on at such time as Tiglat, the Grand-father of Sennacherib, and Father of Sabonassar, inuited by Abaz, inuaded Rezen King of Damascus, and deliuered him from the dangerous Warre which Israel had vnderaken against him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Ezechias denied, Sennacherib, hauing (as it seemes) a purpose to invade Egypt, sent one part of his Armie to lie before Ierusalem. Now though Ezechias (feareing this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchased his peace, as he hoped, with thirtie hundred talents of siluer, and thirtie talents of gold: wherewith he presented Sennacherib, now set downe before Lachis in Iudea, yet vnder the colour of better assurance, and to force the King of India to deliuer hostages, the Affirian enuironed Ierusalem with a grosse Armie, and hauing his Sword in his hand, thought it the fittest time to write his owne conditions.

Ezechias directed his three greatest Counsellers, to parlie with Rabshaces, ouer the Wall; and to receiue his demands: who vsed three principall arguments to persuade the people to yeld themselues to his Master Sennacherib. For though the Chancellor, Steward, and Secretarie, sent by Ezechias, desired Rabshaces to speake vnto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Ierish, yet hee with a more loud voice directed his speech to the multitude in their owne language. And for the first, hee made them know, That if they continued obstinate, and adhered to their King, that they would, in a short time, bee inforced to eate their owne dung, and drinke their owne vrine: Secondly, he altogether disabled the King of Egypt, from whom the Iudeans hoped for succour; and compared him to a broken staffe, on which whose leane pierceeth his owne hand: Thirdly, that the Gods who (should hee them, Ezechias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by some) the brazen Serpent, which had bene preferred euer since Noses time: and withall he had them remember the Gods of other Nations: whom, notwithstanding any power of theirs, his Master had conquered and throwne downe; and for God himselfe, in whom they trusted, he perswaded them by no meanes to relie on him; for he would deceiue them. But finding the people silent (for so the King had commanded them) after a while when he had vnderstood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Armie, he himselfe left the Affirian forces in charge to others, and fought Sennacherib at Lachis in Iudea, either to informe him of their resolution in Ierusalem, or to confire with him concerning the Armie of Tirhathae the Arabian. Soone vpon this there came letters from Sennacherib to Ezechias, whom he partly aduised, and partly threatened to submit himselfe vnto the same blasphemous outrage against the all-powerfull God, as before. But Ezechias sending those Counsellers to the Prophet Esay, which had lately bene sent to Rabshaces, receiued from him comfort and assurance, that this Heathen Idolater should not preuaile; against whom the King also besought aide from almighty God, repeating the most insolent and blasphemous parts of Sennacheribs letter, before the

Herod. lib. 2. §. 69

The reason that moued Senacherib to desire to possesse himselfe in haile of Ierusalem, was that he might therein haue retrained his Armie, which was departed, as it seemeth from the siege of Pelusium in Aegypt, for feare of Tethia: and though the Scriptures are silent of that enterprise (which in these bookes of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, I speake but of the affaires of the Iewes in effect) yet the ancient Berosus, and out of him Iosephus, and S. Hierome, together with Herodotus, remember it as followeth. Herodotus calleth Senacherib King of Arabia and Affria: which he might justly doe, because Tiglat his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekah King of Israel: as Gilead ouer Jordan, and the rest of Arabia Petræa adioyning: the same Herodotus also maketh Seihon King of Aegypt, to be Puleas Priest, and reporteth that the reason of Senacherib's returne from Pelusium in Aegypt, which he also beleaged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in funder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoiled the rest of their weapons of that kinde, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Tethia, remembered by Iosephus and Berosus, was the more urgent. S. Hierome vpon the fuen and thirte of Ezay, out of the same Berosus, as soles in part out of Herodotus, whom Iosephus citeth somewhat otherwise than his words, li reports Senacherib retreat in these words. Pugnasse autem SENACHERIB REGEM ASSYRIORUM CONTRA AEGYPTOS, & obsequisse PELUSIUM, tamq. extructis aggeribus, ubi aspicienda, venisse TACHAMACH REGEM ETHIOPIUM IN AUXILIUM, & contra nocte iuxta IERUSALEM CENTUM OCTOGINTA QUING. MILIA EXERCITUS ASSYRII PESTILENTIA CORRUISSE NARRAT HERODOTVS: & plenissime BEROSVS Chaldaice scriptor Historiae, quorum fides de praesentibus petenda est. That SENACHERIB King of the Assyrians sought against the Aegyptians, and beleaged Pelusium, and that when his Mounts were built for taking of the Citie, TACHACHAS King of the Ethiopians came to helpe them, and that in one night neare Ierusalem one hundred eighty fne thousand of the Assyrian Armie perished by pestilence, of these things (saith Hierome) * HERODOTVS reports: and more at large BEROSVS a writer of Chaldaean storie, whose credit is to be taken from their owne bookes. Out of Ezay it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Armie was in this manner. Then shall be visited of the Lord of Hosts with thunder and shaking, and a great noise, a while winde and a tempest, and a flame of denouncing fire. But Iosephus hath it more largely out of the same Berosus, an authoritie (because to well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted, SENACHERIBVS autem ab AEGYPTIO bello reuertens, ostendit sui exercitum, quem sub RABASACIS Imperio reliquerat peste diuinitus inmisit deletum, primâ nocte postea quam Vrbem oppugnare ceperat, assumptis cum Eubolis & Tribunis, centum octoginta quing. milibus Militum, qua clade territus, & de reliquis copijs sollicitus, maximis timoribus in regnum suum contendit, ad regium qua Ninus dicitur. Plu paulo post per insidias Seniorum, & filijs suis, ADRAMELECHI, & SELENNARI, vitam amisit: occisus in ipso Templo quod dicitur ARASCI; quem precipuo cultu dignabatur: quibus ob patricium à popularibus pulsus & in Armeniam fugientibus, ASARACOLAS minor filius in Regnum successit. SENACHERIB (saith Iosephus) returning from the Aegyptian Warre, found there his Armie, which he had left vnder the command of RABASACES, destroyed by a pestilence sent from God, the first night that he had begonne to assault the Towne: one hundred fawrescore and fye thousand of the Souldiers being consumed with their Chieftaines and Coronells. With which destruction being terrified, and with all afraid what might become of the rest of his Armie, he made great marches into his Kingdome, to his Royall Citie, which is called Ninus, where shortly after by the treason of two of the eldest of his Sonnes, ADRAMELECH and SELENNAR or SHARAZER, he lost his life in the Temple dedicated to ARASCES, or NESROCH: whom he especially worshipped. These his sonnes being for their parricide chased away by the people: and flying into Armenia, ASARACOLAS his younger sonne succeeded.

ed in the Kingdome. Who in the beginning of his raigne sent new troupes out of Affria and Sennia, to fortifie the Colonie therein planted by his grandfather Salmassar. What this Nesroch was, it is vncertaine: Hierome in his Hebrew traditions hath somewhat of him, but nothing politically. It is certaine, that Venus Frania was worshipped by the Affrians; and so was Ishtar Belus, as Dion, Ensebius, and Cyrius witness. Many fancies there are, what cause his sonne had to murder him, but the most likely is, that he had formerly disinherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Assurhaddon. Tobit tells vs, That it was fiftie Hue dayes after Senacherib's returne, ere he was murdered by his sonnes; during which time he flew great numbers of the Israelites in Ninive, till the most iust God turned the Sword against his owne breast.

§. III.

Of Ezekias his sickness and recoverie; and of the Babylonian King that congratulated him.

fter this marvellous deliuerie, Ezekias sickened, and was told by Isaiah, that he must die: but after he had besought God with teares for his deliuerie, Isaiah as he was going from him returned againe, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recoverie after three dayes, and a prolongation of his life for fiftene yeares. But Ezekias somewhat doubtful of this exceeding grace, prayeth a signe to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Isaiah, the shadow of the Sunne cast it selfe the contrary way, and went backe tenne degrees, vpon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moued Ezekias to lament (saith Saint Hierome) was, because he had as yet no sonne, and then in despair that the Messias should come out of the house of Dauid, or at least of his Seede. His disease seemeth to be the Pestilence, by the medicine giuen him by the Prophet, to wit, a masse of Figges, layed to the Botch or Soare.

This wonder when the Wise men of Chaldaea had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that house, he sent to Ezekias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezekias shewed him all the Treasure hee had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Isaiah, who tolde him; The dayes are at hand, that all that is in thine house, and whattsoever thy fathers haue layed up in store to this day, shall be carried into Babel; nothing shall be left, sayth the Lord. It may seeme strange, how Ezekias should haue got any treasure without the thewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the year before. But the spoyle of the same Senacherib his Campe repayed all with advantage, and made Ezekias richer vpon the suddaine then euer he had bene: which unexpected wealth was a strong temptation to boasting. After this time Ezekias had rest, and spending without noyle that addition which God had made vnto his life, hee died, hauing reigned nine and twentie yeares. One onely offense hee made, which was against the Philistines with good success. Among his other acts (shortly remembered in Edesasticus hee desired to bring water to Ierusalem.

In two respects they say that hee offended God: the one, that hee rejoyced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemy; the other, that hee too much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbear to shew them to strangers. But the reason which moued Ezekias (speaking humanely) to entertaine the Embassadors of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recoverie of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakened the house of Senacherib, his fearefull enemy. For Merodach, who was Commander and Lieutenant vnder Senacherib in Babylon, usurped that State himselfe, in the last yeare of that King, and held it by strong hand against his sonne Assurhaddon; who was not onely simple, but impaired in strength, by by the moitication of his brothers. This advantage Merodach espied, and remembering, that their ancestor Phul Belochus had let his owne maller Sardanapalus besides the cushion, thought it as lawfull for himselfe to take the opportunite which this Kings weaknesse did offer, as it had bene for Belochus to make vfe of the others wickednesse: and so, finding himselfe bloued of the Babylonians, and sufficiently powerful, he did put the matter to hazard, and preuailed. The assertion of this historie is made by the same arguments that were vfed in maintaining the common opinion of Writters, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here againe rehearse. So of this new Race, which cut asunder the Line of Ainus, there were onely five Kings

But forasmuch as the last year of Salmansassar was also the first of Senacherib his sonne, we reckon the time wherein the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdome, to haue bene an hundred and one yeares; of which the last five and twentie were spent with Ezekias, vnder Salmansassar, Senacherib, and Affshadadon.

§. IIII.

The Kings that were in Media during the raigne of Ezekias: Of the Difference found betweene Iuanbrie Authors, in rehearsing the Median Kings.

Other contemporaries of Ezekias: of CANDAYLES, GYGES, and the Kings descended from HERCVLES.

In the time of Ezekias, Medidus, and after him Cardiceus, reigned in Media. Whether it were so, that variety of names, by which these Kings were called in severall Histories, hath caused them to seeme more than indeede they were; or whether the sonnes reigning with the fathers, haue caused not onely the names of Kings, but the length of Time, wherein they governed Media, to exceede the due proportion: or whether the Copies themselves, of Ctesias and Annius his Metasthenes, haue bene faultie, as neither of these two Authors is over-highly commended of trustinesse: so it is, that the names, number, and length of raigne, are all very diuersly reported of these Median Kings, that followed Arbaces: Therefore it neede not seeme strange, that I reckon Medidus and Cardiceus as contemporaries with Ezekias. For to reconcile so great a difference, as is found in those Writters that varie from Eusebius, is more than I dare vndertake. I will onely here set downe the roll of Kings that reigned in Media, according as sundrie Authors haue deliuered it.

Annius his Metasthenes orders them and their raignes thus:

Arbaces.	28.
Mananes.	50.
Sosarmus.	30.
Artaxermin.	50.

Diodorus

Diodorus Siculus following Ctesias (as perhaps Annius made his Metasthenes follow Diodore, with some little variation, that he might not seeme a borrower) placeth them thus.

Arbaces.	28.
Mananes.	50.
Sosarmus.	30.

Artynes.	22.
Artabanus.	40.
} who reigned } yeares.

Aflybara. } the continuance of these two he doth not mention.
Aflyages.

Nicerator hath laboured with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them also agree with Eusebius. But forasmuch as it seemes to me an impossible matter, to attaine vnto the truth of these forgotten times, by conjectures founded vpon Ctesias and Metasthenes, I will lay the burthen vpon Eusebius, who liued in an age better furnished than ours, with bookes of this argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I haue reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekias) Medidus and Cardiceus, are found in Eusebius: for whether Cardiceus were Diodorus his Arbaces, I will not stay to search. The Kings of Media, according to Eusebius, reigned in this order.

Arbaces.	28.
Sosarmus.	30.
Medidus.	40.
Cardiceus.	15.
Deioes.	54.
Phraortes.	24.
Cyaxares.	32.
Aflyages.	38.
} reigned } yeares.

These names, and this course of succession I retaine; but adde vnto these, Cyaxares the sonne of Aflyages, according to Xenophon; and sometimes follow Hierodotus, in setting downe the length of a Kings raigne, otherwise than Eusebius hath it: of 40 which variations, I will render my reasons in due place.

The twentie nine yeares of Ezekias were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the foure first that were chosen Gouernours of Athenis for ten yeares; that is, of Charops, Asimedes, Elisicus, and Hippones. Touching the first of these I heare nothing, save that Rome was built in his first yeare; of which perhaps himselfe did not heare. Of the second and third I finde only the names. The fourth made himselfe knowne by a strange example of justice, or rather of cruelty, that hee shewed vpon his owne Daughter. For he finding that shee had offended in vnchastitie, caused her to bee lockt vp with an Horse, giuing to neither of them any foode: so the Horse, constrained by hunger, deuoured the vnhappie Woman.

In Rome, the first King, and Founder of that Citie Romulus, did raigne both before, and somewhat after Ezekias.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King, ruled in the same age.

This

This Region was first called Lydia, the sonne of Atry reigning in it, gave the name of Lydia, if we beleue prophane authoritie. This Kingdome was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred vpon Argen, who came of Alceus the sonne of Hercules by Iardana, a bond-woman. The race of these Heraclidae continued reigning fiftie five yeares (in which two and twentie Generations passed) the sonne continually succeeding the father. Candaules the sonne of Mysfus was the last of this race, who doated so much vpon the beautie of his owne Wife, that hee could not bee content to enjoy her, but would needes enforce one Gyges, the sonne of Dajeylus, to behold her naked bodie; and placed the vnwilling man secretly in her chamber, where he might see her preparing to bedward. This was not so clofly carried, but that the Queene perceived Gyges at his going forth, and understanding the matter tooke it in such high disdain, that hee forced him the next day to requite the Kings follie with treason. So Gyges, being brought againe into the same chamber by the Queene, slew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdome of Lydia. He reigned thirtie eight yeares, beginning in the last of Ezechias, one yeare before the death of Romulus.

*Hierome, Ambros.
Clement. Alex.
Eusebion.*

After Gyges, his sonne Aryds reigned nine and fortie yeares; then Sadyattes, twelue; Halyattes, fiftie seuen; and finally Craesus, the sonne of Halyattes, fourtene yeares: who lost the Kingdome, and was taken by Cyrus of Persia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Craesus his Progenitor dispossest, are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there sprang many other Kings, which gouerned severall Countries very long; as in Asia, the Mysians; in Greece, the Lacedaemonians; Messenians; Rhodians; Corinthians; and Argives; and from the Argives, the Macedonians; as likewise from the Corinthians, the Syracusians: besides many great and famous, though priuate, Families.

But of the Heraclidae that reigned in Lydia, I haue not troubled my selfe to take notice in the times of their severall reignes: for little is found of them, beside the bare names, and the follie of this last King Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, betweene the deliuerance of ISRAEL from thence, and the raigne of EZEKIA in Iuda, when Egypt and Iuda made a league against the Assyrians.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to haue belonged only to Viceroyes. An example prouing this out of WILLIAM of Tyre his Historie of the holy Warre.

HE emulation and quarrells arising in these times, betweene the mightie Kingdomes of Egypt and Assyria, doe require our paines, in collecting the most memorablie things in Egypt, and setting downe briefly the state of that Countrey, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Assyria for the Maritime. Of Cham, the sonne of Noah, who first planted that Countrey, and of Osiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings, that reigned there, until the Israelites were thence deliuered, more hath bene said already than

I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to faile in such conjectures. That which I haue deliuered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, must here againe helpe me. For it may truly bee affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Ioseph was, and such as were the Soldanes in later ages. Therefore, I will not only forbear to secke after those, whom Heraclotus and Diodorus haue reckoned vp, from the mouthes of Egyptian Priests, deliuering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will leaue the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names only are found; the yeares of their reignes, and other circumstances, prouing them to haue bene Kings in deede, being not recorded.

But that I may not seeme before hand, to lay an imaginarie ground, whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amisse, to giue vnto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of Historie doth afford. First therefore, wee ought not to beleue those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests haue reckoned vp, to magnifie their Antiquities. For wee know, that from Abraham, our Saviour Christ was removed only fortie two descents, which makes it euident, that in farre shorter time, namely before the Persian Empire, there could not haue passed away twice as many successions in Egypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, haue reigned longer than fortie yeares. It followes that we should square the number of the Egyptian Kings, in some euen proportion, to those which did beare rule in other Countreies. As for the rest, whose names wee finde scattered here and there; any man that will take the paines to reade the nineteenth booke of the holy Warre, written by William Archbilhop of Tyre, may easily perswade himselfe, that it is not hard to find names enough, of such as might be thought to haue reigned in Egypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroies. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose, for the pleasure and information of such, as will not trouble themselves with turning over many Authors.

When Elhadeth the Caliph ruled in Aegypt, one Dargan, a powerful and a subtle man, made himselfe Soldan, by force and cunning, chaling away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quarrell to Amalricke King of Ierusalem; and sustained, with little losse, an invasion, which Amalricke made vpon Aegypt. Hereupon hee grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his partie good against him, if hee could get any forces wherewith to enter Aegypt. Briefly, Sanar sueth to Norichar, King of Damasco, for aide, who sends an Armie of his Turkes, vnder the command of Syracoon, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The Victorie was Dargan's; but he enjoyed it not: for in few dayes after, he was slain by treason, whereby Sanar did recover his Dignitie: which to establish he slew all the Kindred and Friends of Dargan, that he could finde in the great Citie of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadeth gaue little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them liued, and had the administration of the Kingdome, whilst hee might haue the profit of it, and enjoy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would thinke) doe neere touch the Caliph himselfe. Syracoon with his Turkes, whom Sanar hath gotten to come into Aegypt, will not now be intreated there to leave him, and quietly goe their way home. They fixe vpon the Towne of Beluers, which they tortie, and there attend the arrival of more Companie from Damasco, for the conquest of all Aegypt. The Soldan perceiues their intent, and finds himselfe not strong enough to expell them; much lesse to repell the Turkish Armie, that was likely to second them. He therefore sends Messengers to King Amalricke of Ierusalem, whom with large promises, hee gets to bring him aide, and so driues out the Turkes. Of all this trouble, the great Caliph heares nothing, or not so much, as should make him looke to the playing of his owne game.

A greater mischief ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadeth particularly, in his owne Title. Syracoon, Captain of the Turkes, that had bene in Aegypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldash (who was opposite to him of Aegypt; each of them claiming as heire to Abraham, that false Prophet, the Soueraignetie ouer all that were of the Syracoon Line) and tells him the weaknesse of the Aegyptian, with his owne abilitie of doing seruice in those parts, offering his best means for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Aegypt, with the Westerne parts, vnder the subiection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the Easterne Provinces are vpin Armes; and Syracoon, with a mightie power, descendeth into Aegypt. The noise of this great expedition so affrighteth King Amalricke, that with all his forces hee halseth into Aegypt: well knowing how nearely it concerned him and his Kingdome of Ierusalem, to keep the Syracoon from joyning all vnder one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiuing the faithfull care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giuing them all manner of content, as it behoued him: for by their admirable valour, he finally drave the enemies out of the Countrie. But this victorie was not so soone gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which most concerns our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seems to know nothing. May we not thinke him to haue bene King in title only, who medled so little in the Government? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose helpe, all was lost) could not well stay, so long as his necessities required; makes large offers to King Amalricke, vpon condition, that he should abide by it. He promiseth a great Tribute (William of Tyre calls it a Tribute; the Syracoon, perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Ierusalem should receiue out of Aegypt, for this behouefull assistance. But the Christians vnderstanding that the Soldan (how much sooner he tooke vpon him) was subiect to an higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance, with any other than the the Caliph himselfe. Hereupon Hugh Earle of Cesarea, and a Knight of the Templars, are sent vnto Elhadeth, to ratifie the covenants. Now shall wee see the greatness of the Caliph and his estate.

These Embassadors were conueighed by the Soldan to Cairo; where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through darke Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Aethiopians, which, with all diligence, did reverence vnto the Soldan, as he passed along. Through these brights the Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beautie and riches, that they could not retaine the grauitie of Embassadors, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they saw goodly marble Pillars, gilded Beames, all wrought ouer with embossed works, curious pauements, fountains of marble with cleare waters, and many sorts of strange Birds, yknowne in these parts of the world, as comming perhaps from the East Indies, which then were vndiscovered. The further they went the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuches conueighed them into other Courts within these; as farre exceeding the former, as the former did surpass ordinary houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse, how the further they entred, the more high place they found, and cause of merruile; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrote these things, was neuer held a vaine Author. Finally, they were brought into the Caliph owne lodgings, which were yet more stately, and better guarded, where entering the Presence, the Soldan, hauing twice prostrated himselfe, did the third time call off his Sword, that he ware about his neck, and throw himselfe on the ground, before the curtain, behind which the Caliph sat. Presently the traueise, wrought with gold and pearles, was opened, and the Caliph himselfe discovered, sitting with great Majesty on a throne of gold, hauing very few of his most inward seruants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his comming, the danger wherein the land stood, and the offers that he had made vnto King Amalricke, desiring the Caliph himselfe to ratifie them, in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would thoroughly performe all which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would haue him to giue his hand vpon the bargain; which the Aegyptians, that stood by, thought an impudent request. Yet his greatnesse condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earle of Cesarea saw that the Caliph gaue his hand, neither willingly nor bare, hee told him roundly thus much in effect. Sir, Truth seekes no holes to hide it selfe; Princes, that will hold covenant, must disclose openly, nakedly, and sincerely; Giue vs therefore your bare hand, if you meane that we shall trust you: for we will make no bargaines with your Gloue. Much adoe there was about this: for it seemed against the Majesty of such a Prince to yeeld so farre. But, when it would none otherwise be, with a smiling cheare (though to the great griefe of his Seruants) hee vouchsafed to let the Earle take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the covenants word by word, as the Earle spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors, with such rewards as testified his Greatnesse.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, wee may discern the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himselfe with the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his neighbour Countries: we see his Viceroy, in the meane season, vnging all Roiall power, making warre and peace, entertaining, and expelling Armies of strangers; yea, making the Land of Aegypt tributarie to a forraigne Prince. What greater authoritie was giuen to Ioseph, when Pharaoh said vnto him, Thou shalt be ouer mine house, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, only in the Kings Throne will I be above thee, Behold, I have set thee ouer all the Land of Aegypt?

I doe not commend this forme of Government; neither can I approoue the conjecture of mine Author, where hee thinks, that the Aegyptians, euer since

Iosephs time, haue felt the burthen of that seruitude, which he brought vpon them, when he bought them, and their Lands for Pharaoh. Herein I finde his judgement good; that he affirms this manner of the Egyptian Kings, in taking their care, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customes, practised by the Pharaohs. For we finde, that euen the Ptolemies (excepting Ptolemaeus Lagi, and his sonne Phadelpus, founder and establisher of that race) were giuen, all of them, wholly to please their owne appetites, leauing the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Eunuchs, and other ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Countie afforded, were indeed sufficient, to inuite the Kings thereof vnto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherein the Egyptians held their Princes, gaue them securitie, whereby they might the better truit their Officers, with so ample Commission. But of this matter I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to haue shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroyes gouerning Egypt, is set downe by Moses, and that a liuely example of the same is found in William of Tyre, who liued in the same age; was, in few yeares after, Chancellor of the Kingdome of Ierusalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earle of Cesarea, touching all these matters. Wherefore it remains, that wee bee not carried away with a vaine opinion, to beleue that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians, haue honored with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as wee finde by circumstance, likely to haue reigned in that Countie; after to whom it folloes that we should make enquire.

§. II.

of ACHERRES; whether he were VCHOREVS that was the eighth from OSYMANDYAS. Of OSYMANDYAS and his Tombe.

IN this businesse I hold it vaine to be too curious. For who can hope to attaine to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius, from both of them; and late Writers, that haue sought to gather the truth out of these and others, find no one with whom they can agree. In this case Aemius would doe good service, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to bee beholding to him, when others doe either say nothing, or that which may iustly bee suspected. I will therefore hold my selfe contented, with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osiris, Ihs, Orus, and those antiquities remoued so farr out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Egypt, it shall suffice, that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eusebius, haue not bene silent, and that Reinceus hath taken paines, to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Egypt, vnto the raigne of Thorus (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greekes call Proteus) there is little or no disagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I set downe the same which are found in Eusebius, and giue to every one the same length of raigne.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded vnto Chenches, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seems to Reinceus to bee the same whom Diodorus calls Vchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King, named Osymandyas, from whom Vchoreus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timas (as Reinceus conjectures) was the great Osymandyas; or else that this Acherres was Vchoreus: for the distance betwene them was more than eight generations. Mercator judgeth Osymandyas to haue bene the husband of Asencheres, Orus the second his Daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited (cited by Iosephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wiues, into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wiues right. As for Thoreus, it troubles not Mercator to finde him the eighth from this man: for he takes Osiris, not to signifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greek word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian name, belonging also to Vchoreus, who might haue had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vex my braines in the vnprofitable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Osymandyas, was wrought vpon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I thinke the Egyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was portrayed a great Armie, with the siege of a Towne, the captiuitie of the People, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Egyptians said to denote the conquest of Bactria made by that King: which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly peece of worke, which Diodore so particularly describes, to haue bene erected for a common place of buriall, to the ancient Kings and Queenes of Egypt, and to their Viceroyes; whilst yet they were not so ambitious, as euerie one to haue his owne particular monument, strutting therein to exceede all others. This appeares by the many statues, therein placed, by the Warres, the judgement Seate, the receiving of Tribute, the offering Sacrifice to God, the accompt of Reuenues, and plenty of all Cattail and Foode; all which were there curiously wrought, the shewing the fullall Offices of a Gouernour. On the Tombe of Osymandyas was this inscription. I AM OSYMANDYAS King of Kings; If any desire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him exceede some of my workes. Let them, that hope to exceede his workes, labour to know what he was. But since by those wordes, Or where I lie, it should seeme that hee lay not there interred, wee may lawfully suspect that it was Ioseph, whose bodie was preferred among the Iebrewes, to bee buried in the Land of Canaan, and this empty Monument might King Orus, who out-liued him, erect in honor of his high deserts, among the royall Sepulchers. To which purpose, the plenty of Cattail, and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name Osymandyas doth not hinder this conjecture; seeing Ioseph had one new name giuen to him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dream, and might, vpon further occasions, haue another, to his encrease of honor. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkish Bassies are called, that is, Great about the Great.

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls out right, betwene the times of Ioseph and Acherres, (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Ioseph was) yet will I hereby seeke, neither to fortifie mine owne conjecture, as touching Ioseph, nor to inferre any likelihood of Acherres his being Vchoreus. For it might well bee, that Memphis was built by some such King as was Gehor, Lieutenant vnto the Caliph Eleam, who hauing to his Masters

40 vic, conquered Egypt, and many other Countries, did build, not farr from old Memphis, the great Citie of Cairo (corruptly so pronounced) naming it El Calira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistresse, though hee himselfe were a Dalmatian slaue.

§. III.

OF CHERRES, ARMEVS, RAMESSES, and AMENOPHIS. OF MYRIS, and the Lake that beares his name.

WHen Acherres had reigned eight yeares, Cherres succeeded, and held the Kingdome fiftene yeares: then reigned Armeus five yeares, and after him Rameſſes, threſcore and eight. Of Armeus and Rameſſes is that Hiſtorie underſtood by Eufebius, which is common among the Greekes, vnder the names of Danaus and Aegyptus. For it is ſaid that Danaus, being expelled out of Aegypt by his Brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdome of Argos: that he had ſittie Daughters, whom vpon ſeeming reconciliation, hee gaue in marriage to his Brothers ſittie Sonnes, but commanded euery one of them to kill her husband the firſt night; that only Hyperminſtra, one of his Daughters, did ſue her husband Lyncus, and ſuffered him to eſcape, finally, That for this faſt, all the bloudie ſiſters, when they died, were enioyned this fooliſh puniſhment in Hell, to fill a leaking Veſſell with water.

The raigne of Danaus in Argos was indeede in this age; but that Armeus was Danaus; and Rameſſes, Aegyptus, is more then Armenecus belueues: hee rather takes Armeus to haue bene Myris, or Miris, who cauſed the great Lake to be made which beares his name. For my owne part, as I can eaſily beleuee, that he which fled out of Aegypt into Greece, was a man of ſuch qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom wee ſpake before; ſo doe I not finde how in ſo ſhort a raigne, as five yeares, a worke of that labour could be finiſhed, which was required vnto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his owne Sepulchre and his Wiues being ſome part, it is maniſeſt that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whoſe age is vncertaine, and of whoſe raignes we haue no aſſurance, I may truly ſay, that their great workes are not enough to proue them of the houſe of Pharaoh, ſeeing that greater deedes, or more abſolute, then were thoſe of Iſoph, who bought all the people of Aegypt as bond-men, and all their Land for bread; of Gebeur, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Countrie Tributarie; were performed by none of them.

It ſhall therefore be enough to ſet downe the length of their raignes, whom we finde to haue followed one another in order of ſucceſſion: but in rehearling the great acts which were performed, I will not ſtand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris is, by the report of Diadore and Herodotus, three thouſand five hundred furlongs in compaſſe, and fittie fadomes deepe. It ſerued to receiue the waters of Nilus, when the ouer-flow, being too great, was harmefull to the Countrie, and to ſupply the deſect, by letting out the waters of the Lake, when the Riuer did not riſe high enough. In opening the fluces of this Lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were ſpent ſittie talents; but the Lake it ſelfe deſtroyed that coſt, ſeeing the tribute impoſed vpon Fiſh taken therein, was euery day one talent, which Myris gaue to his Wiſe to buy fineſt ointments, and other ornaments for her bodie. In the middelt of it was left an Iſland, wherein were the Sepulchers of Myris and his Wiſe, and ouer each of them a Pyramis, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fittie paces high; hauing on the tops their ſtatues, ſitting in Thrones. I finde not the deſcription of this Lake in Maps, anſwerable to the report of Hiſtorians: yet is it very great. The yeares of Armeus are by Manetho diuided, by inſerring one Armeſſes (whom Eufebius omits) that ſhould haue reigned one yeare and odder moneths of the time; but I hold not this difference worthe of examination.

After Rameſſes, his ſonne Amenophis held the Kingdome fortie yeares. Some giue him only nineteene yeares; and Herodotus thinks him to haue bene the King

King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I haue alreadie ſpoken in the firſt Booke.

§. IIIL.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynaſtie of the Larthes.

SETHOSIS, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, ſittie five yeares. To him are aſcribed the famous acts of that ancient Seſoſtris. But the ſtate of the World was not ſuch in theſe times, that ſo great an expedition, as the old Seſoſtris made, could haue bene either eaſily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he paſſed, had it now bene performed, as any man will perceiue if hee looke vpon my Chronologicall Table, and conſider who liued with this Zethus. With this King beganne the Dynaſtie of the Larthes; which Reinccus coniectures to haue had the ſame ſignification, wherein the old Kings of ſicilia, were called Lartes, (the ſicilians being iſſued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Aegypt) and to haue ſignified as much as Imperator or General. The Warres in which theſe Kings were Generals, I take to haue bene againſt the Aethiopians: for ſure I am, that they troubled not the Countrie of Palaeſtina, that lay next vnto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they trauielled ouer the deſert ſands, on the other hand; to ſeeke matter of conqueſt, in the poore Countries of Africa. But theſe Generals (if the Larthes were ſuch) were not many. Five only had that title; and the laſt of theſe tooke it, perhaps, as hereditarie from the firſt; in ſuch fort as the Roman Emperors were proud for a while, to be called Antonini, till the moſt vnfurtable conditions of Helioabalus, made his Succeſſors forbear the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynaſties (as appears by this particular) tooke name from the Kings, that the Kings alſo did adminiſter the gouernement themſelues; and that therefore I am decciued in aſcribing ſo much vnto the Viceroyes. But it is to be conſidered, that what is ſaid of theſe Larthes, depends only vpon coniecture, and that the authoritie of the Regents, or Viceroyes, might bee great enough, though ſome few Kings tooke the conduct of Armies into their owne hands. For ſo we finde in Iohn Leo, that the Soldan of Aegypt (after ſuch time as the Soldan Saladin, murdering the Cadiſh, got the Soueraignie to himſelfe) had vnder him a Viceroy, ſitled Edaquadare, who had authoritie to place, or diſplace, any Magiſtrates, or Officers; and that this mans Familie was almoſt as great, as the Soldans owne. Yet was there alſo the Amir Cadir, or Lord General of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might as be thought good ſpend of the Soldans treaſure. So might the Office of the Viceroyes continue, though the Kings themſelues, taking the charge, or title of Generals vpon them, did ſomewhat abridge the greatneſſe of that ſecond place. As for the names of the Dynaſties, it ſkills not whence they were drawne; whether from their Countrie, as thoſe of the Thebans and Diopolitans, or from ſome eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time, as many thinke, that the ſeuenteenth Dynaſtie was called of the Sheep-heads, becauſe Iuſeph gouerned in part thereof; or from the Kings themſelues that reigned; as this was ſaid to be of the Larthes or Generals. The next, as Manetho (but Armenius his Manetho) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, ſo far as much as Paphos, and Seſae, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let vs now returne to the buſineſſe which we left.

Rameſſes was King after Zethus, or Seſoſtris, threſcore and ſixe yeares. He is miſtaken for that ſecond Seſoſtris, of whom I haue ſpoken in the firſt Booke. I finde nothing worth rehearſall of this Rameſſes, or of Amenophis, and Armenius; that followed him in order, the former of which reigned fortie, the later ſixe and twentie yeares.

yeares. Wherefore it may well bee, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by these as hereditarie.

Thauris, the last of the Larthes, reigned only seven yeares; yet is hee thought to have bene that Proetus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, saying, That he tooke Helena from Paris, and after the sack of Troy, restored her to Athenians. I neede say no more in refutation of this, then that the time of Thauris his reigne, lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helena to her restitution.

This Proetus or Ceter (as he is named by some) together with Then, and others, mentioned by Greek Writers in this bulinesse, or in other such matters, may seeme to be vnder-Officers: for such only are like to haue had their residence about Pharos, and the Sea coast, where Mendau arrived.

Of Proetus, who detained Helena, it is said, That he could foretell things to come, and that hee could change himselfe into all shapcs: whereby is signified his craftie head, for which he is growne into a Prouerbe. The Poets fained him a Sea God, and keeper of Neptunes Scale-fishes, for belike he was some vnder-Officer to the Admiral, hauing charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was said before.

Remphes, the Sonne of Proetus, is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramsphutis, and tells a long tale, fit to please children, of his couetousnesse, and how his treasure-houle was robbed by a cunning Thiefe, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may belecue what he list. How so long this King reigned I know not, nor thinke that either hee, or his Father, did reign at all.

§. V.

Of Egyptian Kings whose names are found scattered in sundrie Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Egypt, according to CEDRENS, OF VAPHRES and SESAC.

Any other names of Egyptian Kings, are found scattered here and there; as Tenepheris, of whom Suidas deliueis only the bare name and titles Senemures, or Senepos, mentioned in Metastasis, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Serues, or Euenes, noted by occasion of a great Philition that liued vnder him; Bachynis, recorded by the same Suidas, for his great iustice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gaue name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Island; and that he consulted with the Deuil, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, desiring to know, who before him had bene, or after him should be so mightie as himselfe. The answer or confession of the Deuil was remarkable; which I finde Englished in the translation of Plethys his works, of the true esse of Christian Religion. The Greek Verles are somewhat otherwise, and more imperfect in those Copies that I haue of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is this:

First GOD, and next THE WORD, and then THE SPIRIT, Which three be ONE, and joyne in ONE all three:
Whose force is endless. Get thee hence fraile wight,
The Man of Life vnknowne excelleth thee.

I should haue thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas, than Cedrenus hath heretofore; as the forme of inuocation which Thulis vsed, and that clause, of his giuing name to the Island: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seems to

to me, in giuing to this King such profound antiquitie of reigne. Indeede the very name of that Booke, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breede suspicion of some imposture: but the Frierly fluffe that hee alledgeth out of it, is such as would serue to discredit himselfe, were it not otherwise apparant, that he was a man both deuout, and of good iudgement, in matters that fell within his compasse. I will here set downe the List of olde Egyptian Kings deliuered by him, and leaue the censure to others.

The first King of Egypt that he sets downe is Misraim, the sonne of Chan. After him hee findes many of a new race, deniuing their pedigree thus: Nimrod, the sonne of Chus, was also called Orion; and further, tooke vpon him the name of the Planet Saturne, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his owne Linage, and by her three sonnes, Picus, surnamed Jupiter, Belus and Ninus. Picus chasing his father out of Assyria into Italie, reigned in his stead thirtie yeares, and then gaue vp that Kingdome to Ino, his sister and wife, and to Belus his sonne: after which Belus, who reigned onely two yeares, Ninus had the Kingdome, and married his owne mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie, to visite his olde father Saturne, Saturne forthwith reigned the Kingdome to him. Picus Jupiter reigned in Italie threecore and two yeares, had threecore and tenne Wiues or Concubines, and about as many children: finally died, and lyes buried in the Isle of Crete. The principall of Jupiter sonnes were Fannus, Perseus, and Apollo. Fennus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie: hee reigned in Italie, after his father, fue and thirtie yeares: and then (finding that all his brethren conspired against him) he went into Egypt, with abundance of Treasure; where, after the death of Misraim, hee got the Kingdome, and held it nine and thirtie yeares. After Mercurie, Vulcan reigned in Egypt foure yeares and a halfe. Then Sol, the sonne of Vulcan, reigned twentie yeares and a halfe. There followed in order Sofis, Ofiris, Orus, and Thules, of whome we spake before: the length of their seuerall reignes is not set downe. After Thules, was the great Sesoftris King twentie yeares. His successor was Pharao, called Narecho, that held the Crowne fiftie yeares, with which there passed from him the surname of Pharao, to a very long posteritie.

These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set downe as I finde them: let their credit rest vpon the Author.

Others yet we finde, that are said to haue reigned in Egypt, without any certaine note, when, or how long: about whome I will not labour, as fearing more to be comprehended of some curiositie, in the search made after these already rehearsed, then of negligence, in omitting such as might haue bene added.

Vaphres, the father in law to Salomon; and Sesac, the afflicter of Reheboam, leade vs againe into faire way, but not farre. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but we are beholding to Clement Alexandrinus and Eusebius for it. These giue vs not the length of his reignes; but we know, that he liued in the times of Dauid and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Armie, tooke Gesar from the Canaanites, and gaue it to his daughter, Salomons wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sesac his sonne did fauour the enemies of Salomon, who kept so many Wiues and Concubines, besides this Egyptian Princeesse. In the life of Reheboam all hath bene written that I finde of Sesac, excepting the length of his reigne, which must haue bene sixe and twentie yeares, if he were that Sennedis with whome Eusebius begins the one and twentieth Dynastie.

Now forasmuch as it would serue to no great purpose, that wee knew the length of Sesac his reigne, and of theirs that followed him, vnlesse therewithall we knew the beginning of Sesac, vpon which the rest haue dependance, this course I take. From the fourth year of Iehoonkam, King of Inda, in which Pharao Neco was slaine, I reckon vpwards the yeares of the same Neco, and of his predecessors, vnto the beginning of Sesac: by which accompt, the first year of Sesac is found, concurrent with

Euseb. de Prep. Evangel. c. 4.
1. King. 9. 16. &
11. 18. 19. & c.

with the twentieth of Salomons raigne, and the twentieth sixt of Sesac with the sixt of Belshazzar: wherein Sesac spoyled the Temple, and died, enjoying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer; then Isa the Isradite and Cressus the Romane did; who, after him, spoyled the Temple of Ierusalem.

To fill up the time between Sesac and Neco, I have rather taken those Kings that I finde in the Greeke Historians, than them which are in Ensebius his Catalogue. For of these that are delisted by Ensebius, wee finde no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere, save only of Bachoris, who is remembered by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appeare to have bene a King. Hereunto I may adde, that the succession is often interrupted in Ensebius by *Aethiopi*ans, which got the Kingdom often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appeares by the Prophet Esaie, that the Councillors of Pharao did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, in so much, that they said of Pharao, I am the Sonne of the Wise, I am the Sonne of the ancient King. But that which overthrowes the reckoning of Ensebius, is, the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Juda. For though it please him well to see how the reigns of Isa and Reco meet by his computation, yet this indeede makes all; the reigns of Isa being misplaced. This error grows from his omitting to compare the reigns of the Kings of Juda with theirs of Israel: by which occasion, Isa, King of Israel, is made to raigne three yeares after Abasas of Juda; Sennasir was taken by Salmansasar before Hezekias was King: and in a word, all, or most of the Kings, have their beginnings placed in some other yeare of their collateralis than the Scriptures have determined.

§. VI.

Of CHEMMIS, CHEOPS, CEPHRENES, and other Kings recited by HERODOTUS and DIODORUS SICULUS, which reigned between the times of REXO- BOAN and EZEKIA.

Following therefore the Greeke Historians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chumis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after Sesac. He reigned fiftie yeares, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accounted one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottom vpwards, narrower and narrower to the toppe. This of Chemmis being foure-square, had a Bise of seven akers every way, and was about six akers high. It was of a very hard and durable Stone, which had lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand yeares, without complaining of any injury that it had suffered by weather in so long space. From the raigne of Chemmis, vnto the age of Augustus Caesar, wherein Diodore lived, are indeede a thousand yeares; which giues the better likelihood vnto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers testifie, that they haue bene them yet standing.

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother; but doubtfully, and inclining rather to the opinion, that his sonne Chabres succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might bee Chabres) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to haue bene brethren: but the length of their reignes may argue the later to haue bene sonne to the former: for Cheops reigned fiftie yeares, Cephrenes fiftie six. These were, as Chemmis had bene, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who alreadie had ouerlaboured themselves in erecting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombs; for those that raised them; but the malice of the Egyptians is said to haue cast out their bodies; and to haue called their Monuments by the name of an Enchanment, that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honour, and entitling a poore fellow to their workes, was held to be the casting out of their bodies: other wise, it is hard to conceiue, how it might bee, that they, who had not power to auoid the like flauerie, laid vpon them by the yonger brother, or sonne, should haue power or leisure to take such reuenge vpon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale deuised against Cheops his Daughter; That her Father, wanting monie, did prostitute her; and that shee, getting of euery man that accompanied her, one stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that stood in the middle of the other three. Belike shee was an insolent Ladie, and made them follow their drudgerie, for her sake, longer a while than they thought to haue done, in raising a Monument, with the superfluitie of her Fathers prouisions.

Necurus, the sonne of Cephrenes, reigned after his Father sixe yeares. He would haue built as his foregoers did, but prevented by death, finished not what hee had begunne. The people thought him a good King, for that he did open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatned him with a short life of sixe yeares only, because of this his deuotion; For (saide the Oracle) Egypt should haue bene afflicted an hundred and fiftie yeares, which by Predecessors know, and performed for their parts, but thou hast relapsed, therefore shalt thou live but fise yeares. Its very strange, that the Gods should be offended with a King for his pietie; or that they should decree to make a Countrie impious, when the people were desirous to serue them; or that they hauing so decreed, it should lie in the power of a King, to alter delictie, and make the ordinance of the Gods to faile in taking full effect. But these were Egyptian Gods. The true God was, doubtlesse, more offended with the restitution of such Idolatrie, than with the interruption. And who knowes, whether Chemmis did not learne somewhat at Ierusalem, in the last yeare of his Father Sesac, that made him percieue, and deliuer to those that followed him, the vanitie of his Egyptian superstition? Sure it is that his raigne, and the reignes of Cheops, and Cephrenes, were more long and more happie, than that of Necurus, who, to delude the Oracle, reuelled away both daies and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, hee had changed his nights into daies, and so doubled the time appointed: a seruice more pleasing to the Deuill, than the restitution of Idolatrie durst then seeme, when it could speede no better. I finde in Reinecius fiftie yeares assigned to this King; which I verily beleue to haue bene some error of the print, though I finde it not corrected among other such our-lights: for I know no Author that giues him so many yeares, and Reinecius himselfe takes notice of the Oracle, that threatned Necurus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bachoris is placed next vnto Necurus, by Diodore, who speaks no more of him 40 than this, that he was a strong man of body, and excelling his Predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by diuers Authors, as one that loued iustice; and may be taken for that Bachoris, whom Suidas commendeth in that kinde: Ensebius reckons foure and forty yeares of his raigne.

After Bachoris, one Sabacus an Aethiopian followes, in the Catalogue of Diodore, but certaine ages after him. Herodotus, quite omitting Bachoris, hath Apschis; who made a sharpe law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paid. This Apschis made a Pyramis of brick, more costly and faire, in his owne judgement, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Apschis, Herodotus placeth one Amphis, 50 an blinde man, before the Aethiopian. The reignes of these two are perhaps those many ages, which the Egyptians, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted betweene Bachoris and him that followed them. But all this could make but sixe yeares; and so long doth Funiculus, so long doth Reinecius hold, that these two Kings, betweene them both, did gouerne. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it vnpro-babie, that the reignes of two Kings should have bene so soone spent; he may doe it by taking some yeares from Seton or Panmeticus, and adding them to either of theſe. To adde vnto theſe, without ſubtracting from ſome other, would breed a manifeſt inconuenience: forasmuch as part of Seſe's his raigne, muſt haue bene in the ſite of R H O R O A N; as also the laſt of Pharao Neo was the fourth of Ierodotus, and the firſt of Achabadeszar. For mine owne part I like it better to allow fixe yeares only to theſe two Kings, than to looſe the witneſſe of Ierodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth ſpeake of Senacherib's warre: at which time Seton was King of Aegypt. I will not therefore adde yeares vnto theſe obſcure names; for by adding vnto theſe men three yeares, wee ſhall thruſt the beginning of Seton out of place, and make it later than the death of Senacherib. In regard of this agreement of Ierodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him, in his Aegyptian Kings. Otherwiſe it were a matter of no great enuie, to leaue both Aſychu and Anſis out of the roll; which were eaſily done, by placing Seſe lower, and extending his life yet fixe yeares further, or more, (if the like abridgement ſhall be required of Panmeticus his raigne) into the yeares of Reheboam.

Of Sabieu the Aethiopian, who tooke the Kingdome from Anſis, it is agreed by the moſt, that he raigned fixe yeares. He was a mercifull Prince, not puniſhing all capitall offences with death, but impoſing bondage and bodily labour vpon malefactors; by whole toyle hee both got much wealth into his owne hands, letting out their ſeruire to hire, and performed many workes, of more vſe than pompe, to the ſingular benefit of the Countrey. Zanuiſ calls this King Sna, the Scriptures call him So. Hoſes, the laſt King of Iſrael, made a League with him againſt Sihannanſar, little to his good: for the Aegyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendſhip could not preſerue the Iſraelite from deſtruction.

It ſeemes, that the encroaching power of the Aſſyrian, grew terrible to Aegypt about theſe times; the victories of Tiglath Phulaſſar, and Salmaneſſar, having eaten ſo farre into Syria, in the raigne of theſe one King So or Sabieu. Yea, perhaps it was in his daies (for his raigne beganne in the fourth of Menſem) that Phul himſelfe did make the firſt entrance into Paleſtina. This cauſed So to animate the halfe ſubdued people, againſt their Conquerours; but the helpe which he and his Succellor gaue them was ſo faint, that Senacherib's Embaſſador compared the Aegyptian ſuccour to a broken ſtaffe of Reede. Such indeede had Hoſes found it, and ſuch Ezekia might haue found it, had hee not bene ſupported by the ſtronger ſtaffe of Him, that rules all Nations with a rod of yron. It appeares by the words of Iſaiah, that the opinion was great in Juda, of the Aegyptian forces, for Charrets and Hoſemen, but this power, whatſoeuer it was, grew needfull, within a little while, for the defence of Aegypt it ſelfe, which So left vnto Seton his Succellor, hauing now fulfilled the ſittie yeares of his raigne. Ierodotus and Diodorus haue both one tale, from the relation of Aegyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King; ſaying, that he left the Countrey, and willingly retired into Aethiopia, becauſe it was often ſignified vnto him in his dreames, by the God which was worſhipped at Thebes, that his raigne ſhould be neither long nor prosperous, vnleſſe he ſlew all the Priests in Aegypt, which rather than to doe, he reſigned his Kingdome. Surely, theſe Aegyptian Gods were of a ſtrange quality, that ſo ill rewarded their Seruants, and invited Kings to doe them wrong. Well might the Aegyptians (as they likewiſe did) worſhip Dogs as Gods, when their chiefe Gods had the proprietie of Dogs, which loue their Maſters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests ſhould haue ſuined this tale, I cannot tell, and therefore I thinke that it might be ſome deuile, of the fearful old man, who ſeeing his R calme in danger of an inuaſion, fought an honeſt excuſe for his departure out of it, and with-drawing himſelfe into Aethiopia, where he had bene bred in his youth. What if one ſhould ſay, that the Aethiops into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tubake the King (perhappes at the inſtigation of this man) raiſed an Armie againſt Senacherib, when hee meant meant to inuade Aegypt, within two or three yeares after? But I will not trouble my ſelfe with ſuch enquire. This I hold, that So, or Sabieu, was not indeede an Aethiopian (for in his time liued the Prophet Eſay, who mentioneth the antiquitie of Pharaoh's houſe) but only ſo furnamed for his education, and becauſe ſituing from thence, he got the Kingdome from Anſis, who was his oppoſite. The quiet and milde forme of his Government; his holding the Kingdome ſo long without an Armie; and many other circumſtances argue no iuſtice. But whether finally hee betooke to a priuate life, or whether hee fore-went his Life and Kingdome at once, being now very old, it is time that we leaue him, and ſpeake of Seton his next Succellor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembered by Ierodotus, by a ſure token of his hauing bene King.

§. VII.

Of SEYTON who raigned with Ezekia, and ſided with him againſt SENACHERIB.

THE firſt yeare of Seton's raigne falls into the twelfth of Ezekia, which was the ſitt of Senacherib. It was a troubleſome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdomes of Aſſyria and Aegypt, being then engaged in a Warre, the iſſue whereof was to determine, whether of them ſhould rule or ſerue. The Aſſyrian had the better men of warre; the Aegyptian, better prouiſion of neceſſaries: the Aſſyrian, more Subjects; the Aegyptian, more Friends; and among the new conquered halfe Subjects of Aſſyria, manie that were Aegyptian in heart, though Aſſyrian in outward ſiew.

Of this laſt ſort were Ezekia, and his people; who, knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them againſt his owne great Enemy, preferred the friendſhip of ſo neare and mightie a Neighbour, before the ſeruire of a terrible, yet ſame remoued King. But herein was great difference, betwene Ezekia and his Subjects, For the good King, fixing his eſpeciall confidence in God, held that courſe of policy, which hee thought moſt likely to turne to the benefit of his Countrey: the multitude of Juda, looking into the faire hopes which this Aegyptian league promiſed, were pulled vp with vaine conceits, thinking that all was late, and that now they ſhould not neede to feare any more of thoſe injuries, which they had ſuſtained by the Aſſyrians, and ſo became forgetfull of God, taking counſaile but not of him. The Prophet Eſay complained much of this preſumption; giuing the people of Juda to vnderſtand, That the Aegyptians were men, and not God, and their Horſes fleſh, and not Spirit; that God himſelfe ſhould defend Iſrael vpon repentance, and that Aſſyria ſhould fall by the ſword, but not of man. As for the Aegyptians (ſaid the Prophet) they are vanitiſe, and they ſhall helpe in vaine, their ſtrength is to ſit ſtill.

According to the Prophets words it came to paſſe. For in the treatie of Confederacie that was held at Zaan, all manner of contentment and aſſurance was giuen to the Jewes, by Seton, or his Agents, who filled them with ſuch reports, of Horſes and Charrets, that they did not looke (as Eſay ſaith) vnto the holy one of Iſrael, nor ſeek vnto the Lord. But he yet is wiſe.

After a while came Senacherib with his Armie, and wakened them out of theſe dreames, for Seton their good Neighbour, as neare as he was, did ſeeme farre off, being vnreadie, when his helpe was moſt needfull. It may ſeeme that he purpoſed, rather to make Paleſtina than Aegypt the ſtage, whereon this great Warre ſhould be aded, and was not without hope, that the Aſſyrians and Jewes, weakening one another, ſhould yeeld vnto him a faire aduantage ouer both. Yet he fought with menie; for he ſent Horſes and Camells laden with treaſure, to hire the Arabians, whom

1. 3. 30. 8. Ejy calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit indeed; for (besides that it seemes by the same place of Ejy, that the rich treasures mislarded, and fell into the enemies hands before any helpe appeared from Tirhaca.) all the strong Cities of Juda were taken by Senacherib, except Lubna, Lachis, and Ierusalem it selfe, which were in fore disire, till the sword of God, and not of Man, defeated the Assyrian, who did goe for Isaie, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Ninne, wherhe was hisane.

7. 23. 9. Concerning this expedition of Senacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against Egypt, where the men of warre, being offended with Seton their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to beare armes in defence of him and the Countrey; that Seton being Pulean Priest, bemoaned himselfe to his God, who by dreame promised to send him helpers; that hereupon Seton, with such as would follow him, (which were crafts-men, shop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Pelusium; and that a great multitude of field-mice entering the Campe of Senacherib by night, did so know the bowes, quivers, and straps of his mens armour, that they were faine the next day to flee away in all haste, finding themselves disarmed. In memorie hereof (saith Herodotus) the statue of this King is set up in the Temple of Pulean, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription. Let him, that beholds me, feare God. Such was the relation of the Egyptian Priests, wherein how faine they swarred from the truth, being desirous to magnifie their owne King, it may easily be perceived. It seemes that this Image of Seton was fallen downe, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did forbear to tell him (which caused him to omit it) for that the Nation of the Tenes was then well knowne to the world, whereof euery child could haue told, how much fallshood had beene mingled with the truth.

We finde this historie agreeable to the Scriptures, thus farre forth; That Senacherib King of the Assyrians, and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians or peraduenture some borderers vpon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) liued in this age, made Warre vpon Egypt, and was miraculously driuen home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Pulean did vnto his Priest; happy it was (if Seton were a Priest) that he tooke his God now in so good a mood. For within three or foure yeares before this, all the Priests in Egypt should haue bene slaine, if a mercifull King had not spared their liues, as it were halfe against the Gods will. Therefore this last good turne was not enough to serue as an example, that might stirre vp the Egyptians to pietie, seeing that their deuotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I thinke, that this Image did represent Senacherib himselfe, and that the Mouse in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian manner of expressing things) the shamefull issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by means which came no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, shewed vpon this vngodly King, was indeede a very good motiue to pietie. But the embleme, together with the Temple of Pulean (being perhaps the chiefe Temple in that Towne where this Image was erected) might giue occasion to such a fable; the Deuill helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that we may not belie the Deuill, I hold it very likely, that Seton, finding himselfe in danger, did call vpon his Gods, that is, vpon Pulean, Seraph, or any to whom he had most deuotion. But so had other of his Predecessors done in the like neede: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like miracle? Surely the Tenes (euen such of them as most were giuen to Idolatrie) would haue bene alhamed of the confidence which they reposed, in the Charvers of Egypt, because they were many, and in the Horse-men, because they were very strong; had it bene told them, that Seton, in stead of sending those Horse-men and Charretts, was beseeching Pulean, to send him and them good luck, or else (for these also were Egyptian Gods) addressing his prayers to some Onyon or Cat. How soeuer it was, doubtless the prophetic of Ejy tooke effect, which said, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor helpe, nor doe them good, but shall be a shame and also a reproch. Such is commonly the issue of humane wisdom, when relying secure vpon prouision that it selfe hath made, it will no longer seeme to stand in neede of God.

Some there are who take Seton to haue bene set downe by Eusebius, vnder the name of Tarachus the Ethiopian, and therefore the twentie yeares which are giuen to Tarachus, they allow to the raigne of Seton. These haue well obserued, that Tarachus the Ethiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Egypt, but as a friend to that Countrey, or at least an enemy to Senacherib, in the warre last spoken of: the Ethiopians (as they are englished) ouer which hee raigned, being indeede Chusites or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they thinke, that this Tarachus or Tirhaca, is placed in the roome of Seton, and therefore giue to Seton the twentie yeares of Tarachus, I hold them to haue erred on the other hand. For this Ethiopian (as he is called) beganne his raigne ouer Egypt, by Eusebius his account, after the death of Senacherib and of Ezekia, in the first yeare of Manasses King of Juda. Therefore he, or his yeares, haue no reuerence to Seton.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Seton raigned; Functius peremptorily citing no Author, nor alleging reason for it, sets him downe thirtie three yeares; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not careful to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded vnto my selfe at the first, for measuring the raignes of these Egyptian Kings. The yeares which passed from the first of Rehoobam, vnto the fourth of Iehoiakim, I so diuide among the Egyptians, that giuing to euery one the proportion allowed vnto him by the Author in whom hee is found, the rest is to bee conserued vpon him whose length of raigne is vncertaine; that is vpon this Seton. By this account I finde the thirtie three yeares, that are set downe by Functius, to agree very nearely, if not precisely, with the time of Seton his raigne; therefore I conforme my owne reckoning to his, though I could be content to haue it one yeare lesse. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Psummetichus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and wherinto the course of this Historie will shortly bring me; the Egyptian affaires growing now to bee entangled with the matters of Juda, to which it is meete that I returne.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of MANASSE and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

The wickednesse of MANASSE. His imprisonment, Repentance, and Death.

MANASSE, the Sonne of Ezechias, forgetting the pietie of his Father, and the prosperitie which followed him, set vp, repaired, adorned, and furnished, all the Altars, Temples, and high Places, in which the Idoll was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, hee himselfe esteemed the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, with all the host of Heauen, as Gods, and worshipped them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his Sonne, for a Sacrifice to the Devill Moloch, or Melch, in the Valley of Thinnon, or Benhennon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Devills.

He also gave himselfe to all kinde of Witch-craft and Sorcerie, accompanied and maintayned those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, he shed so much innocent blood, as Ierusalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reuerent Prophet Esay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Iewes attribute, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet neare unto the Foundation of Sion to be sawne in sunder, with a wooden saw, in the eightieth yeare of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous then hath beene heard of. The Scriptures indeede are silent hereof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captaines of the Host of the Kings of Assyria, which took MANASSE, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chains, and carried him to Babel: Where after he had lien twentie yeares as a captive, and disposed of all honour and hope; yet to his heartie repentance and continuall prayer, the God of infinite mercie had respect, and moued the Assyrians heart to deliuer him.

It is so likely that Merodach, because he loued his father Ezechias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his libertie & estate. After which and when he was againe established, remembering the miseries which followed his wickednesse, and Gods great mercies toward him, he changed forme, detested his former foolish and deuillish Idolatrie, and cast downe the Idolls of his owne erection prepared the Altar of God, and sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Ierusalem: and dyed after the long raigne of fiftie five yeares. Gleazar and Sidus report, that Manasse was held in a cask of yron by the Assyrians: and therein sedde with bread of branne and water, which men may beleeue as it shall please their fancies.

§. II.

of troubles in Egypt following the death of SETHON. The raigne of PSAMMETICVS.

THAT the wickednesse of King Manasse was the cause of the euill, which fell vpon his Kingdome and Perion, any Christian must needs beleeue: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things, in those parts of the World, such, at that time, as would haue inuited any Prince (and did perhaps inuite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, vpon respect borne to his owne ends) desirous of enlarging his Empire, to make attempt vpon Iuda. For the Kingdome of Egypt, which was become the pillar, whereon the state of Iuda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with ciuill dissention, and after two yeares, ill amended by a diuision of the government betweene twelue Princes. After some good agreement betweene these, election of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himselfe absolute King of all. This Inter-regnum, or meere Anarchie, that was in Egypt, with the diuision of the Kingdome following it, is placed by Dioderus, who omitteth Setson, betweene the raignes of Sabacus, and Psammeticus: but Herodotus doth set the Anisioeratis, or twelue Gouvernours, immediately before Psammeticus, who was one of them, and after Setson.

The occasion of this dissention seemes to haue bene the vncertaine of title to that Kingdome (for that the Crowne of Egypt passed by succession of blood, I haue often shewed) which ended, for a while, by the partition of all among twelue, though things were not settled, untill one had obtained the Soueraigntie.

These twelue Rulers gouerned fifteene yeares, in good seeming agreement, which to preserve, they made strait couenants and alliances one with another, being jealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drink offering, in Ptolemys Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilst this vnicie lasted, they joyned together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built neare vnto the Lake of Marus, a worke to admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beheld it, affirms) no wordes could giue it commendation, and workeable to the latelinitie of the worke it selfe. I will not here set downe that vnperfect description, which Herodotus makes of it, but thinke enough to say, that he preserues it first before the Pyramids, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the fairest workes in Greece. Dioderus reports this Labyrinth to haue beene the worke of Marus, or Menides, a King which liued five generations before Ptolemys, that is, before the Warre of Troy, and from this Labyrinth (saith he) Dadalus took the pattern of that which he made for Minos in Creece. Who this Marus, or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to haue bene Amennones, which reigned immediately before Tharvis. But this agrees not with Dioderus: for Dadalus and Minos were both dead long before Amennones was King. Belike Reineccius, desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Nanethon, Charmen, and others, that are found in Iosephus, touching Amennophis and his children, to the storie of Amasis, and Alisifanes the Ethiopian, mentioned by Dioderus; held it consequent, after he had conjectured Nanethon Amennophis, to be Thodon his Amasis, that Setson should be Alisifanes, and that Amennones should be Marus. If in this case I might intrude a conjecture; the times which we now handle, are those, about which Reineccius hath erred in making search; Amasis was Anysis; Alisifanes was Sabacus; and Marus was one of these twelue Princes, to whom Herodotus giues the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Alisifanes the Ethiopian deposed Amasis, Sabacus the Ethiopian deposed Anysis; Alisifanes gouerned well, and was milde in punishing offenders, offendors; so likewise was Sabacus; & Alaric the next King after Attilius built this Labyrinth; and the next (sauiing Setlon, whom Diodore omits, as hauiing not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same worke, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to heare the truth, as liuing nearer to the Age wherein it was performed. The varietie of names, and difference of times, wherein Diodore beleueed the Priests, might be a part of the Aegyptian vanitie, which was familiar with them, in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelue great Halls, Parlours, and other circumstances remembered by Herodotus, in speaking of this building, doe helpe to proue, that it was the worke of these twelue Princes. But I haisten to their end.

At a solemne feast in Pileas Temple, when they were to make their drinke-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himselfe, brought forth no more than eleuen Cups. Hereupon Psammiticus, who standing last, had not a Cup, tooke off his brazen Helmet, and therewith supplied the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traitor: yet, when they found that it was not done by him vpon set purpose, or ill intent, they forbore to kill him, but, being jealous of their estate, they banished him into the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the euent, is held by Diodore as a fable, which I beleuee to haue bene none other: In the rest Herodotus and Diodore agree, saying, that Psammiticus byred Souldiers out of Caria and Jonis, by whose aide he vanquished his Companions, and so made himselfe sole King.

The yeares of his raigne, according to Herodotus, were fiftie foure; according to Eusebius, fortie foure; Alexander, to reconcile these two, giues foure foure yeares to his single raigne, and ten to his ruling, joyntlie with the Princes before spoken of. Indeece, he that was admitted, being a man growne (for hee cannot in reason bee supposed to haue bene then a yong fellow) into the number of the twelue Gouernours, must be thought to haue liued vnto extreme old age, if hee ruled partly with others, partly alone, threcore and nine yeares. I therefore yeeld rather to Eusebius, but will not aduenture to cut fife yeares from the Arifloerale: though peraduenture Psammiticus was not at first one of the twelue, but succeeded (either by election, or as next of blood) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and was ten yeares companion in that gouernment.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The yeares of these Aegyptians, as we finde them set downe, are more by one, than true to fill vp the time, betwene the fift of Belshazzar, and the fourth of Iehoiachim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one yeare from Setlon's raigne; that was of vncertaine length; or else (which I had rather doe; because Eusebius may haue followed better authoritie than I know, or than himselfe altogether, in giuing to Setlon a time so nearely agreeing with the truth) wee must confound the last yeare of one raigne, with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent, for no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set downe in Chronological tables, raigned precisely for many yeares as are ascribed vnto them, without any frictions: it is enough to thinke, that the surplusage of one mans time, supplied the deficit of anothers. Wherefore I confound the last yeare of those fiftene, wherein the twelue Princes ruled, with the first of Psammiticus; who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himselfe Lord alone, all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Aegypt, who entertained any frait amitie with the Greekes; that he retayned in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Jonis, and Arabis, to whom hee gaue large rewards and possessions; and that he greatly offended his Aegyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Armie, whilst his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honorable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Vpon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, forsooke their natural

Countrie

Countrie of Aegypt, and went into Arthopia, to dwell there: neither could they be reuoked by kinde Messages, nor by the King himselfe, who ouer-tooke them on the way; but when hee told them of their Countrie, their Wiues, and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrie, and that nature had enabled them to get other wiues and children.

It is also reported of him, That he caued two Infants to bee brought vp in such sort as they might not heare any word spoken; by which meanes, he hoped to find out, what Nation or Language was most ancient; forasmuch as it seemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speake that language, which men spake at the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cried, Becus, Becus, which word being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, serued greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquitie. Geropius Becanus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low Dutch; in which the word Becker, signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turne ouer any part of Geropius his works, may finde enough of this kinde, to perswade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarchs, vied none other tongue than the Low Dutch, before the confusion of languages at Babel; the name it selfe of Babel, being also Dutch, and giuen by occasion of this confusion; for that theretoe they beganne to bable, and talke, one knew not what.

But I will not insilt vpon all that is written of Psammiticus. The most regardable of his acts was the siege of Azotus in Palestina, about which hee spent nine and twentie yeares. Neuer haue we heard (saith Herodotus) that any Citie endured for so long a siege as this; yet Psammiticus carried it at the last. This Towne of Azotus had bene wonne by Tartan, a Captaine of Senscherib, and was now, as it seemeth releued, but in vaine, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out so well.

§. III.

30 What reference these Aegyptian matters might haue to the imprisonment and enlargement of MANASSES. In what part of his raigne MANASSES was taken prisoner.

30 Were it certainly knowne, in what yeare of his raigne Manasse was taken prisoner, and how long it was before hee obtained libertie; I thinke wee should finde these Aegyptian troubles to haue bene no small occasion, both of his captiuitie and enlargement: God so disposing of humane actions, that euen they, who intended only their owne buisinesse, fulfilled only his high pleasure. For either the ciuill warres in Aegypt that followed vpon the death of Setlon; or the renting of the Kingdome, as it were into twelue peeces; or the warre betwene Psammiticus and his Collegues; or the expedition of Psammiticus into Syria, and the siege of Azotus, might minister vnto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope, to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts, or such necessitie of sending an Armie into those parts, to defend his owne, as would greatly tempt him, to make sure worke with the King of Ida. The same occasions sufficed also, to procure the deliuerie of Manasse, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Iosephus hath it) by subtiltie, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, winne his Countrie, but only wait. So that the Hebrei, hauing learned wit, by the ill successe of their folly, in redeeming Amaziah, were like to be more circumspect, in making their bargain vpon such another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Aegyptian matters presented more weightie arguments of hope and feare, than the little Kingdome of Ida could afford, had no reason, to spend his forces, in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficultie as a greater, whereby hee should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement;

ment; when by quitting his present advantage ouer the Leues, hee might make his way the laier into Aegypt.

Now concerning the year of Manasses his reigne, wherein hee was taken prisoner; or concerning his captiuitie it selfe, how long it lasted; the Scriptures are silent, and Iosephus giues no information. Yet I finde cited by Tornelius three opinions; the one of Belarmine, who thinks that Manasses was taken in the fifteenth year of his reigne; the other of the Author of the greater Iebrey Chronologie, who affirms, that it was in his twentie seuenth year; the third, of Rabbi Kimhi vpon Ezekiel, who saith, that he was forty yeares an Idolator, and liued fiftene yeares after his repentance. The first of these conjectures is vpheld by Tornelius, who rejects the second, as more vnprobable, and condemnes the third as most false. Yet the reasons alleged by Tornelius in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such as may rather proue him to fauour the Cardinell, as farre as he may, (for where need requires, hee doth freely dissent from him) than to haue vsed his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before he gaue his judgement. Two arguments he brings to maintain the opinion of Belarmine: the one, that Ammon the Sonne of Manasses, is said by Iosephus, to haue followed the workes of his Fathers youth; the other, that had Manasses growne old in his sinnes, it is not like that hee shoud haue continued, as hee did, in his amendment vnto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason, why the sinnes of Manasses, might not be distinguished from his repentance in his old age, by calling them workes of his youth, which appeared when he was twelve yeares old; though it were granted that hee continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimhi) vntill hee was but fiftene yeares from death. Touching the second; how soeuer it be a fearefull thing, to call off vnto the last those good motions vnto repentance, which we know not whether euer God will offer vnto vs againe; yet were it a terrible hearing. That the sinnes, which are not forsaken before the age of two and fiftie yeares, shall bee punished with small impenitencie. But against these two collections of Tornelius, I will say two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not vnlikely, That Manasses continued longer in this wickednesse, than Belarmine hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimhi hath affirmed. In the second Booke of Kings, the euill which Manasses did is remembred at large, and his repentance vtterly omitted; so that his amendment may seeme to haue taken vp no great part of his life, the storie of him being thus concluded, in the one and twentieth Chapter. Concerning the rest of the acts of MANASSES, and all that hee did, and his sinne that hee sinned, are they not written in the booke of the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda. The other place is in the foure and twentieth Chapter of the same Booke, where in rehearsing the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Iehorakim, the great Grand-child of this Manasses, it is said; Surely by the commandment of the Lord came this vpon Iuda, that he might put them out of his sight, for the finnes of MANASSES, according to all that hee did, and for the innocent blood that hee shed (for hee filled Ierusalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who so considers well these places, may finde small cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manasses was no earlier than fiftene yeares before his death; or most probable, That when he was twentie seuen yeares old, he repented, and becoming a new man, liued in the feare of God forth yeares after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth can not be discovered. It sufficeth to say, that two yeares of ciuill dissension in Aegypt, fourteene or fiftene yeares following, wherein that Kingdome was weakened, by partition of the Soueraigntie; the warre of Phanmites against his Associates; and foure and twentie yeares, of the nine and twentie, wherein the siege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manasses, did leaue no one part of his reigne (after the first fiftene yeares) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonian, whose men of warre had continuall occasions of visiting his Countie. All which I will adde hereto is this; that the fiftenth of

Manasse, was the last year of Sethon in Aegypt, and the one and thirtieth of Solomon his reigne, or (accounting from the death of Asarhaddon) the twentieth: The seuen and twentieth of Manasse was the tenth of the twelve Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merochab: his fortieth, was the twentie third of Phanmites, and the fift of Xabulassar, the sonne of Merochab in Babylon: but which of these was the year of his imprisonment, or whether any other, I forbear to throw mine opinion, least I should thereby seeme to draw all matters ouer violently to mine owne computation.

This was the first great miserie that the Babylonian had of the Kingdome of Iuda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmassar, yet Ezechias neuer payed it. True it is, that hee hoped to slay Sennacherib enterprised against him, by presenting him with three hundred talents of siluer, and thirte of gold, besides the plate which couered the dores and pillars of the Temple.

But Manasse being pressed with greater necessitie, could refuse no tollerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impose vpon him; among which it seemes, that this was one, (which was indeede a point of seruitude) that hee might not hold peace with the Aegyptians, whilst they were enemies to Babylon. This appears not only by his fortifying with men of warre all the strong Cities of Iuda after his returne (which was rather against Phanmites, whose partie hee had forsaken, than against the Babylonian, with whom hee had thenoreforth no more contentious) but likewise by that opposition, which Iosiah made afterwards to Pharao Neco, in fauour of Xabulassar, which had bene against all reason and policie, if it had not bene his dutie by couenant. Of this I will speake more in conuenient place.

§. IIII.

Of the first and second Messenian Warres, which were in the reignes of Ezekias, and MANASSES Kings of Iuda.

Now concerning such actions as were performed abroad in the world, about these times of Manasse, the most remarkable were the Messenian Warres; which happening in this age, and being the greatest action performed in Greece, betweene the Troian and Perjian Warres, deserue not to be passed ouer with silence.

The first Messenian Warre beganne and ended in the daies of Ezekias; the second in the reigne of Manasse: but to auoide the trouble of interrupting our Historie, I haue thought it best, to rehearse them both in this place. Other introduction is needlesse, than to say, that the posteritie of Heracles, during the issue of Pelops, and the Achaean, out of their feares, diuided their lands betweene themselves, and created the Kingdomes of Lacedaemon, Argos, Messene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of Kindred, and fought one anothers ruine with bloudie Warres; whereof these Messenian were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Messenian Warre, are scarce worth remembrance; they were so sleight. Ambition was the true cause of it; whereas the Lacedaemonians were so transported, that any thing serued them as a colour, to accomplish their greedie desires. Yet other matter was alleaged; namely, that one Polychares Messenian had slaine many Lacedaemonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta desiring to haue him yielded into their hands, could not obtaine it. The Messenians on the other side, excused Polychares, for that he was growne frantick, through injuries received from Euphros a Lacedaemonian. This Euphros had bargained to giue a picture to the Cattel of Polychares, and was therefore to receiue part of the increase:

but not contented with the gaine appointed, hee sold the Cattails, and Slaues that kept them, to Merchants, which done, he came with a faire tale to his friend, saying, that they were stolen. Whilst the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the slaues that had escaped from the Merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedaemonians being thus deprehended, confessed all, and promised large amends; which to receive, hee carried the Sonne of Polycharus home with him, but hauing him at home, hee villanously slew him. Wherefore, the Lacedaemonians hauing refused, after long sute made by the wretched Father, to doe him right against this Theefe and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrell, out of those things, which hee did in that madnesse, wherinto they themselves had cast him. So said the Messenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand vnto the judgement of the Amphictyones, who were as the generall Counsaile of Greece, or to any other faire course. But the Lacedaemonians, who had a great desire to occupie the faire Countrie of Messene, that lay close by them, were not content with such allegations. They thought it enough, to haue some shew for their doings, which the better to colour, they reckoned vp many old injuries, and so without sending any defiance, secretly tooke an oath, to hold warre with Messene, till they had maltreated it: which done, they seized vpon Amphisa, a frontier Towne of that Prouince, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercie, very few escaping.

Hereupon the Messenians tooke Armes, and were met by the Enemy. A furious battaile was fought betwene them, which ended not vntill darke night, with vncertaine victorie. The Messenians did strongly encampe themselves; The Lacedaemonians, vnable to force their Campe, returned home. This Warre beganne in the second year of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, hauing lasted twentie yeares. The two enemy Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedaemonians waiting the inland parts of Messene; and the Messenians, the Sea coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both sides, were called in to helpe. The Arcadians, Argues, and Sicyonians, tooke part with Messene; the Spartans had, besides many Subjects of their owne, aide from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Greece. So a second, third, and fourth battaile were fought, with as great obstinacie as the first; saying that, in the fourth battaile, the Lacedaemonians were enforced to turne their backs; in the other fights, the victorie was still vncertaine though in one of them the Messenians lost Epulatus their King, in whose head they chose Arifolomeneus.

Many yeares were spent, ere all this blood was shed; for pestilent diseases, and want of monie to entertaine Souldiers, caused the Warre to linger. And for the same reasons, did the Messenians, forsake all their inland Townes, excepting Thome, which was a mountaine with a Towne vpon it, able to endure more, than the enemies were likely to doe. But as some Authors tell vs, the Lacedaemonians were so obstinate, in this Warre, because of their vow, that hauing absented themselves ten yeares from Sparta, their wives sent them word, that their Citie would grow vncrooked, by reason that no children had bene borne them in all that time: Whereupon they sent back all their ablest young men, promiscuously to accompanie the young women, who got to many of them with child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diomedes refers the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time. But in process of this Messenian Warre, when the Devil in an Oracle had aduised the Messenians to Sacrifice a Virgin of the flock of Aegyptus, that so they might be victorious against the Lacedaemonians; the lord falling vpon the Daughter of one Lysiscus, Epibolus the Priest, willing to saue her, said, shee was only a fostered child, and not borne of the wife of Lysiscus: which answer giuing alie to the execution of the Maide, Lysiscus secretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Arifolomeneus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his owne Daughter: but a young Noble man, being in loue with the Maide, when otherwise he could not prouaile, said openly that shee was no Virgin, but that he had begot floured her, and got her with child: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped vp his innocent Daughters belly, to disproue the Lovers slander: at the graue of which Daughter of his, afterward falling, by other superstitions, into despair of preuailling against the Lacedaemonians, he slew himselfe, to the great hurt of his Countrie, which hee loued most dearly. For after his death the Messenians lost their courage, and finding themselves distressed by many wants, especially of victuals, they craved peace; which they obtained vnder most rigorous conditions. Halfe the yearly fruits of their Land they were bound to send vnto Sparta; and they, with their Wiues, to make solemne lamentations, at the death of euery Spartan King: they were also sworne to lue in true subjection to the Lacedaemonians; and part of their Territorie was taken from them, which was giuen to the Afinas, and such as had followed the Spartans in this Warre.

This peace being made vpon so vneuen termes, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirtie yeares it continued (the Messenians not finding how to help themselves) and then brake out into a new and more furious Warre, than the former. The able young men, that were growne vp in the roome of those Messenians, whom the former Warre had consumed, beganne to consider their owne strength and multitude, thinking themselves equall to the Lacedaemonians, and therefore learning to serue such Matters, as had against all right, oppressed their Fathers. The chiefe of these was Arifolomeneus, a noble Gentleman, of the house of Aegyptus; who perceiving the vniforme desires of his Countrie men, aduentured to become their Leader. He therefore founding the affections of the Argues, and Arcadians, which he found thoroughly answerable to his purpose, beganne open warre vpon the State of Lacedaemon. This was in the fourth year of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedaemonians, halied to quench the fire before it shuld grow too hot with such forces as they could raise of their own, without troubling their Friends, mening to deale with their Enemies, ere any succour were lent them. So a strong battaile was fought betwene them, and a doubtfull, save that the Messenians were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, to thinke them their equalls. Particularly, the valour of Arifolomeneus appeared such in this fight, that his people would haue made him their King: but he, refusing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one yeare another battaile was fought, wherunto each part came better provided. The Lacedaemonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to helpe: the Messenians had the Argues, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloodie fight; but Arifolomeneus did so beaue himselfe, that finally hee made the Enemies runne for their liues. Of such importance was this victorie, that the Lacedaemonians beganne to bethinke themselves, of making some good agreement. But one Tyrtaeus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, reinforced their Spirits with his Verses. After this, Arifolomeneus tooke by surpris a Towne in Laconia, and vanquished in fight Amazander King of Sparta, who did set vpon him, in hope to haue recovered the bootie.

But all these victories of Arifolomeneus perished in the losse of one battaile, wherof the honour (if it were honour) or surely the profit, fell vnto the Lacedaemonians, through the treason of Arifolocrates, King of Acadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with monie, fled away, and left the Messenians exposed to a cruell butcherie. The losse was so great, that together with Andania their principal Citie, all the towns in Messene, standing too farre from the Sea, were abandoned, for lack of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not bee safe abroad, was conueied, as into a place of safetie. Here the Lacedaemonians found a tedious worke, that held them eleven yeares. For besides that Era it selfe was a strong peece, Arifolomeneus with three hundred foot Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindered their attendance on the siege. He wasted all the fields of Messene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Lacomis, taking king away Corne, Wine, Cattail, and all prouisions, necessarie for his owne people; the Slaues and houlhold stuite he changed into monie, suitring the owners to redeeme them. To remedie this mischiefe the Lacedemonians made an Edict, that neither Messene, nor the adjoining parts of their owne Countrey, should be killed or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among priuate men, that were almost vndone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtius appeald this vproare with pleasing Songs. But Aristomenes grew so bold, that hee not only ranged ouer all the fields, but aduentured vpon the Townes, surpris'd, and sackt Amycle, and finally caus'd the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other seruices, thrice Aristomenes was taken prisoner, yet still he escaped. One escape of his deserves to bee remembred, as a thing very strange and meruailous. Hee had with too much courage aduentured to set vpon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and killed to the ground, was taken vp senselesse, and carried away prisoner, with fiftie of his Companions. There was a deepe naturall Caue into which the Spartans fled to cast head-long, such as were condemned to die for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Aristomenes and his Companions adjudged. All the rest of these poore men dyed with their fallis; Aristomenes (howsoeuer it came to passe) took no harme. Yet was it harme enough to be imprisoned in a deepe Dungeon, among 20 dead carcases, where hee was like to perish through hunger and flench. But after a while hee perceived by some faint glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the toppe) a Foxe that was gnawing vpon a dead bodie. Hereupon hee bethought himselfe, that this beast must needs know some way, to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold vpon it, and catching it by the taile with one hand, saued him selfe from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his coate into the mouth of it. So letting it creepe whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, vntill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Foxe being loose, ranne through an hole, at which came in a little light; and there did Aristomenes delue so long with his nailes, that at last he clawed out his passage. 30 When some fugitives of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Aristomenes was returned home, their tale founde alike, as if they had said, that a dead man was returned. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to helpe the Lacedemonians in the siege of Era, were cut in peeces, their Captaines slaine, and their Campe taken; then was it easily beleued, that Aristomenes was aliue indeede.

Thus eleuen yeares passed whilst the enemies hounding about Era, saw no likelihood of getting it; and Aristomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slave, that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdnesse the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happened in a raie-winter-night, that the husband came home vnlookt for, whilst the Adulter was within. The Woman hidde her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asking him, by what good fortune he was returned so soone. He told her, that the storme of foule weather was such, as had made all his fellowes leaue their Stations, and that himselfe had done as the rest did; as for Aristomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not looke abroad; neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would stirre, in such a darke-rainie-night, as this was. The slave that heard these tidings, rose vp secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedemonian Campe with the newes. There hee found Emperanus his Master, commanding in the Kings absence. To him he vttered all; and obtaining pardon 50 for his running away, guided the Armie into the Towne. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Alarme was presently taken; and the extreme darkenesse, together with the noise of winde and raine, hindred all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruell fight; one part being incited, by neare hope of ending along worke; the other irraged by meere desperation. The great advantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompensed partly by the assistance, which women and children (to whom the hatred of seruitude had taught contempt of death) gaue to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrownesse of the streets and other passages, which admitted not manie hands to fight at once. But the Messenians were in continuall toile; their enemies fought in close retching themselves with meat and sleepe, and then returning supplied the places of their wearie fellowes, with fresh Companies. Aristomenes therefore, perceiving that his men, for want of reliefe were no longer able to hold out, (as hauing bene three 10 dayes, and three nights, vexed with all miseries, of labour, watching, fighting, hunger, and thirst, besides continuall raine and cold) gathered together all the weaker fort, whom he compassed round with armed men, and so attempted to breake out through the midle of the enemies. Emperanus General of the Lacedemonians was glad of this: and to further their departure, caus'd his Souldiers to giue an open way, leaving a faire passage to these desperate madmen. So they issued forth, and arrived safe in Arctida, where they were most lovingly entertained.

Vpon the first bruit of the taking of Era, the Aradians had prepared themselves to the rescue: but Aristocrates their false hearted King, said it was too late, for that all was already lost. When Aristomenes had placed his followers in faticke, hee chose 20 out five hundred the lustiest of his men, with whom he resolved to march in all secret hast vnto Sparta, hoping to find the Towne secure, and ill manured, the people being runne forth to the spoile of Messene. In this enterprise, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedemonians would be glad to recover their owne, by restitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred Aradians that offered to ioyne with him; but Aristocrates marred all, by sending speedie advertisement hercof, to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epistle which Anaxander sent backe to Aristocrates, was intercepted, by some that mistrusted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falsehood, which being published in open 30 assembly, the Aradians stoned him to death, and casting forth his bodie vnburied, erected a monument of his treachery, with anote. That the Periuier cannot deceiue God.

Of Aristomenes no more is remaining to be said, than that committing his people to the charge of his sonne Gorgus and other sufficient Gouernours, who should plant them in some new seat abroad, he resolved himselfe to make abode in those parts, hoping to find the Lacedemonians worke at home. His daughters hee bestowed honourably in marriage. One of them Demagetus who reigned in the Isle of Rhodes tooke to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marrie the daughter of the best man in Greece. Finally Aristomenes went with his daughter to Rhodes, whence he purposed to haue traualled vnto Arctus the Son of Gigas King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media: but death preuented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Messenians were inuited by Anaxilas (whose great Grandfather was a Messinian and went into Italie after the former war) being Lord of the Sicilians in Italie, to take his part against the Zandacians in Sicilie, on the other side of the straits. They did so; and winning the Towne of Zancle, called it Messene, which name it keeps to this day.

This second Messenian warre ended in the first year of the twentie eight Olympiade. Long after which time, the rest of that Nation, who staying at home serued 50 the Lacedemonians found means to rebell; but were soone vanquished, and being driuen to forsake Peloponnesus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewise, after fewages they were expelled by the Lacedemonians, and then followed their ancient Countreimen into Italie and Sicilie, some of them went into Africa, where they chose vnto themselves a seat.

It is very strange, that during two hundred and fourecore yeares, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customes, language, hatred of Sparta, and loue of their forsaken Countrey, with a desire to returne vnto it. In the third yeare of the hundreth and second Olympiad, that great Epaminondas, hauing tamed the pride of the Lacedemonians, reuoked the Messenian home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesus. There did Epaminondas restore vnto them their old possession, and helpe them in building a faire Citie, which, by the name of the Prouince, was called Messene, and was helde by them euer after, in despite of the Lacedemonians, of whom they neuer from thence forth stood in feare.

§. V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while MANASSES Reigned. Whether DEIOCES the Mede were that AR-THAXAS which is mentioned in the Booke of IUDITH. Of the historie of IUDITH.

ARDOYS King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Causanias, as reigning shortly after the Messenian warre. Ardis succeeding vnto his father Gyges, beganne his raigne of nine and fortie yeares, in the second of the five and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his father, who enchroaching vpon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardis wanne Priene, and assailed Miletus, but went away without it. In his raigne, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their owne Countrey by the Scythians, ouer-ranne a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grand-child, by whom they were driuen out. They had not onely broken into Lydia, but wanne the Citie of Sardes; though the Citie or Citadell thereof was defended against them, and held still for King Ardis, whose long raigne was vnable, by reason of this great storme, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King vntill the third yeare of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was fixe yeares after the Messenian warre ended; the same being the last yeare of Manasses his raigne ouer Iuda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fiftie of these fixe and fiftie yeares in which Manasses reigned. This Deioces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict forme, commanding more absolutely than his predecessors had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had giuen to the people too much licence, as caused euery one to desire the whole some feueritie, of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; heooke vnto him a Guard, for defence of his person; he seldom gaue presence, which also when he did, it was with such austeritie, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies, he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly vpheld the Maiestie, which his Predecessours had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his Royall Office, hee did vprightly and seuerely administer iustice, keeping secret spies to informe him of all that was done in the Kingdome. Hee cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by enchroaching vpon others; but studied how to gouerne well his owne. The difference found betweene this King, and such as were before him, seemes to haue bred that opinion which Herodotus deliueris, that Deioces was the first who reigned in Media.

This

This was he that built the great Citie of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the storie of Iudith, as also Ben Alerodach, by the same accompt, should bee Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slaine, and Holophernes sent to worke wonders, vpon Phidand Lud, and I know not what other Countreies. For I reckon the last yeare of Deioces to haue bene the nineteenth of Ben Alerodach; though others place it otherwise, some earlier, in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the raigne of Nabulphasar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In fitting this Booke of Iudith to a certaine time, there hath much labour bene spent with ill successe. The raignes of Cambyses Darius Hystaspis, Xerxes and Ochus, haue bene sought into; but afforded no great matter of likelihood: and now of late, the times, forgoing the destruction of Ierusalem, haue bene thought vpon, and this age that we haue in hand, chosen by Bellarmino, as agreeing best with the storie; though others herein cannot (I speake of such as faue would) agree with him. Whilst Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not rebuilt, which in the storie of Iudith is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes, are acknowledged to haue bene verie fauourable to the Iewes; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conueniences, aptly fitting this Historie, and about all the opinion of a few Ancient writers (without whose iudgement the authoritie of this Booke were of no value) hauing placed this argument in the Persian Monarchie, inclines the matter to the raigne of this vain-glorious King. As for Ochus, verie few, and they faintly, entitle him to the businesse. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this Historie, there must be, a returne from captiuitie lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt: Iacim High Priest, and a long peace, of threecore and tenne yeares or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Iewes. Likewise on the other side we must finde a King that reigned in Media, eightene yeares at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Iewes refused to assist; one that sought to bee generally adored as God; and that therefore commanded all temples, of such as were accounted gods to be destroyed; one whose victorie or Captaine Generall knew not the Iewish Nation, but was faine to learne what they were of the bordering people.

Of all these circumstances; the Priesthood of Isaiah, with a returne from Captiuitie, are found concurring, with either the time of Citanafts before the destruction of Ierusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the rebuilding of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the raigne of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the Captiuitie of the Iewes and desolation of the Citie. Wherefore the briefe decision of this controuersie is, that the Booke of Iudith is not Canonical. Yet hath Torricellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that vnder Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and redified the Citie of Ecbatane, that had formerly bene built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted; hee adds that from the twelfth yeare to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is fixe or fixe yeares, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes in his Grecian expedition (which he supposeth to haue bene so long) might giue occasion vnto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonosor hauing vanquished and slaine Arphaxad, might then seek to make himselfe Lord of all, by the Armie which he sent forth vnder Holophernes. So should the Iewes haue done their dutie in adhering to Xerxes their Soueraigne Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances, rehearsed before be well applied to the argument. For in these times, the affaires of Iurie were agreeable to the Historie of Iudith; and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough bee ignorant of the Iewes, and as proud as we shall need to thinke him. But the Office of all Historie, takes away believe, from this coniecture: and the supposition it selfe is verie hard, that a rebell, whose King was abroad, with an Arme consisting of fuentene hundred thousand men, should presume so farre, vpon the strength of twelue hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand Archers on horsebacke, as to thinke that he might doe what he list, yea that there was none other God than himselfe. It is indeede easie to find enough that might be said against this deule of Tornelius: yet if there were any necesseitie, of holding the Booke of indul, to bee Canonically, I would rather chuse to lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some deince vpon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it selfe. That indul liued vnder none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmine (whose workes I haue not read, but find him cited by Tornelius) hath proued by many arguments. That the liued not in the Raigne of Manasses, Tornelius hath proued verie substantially, shewing how the Cardinall is driuen, as it were to breake through a wall, in saying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Asphas and Nabach, Joseph, found out by Tornelius, are the children of mere fantasie, it is so plaine, that it needs no prooue at all. Wherefore we may truly say, that they which haue contended about the time of this Historie, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a storme field) I haue chased Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni solisque vltis, in an age that neuer was, and in places that were neuer knowne.

Indul 62. v. 73.
p. 15.

Surely to find out the borders of APHETH, which were towards the South, and ouer against Arabis; or the Countries of Phud and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I thinke it would as much trouble Cosmographers, as the former question hath done Chronologers. But I will not butte my selfe herewith; hauing already so farre digressed, in shewing who liued not with Manasses, that I thinke it high time, to returne vnto mine owne worke, and rehearse what others I finde, to haue had their part, in the long time of his Raigne.

§. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in these times.

THE first yeare of Manasses was the last of Romulus; after whose death, one yeare the Romans wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabine chosen; a peaceable man and seeming verie religious in his kind. Hee brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed onely in warres, to some good ciuillitie, and a more orderly fashion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiaritie with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies, which he delucred vnto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these deuices of Numa were, in his owne iudgement, no better than meer delusions, that serued onely as rudiments, to bring the Saage multitude of thees and out-lawes, gathered into one bodie by Romulus, to some forme of milder discipline, than their boytiferous and wilde natures was otherwise apt to entertaine. This appeared by the Bookes that were found in his graue, almost fixe hundred yeares after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himselfe was condemned as vaine. His graue was opened by chance, in digging a peece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffines or Chests of stone were in it, with an inscription in Greeke and Latine letters, which said that Numa Pompilius the sonne of Pompo, King of the Romans lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his bodie being vtterly consumed. In the other were his Bookes, wrapped

vp in two buncks of wax; of his owne constitutions seuen, and other seuen of Philosophy. They were not onely vncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the Citie desiring to haue a sight of these Bookes, when hee perceived whereunto they tended, refused to deliuer them backe to the owner, and offered to take a solemne oath that they were against the Religion then in vfe. Hereupon the Senate, without more ado, commaunded them to bee openly burnt. It seemes that Numa did meane to acquite himselfe, vnto wiser ages which he thought would follow, as one that had not bene so foolish as to beleue the Doctrine wherein he instructed his owne barbarous times. But the poyson wherewith hee had infected Rome, when hee fat in his Throne, had not left working, when hee committed the Antidote out of his graue. Had these Bookes not come to light, until the dayes of Tully and Cesar, when the mist of ignorance was somewhat better dissolued; likely it is that they had not onely escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peradventure generally) effect. Being as it was, they serued as a confusion, without remedie, of Idolatrie that was inueterate.

Numa Raigned three and fortie yeares in continuall peace. After him Tullus Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the six and fortieth of Manasses, and Raigned two and thirtie yeares, builed, for the most part in warre. Hee quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cause to feare, that might grow vnto them from the *Trojan*es, caused them to be thinke themselves of a course, whereby without effusion of so much blood, as might make them too weake for a common enemie, it might bee decided, who should command, and who obey.

There were in each Campe three Brethren, T winnes borne at one birth (Diogenes sayes that they were Cosen Germans) of equall yeares and strength, who were appointed to fight for their severall Countries. The end was that the Horatii, Champions for the Romans got the victorie, though two of them first lost their liues. The three Curatii that fought for Alba (as Liue tels it) were all aliue, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slaine; but the third Horatius, pretending feare, did runne away and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts could not follow him with equall speede, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning vpon them, he slew them, as it had bene in single fight, man after man, ere they could joyne together and set vpon him all at once. Diogenes reports it somewhat otherwise, telling verie particularly, what woundes were giuen and taken, and saying, that first one of the Horatii was slaine, then one of the Curatii, then a second Horatius, and lastly the two Curatii, whom the third Horatius did comming seuer one from the other as hee was before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the olde Roman Historie, both in regard of the action it selfe, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in wager, against Alba, and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the Citie of Alba did immediatly become subiect vnto her owne Colonie, and was shortly after, vpon some treacherous dealing of their Gouvernour, vtterly razed, the people being remooued vnto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother Citie, had bene chiefe, became ere long dependent vpon Rome, though not subiect vnto it, and diuerse petty States adjacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were small, yet many, I will forbear to rehearse (as being the works of sundrie ages, and few of them remarkable considered apart by themselves) vntill such time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancie, shall grow to bee the maine subject of this Historie.

The seuenth yeare of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the fift of Manassa. Also the three last Gouvernours for tenne yeares, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I find onely the names, Leocrates, Aspander, and Ereias. After Ereias yearly Rulers were elected.

These

These Comarours for tenne yeares, were also of the race of Medon and Cocytus, but their time of rule was thorned, and from tearme of life reduced vnto tenne yeares; it being thought likely, that they would gouerne the better, when they knew, that they were afterwards to liue priuate men vnder the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times vnto those yeares of the Olympiad, wherein the Chronological table, following this worke, doth set them. For he not onely professe himselfe to haue taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted alwayes the yeares of the Greeks, how they did answer vnto the thinges of Rome, throughout all the continuance of his Historie. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first yeare of the seventh Olympiad, and affirms, that the same was the first yeare of Charops his government in Athenis; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who setteth the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

In the Raigne of Manasses it was, that Midas, whome the Poets fained to haue had Alkes cares, held the Kingdome of Phrygia. Manie fables were deuised of him; especially that hee obtained of Nechus, as a great gift, that all thinges which hee should touch, might immediatly be changed into Gold: by which meanes hee had like to haue benee flured (his ment and drinke being subject to the same transformation) had not Nechus deliuered him from his miserable facultie, by causing him to wath himselfe in the Riuier Pactolus, the streame whereof hath euer since forfoth, abounded in that precious Metall. Finally it is said hee died by drinking Bulls blood; being invaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antinachus, who (saith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) obfcurd the Moones Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milefians, or (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians, hauing obtayned some power by Sea, founded Naxos a Citie on the coast of Aegypt. Ptolemy here in seemes to haue assisted them, who vsed all meanes of drawing the Greekes into Aegypt, accounting them his surft strength. For neither Miletes, nor Athenes, were now of power sufficient to plant a Colonie in Aegypt by force.

Plut. & Euseb.

About this time Archias with his companion Asiellus, and other Corinthians, founded Syracuse in Sicilie a Citie in after-times exceeding famous.

The Citie of Nicomedia sometime * Aliseus, was enlarged and beautified in this age, by Zipareus natie of Thrace. Sylla of Samus according to Pausanias liud about this time.

About these times also was Crotan founded vpon the Bay of Tarentum by Micellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracuse; Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient, and so doth Pausanias.

About the same time, the Parthenians, being of age and banished Lacedemon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italie, where it is said they founded Tarentum; but Isidore and Pausanias find it built before, and by them conquered and amplified. Also about the same time, Manasse yet liuing, the Citie Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, interwinne in the Region of the Embrici, now called Verban in Italie. About which time also Choleaden in Asia, ouer against Bysantium, (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megareneses: who therefore were vpbraided as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long worke to rehearse all that is said to haue benee done in the five and fiftie yeares of Manasses; that which hath alreadie benee told is enough: the rest, being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, referring onely to Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the businesse that will shortly require more mention of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the times from the death of MANASSES to the destruction of Ierusalem.

§. I.

OF AMMON and IOIAS.

AMMON the sonne of Manasse, a man no lesse wicked then was his Father before his conuerſion, reſtored the exerciſe of all ſorts of Idolatry: for which God hardened the heartes of his owne ſeruants againſt him: who ſlew him after he had Raigned two yeares: Philo, Eusebius and Nicephorus giue him tenne yeares, following the Septuagint.

2. King. 23.
2. Chron. 33.

Ioſias ſucceeded vnto Ammon, being but a child of eight yeares old. Hee beganne to ſeek for the God of Dauid his Father; and in his twelfth yeare he purged Juda and Ierusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved and molten Images: and they brake downe in his fight the Altars of Baalim. He cauſed all the Images, as well thoſe which were grauen, as molten, to be ſtampt to powder, and ſtrewed on their graues that had erected them: and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. Hee alſo ſlew thoſe that ſacrificed to the Sunne and Moone, and cauſed the Chariots and Horſes of the Sunne to be burnt. Of Ioſias it was propheſied, in the time of Iereboam the firſt, when he erected the Golden Calfe at Beſhel, that a child ſhould be borne vnto the houſe of Dauid, Ioſias by name, and vpon thee (ſaid the Prophet ſpeaking to the Altar) ſhall bee ſacrificed the Priests of the high places, that burne incenſe vpon thee. a prophetic verie remarkable.

2. King. 23.

In the eighteenth yeare of his Raigne, hee rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which time Heliah the Prieſt found the Booke of Moſes, called Deuteronomie, Or, of the Lawe, which hee lent to the King: which when hee had cauſed to bee read before him, and conſidered of the ſeuere commandements therein written, the proſperitie promiſed to thoſe that obſerue them, and the ſorrow and extirpation to the reſt, he rent his garments, and commanded Heliah, and others, to aſke counſell of the Prophetſſe Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Booke, who answered the meſſengers in theſe words. Thus ſaith the Lord, behold I will bring ruine vpon this place, and vpon the inhabitants thereof, euen all the curſes that are written in the Booke, which they haue read before the King of Juda, becauſe they haue forſaken mee, and burnt incenſe to other Gods. Onely for the King himſelfe, becauſe he was a louer of God and of his Lawes, it was promiſed that this cuill ſhould not fall on Juda and Ierusalem in his dayes, but that hee himſelfe ſhould inherit his graue in peace.

2. Chron. 34. 24.

2. King. 22. 15.
2. Chron. 34.

Ioſias attended the Elders, cauſed the Booke to bee read vnto them, made a couenant with the Lord, and cauſed all that were found in Ierusalem and Beniamin to doe the like, promiſing thereby to obſerue the Lawes and commandements in the Booke contained.

The execution done by Ioſias vpon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the falſe Prophets, at Beſhel, argueth his Dominion to haue extended vnto thoſe Countries, Countries, that had bene part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. Yet I doe not thinke, that any victorie of Iosias in warre got possession of these places; but rather that Ezekias, after the flight and death of Sennacherib, when Achaz had opposed himselfe against Assurbaniden, did vske the aduantage which the faction in the North presented vnto him, and laid hold vpon so much of the Kingdome of Israel, as hee was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himselfe vnable to deale with his libertie as much in Israel, as his life could not easily defend. This was a good way to breake the amitie that the Kings of Juda had so long held with those of Egypt, by calling a bone betwene them; and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territorie with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeeme the friendship of the Jewes, which had bene lost by injuries done, in seeking to bereaue them of their owne. When it is said, that Manasses did after his deliuerance from imprisonment, put Captaines of warre in all the strong Cities of Juda; it may be that some such bulinesse is intimated, as the taking possession, and fortifying of places deliuered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he tooke much paines, in making Ierusalem it selfe more defensible, yet I should rather beleue, that he, hauing already compounded with the Babylonians, did fortifie himselfe against the Egyptians, whose side hee had forsaken, than that hee traueiled in making such prouisions, only for his minds sake. The earnestnesse of Iosias in the King of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, that the composition which Manasses had made, with that King or his Ancestor, was vpon such friendly termes, as required not only a faithfull obseruation, but a thankfull requitall. For no persuasions could suffice to make Iosias sit still, and hold himselfe quiet in good neutralitie, when Pharao Neco King of Egypt passed along by him, to warre vpon the Countries about the River of Euphrates.

The last yeare of Iosias his Raigne it was, when as Neco the sonne of Psammetichus, came with a powerfull Armie towards the border of Judea, determining to passe that way being the nearest toward Euphrates, either to strengthen the passages of that River, about Cavensis or Cereusum, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Diodotus is said by Ammianus Marcellinus to haue done) or perhaps to invade Syria it selfe. For it seemeth that the traualle of Psammetichus had not bene idly consumed about that one Towne of Asotus, but had put the Egyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged vnto the Assirians Kings of Danisco.

Neither was the indolence of Neco lesse than his Fathers had bene, in pursuing the warre against Babel. In which warre, two things may greatly haue auailed the Egyptians, and aduanced their affaires and hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenarie Greekes, that were farre better Souldiers than Egypt could of it selfe afford; and the danger wherein Assyria stood, by the force of the Medes, who vnder the command of more absolute Princes, began to feele it selfe better; and shew what it could doe. These were great helpes, but of shorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more conuenient shall be noted. At the present it seeme, that either some preparation of the Chaldeans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disability of theirs to make resistance, did inuite the King of Egypt, into the Countries bordering vpon Euphrates; whither Pharao Neco ascended with a mightie Armie.

These two great Monarchs, hauing their swords drawne, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Iosias aduised with himselfe to which of these he might adhere, hauing his Territorie set in the mid way betwene both, so as the one could not invade the other, but that they must of necessitie tread vpon the verie face and bodie of his Countrey; Now though it were so that Neco himselfe desired by his Embassadors, leaue to passe along by Juda, protesting that hee directed himselfe against the Assyrians onely, without all harmefull purpose against Juda, yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Iosias the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabassus or Sais King of Egypt, was vtterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Assyrian, so rooted vp and tate in peeces, as it could neuer after bee gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell vpon Juda in the thirteenth and fourteenth yeares of Ezekias, witness that good King and his people relied vpon Sethon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient prooffe, to shew the illaffiance, that was in the helpe of the Egyptians, who (neare neighbours though they were) were alwayes vnrerie; when the necessitie of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not lecke, to haue the Jewes renew there ancient league with him; but enie craved that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the paltme betwene him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Arme, as did, soone after this, out-face Nabulassar, vpon his owne borders, left vnto the Jewes, a lawfull excuse of feare, had they forborne to giue it any checke vpon the way. Wherefore I beleue, that this religious and vertuous Prince Iosias, was not stirred vp onely by politick respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himselfe bound in faith and honour, to doe his best in defence of the Babylonian Crowne; whereunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by covenant made at the enlargement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as hee held in the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Juda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both vnto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Egyptians, what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemie.

Some thinke, that this action of Iosias, was contrarie to the aduice of Ieremie the Prophet; which I doe not finde in the Prophecie of Ieremie, nor can finde reason to beleue. Others hold opinion, that he forgot to aske the counsell of God: and this is verie likely; seeing hee might beleue that an enterprise grounded vpon fidelitie and thankfulness due to the King of Babel, could not bee displeasing vnto the Lord. But the wickednesse of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such roote, as all the care of Iosias in reforming the Land, could not plucke vp) was questionlesse farre from hearkning how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined, that their good King, whose life stood betwene them and their punishment, should now bee taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should giue entrance to the miseries ensuing. So Iosias leauing all the strength hee could make, neare vnto Abgida, in the halfe Tribe of Manasses, encountered Neco; and there hee receiued the stroke of death, which lingring about him till hee came to Ierusalem, brought him to the Sepulchers of his Ancestors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Juda, especially of Ieremie the Prophet: who inserted a sorrowfull remembrance thereof into his booke of Lamentations.

§. II.

Of PHARAO NECO, that fought with JOSIAS: Of IEHOAKIM
and IEHOIAKIM Kings of Iuda

These warres, and particularly of this victorie, Herodotus hath mentioned, among the acts of Neco. He tells vs of this King, that he went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe, out of Nilus into the Red Sea. It should haue reached aboute hundred miles in length, and bene wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middle of the worke, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should haue the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when halfe was done. There were consumed in this toilsome businesse twelue hundred thousand Egyptians; a losse great enough to make the King forsake his enterprize, without troubling the Oracle for admonition: How fower it were he was not a man to be idle; therefore hee built a Fleet, and leaued a great Armie, wherewith hee marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition he view the seruice, as well of his Nauie, as of his land forces; but no particular exploits of his therein, are found recorded, save onely this victorie against Josias, where Herodotus calls the place Magedon, and the Iewes Syrrians; which is a small error, seeing that Iudaea was a Prouince of Syria, and Magedon or Magdala is taken to haue bene the same place (though diuersly named) in which this battaile of fought. After this, Neco tooke the Citie of Cadytis, which was perhaps Carbennish, by Ephrates, and made himselfe Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Iosephus witnesseth.

Particularly we finde, that the Phenicians, one of the most powerful Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they surrounded all Africa, setting saile from the gulfes of Arabia, and so passing along all the Coast, whercon they both landed, as need required, and sowed corne for their sustenance, in that great voyage which lasted three yeares. This was the first navigation about Africa, whercon that great Cape now called Of good hope was discovered; which after was forgotten, vntill Vasco de Gama the Portugall found it out, following a contrarie course to that which the Phenicians held; for they, beginning in the East, raune the way of the Sunne, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars and freights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the straights of Gibraltar, hauing Africa still on the right hand: but the Portingals, beginning their voyage not farre from the same straights, leaued Africa on the Larboard, and bend their course vnto the East. That report of the Phenicians, which Herodotus durst not beleue, how the Sunne in this iourne was on their right hand, that is, on the Northside of them, is a matter of necessarie truth; and the obseruation then made herof, makes mee the better to beleue, that such a Voyage was indeed performed.

Jer. l. 23. v. 33.

But leauing these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let vs tell what he did, in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Iuda, while the Egyptians were bulleat Carchemish, had made Iehozabaz their King, in the roome of his father Josias. The Prophet Ieremie calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the short Raigne of Shallum King of the tenne Tribes: for Shallum of Israel Raigned but one moneth, Iehozabaz no more than three. Hee was not the eldest sonne of Josias; Wherefore it may seme that he was set vp as the best affected vnto the King of Babel, the rest of his house being more inclined to the Egyptians, as appears by the sequell. An Idolater he was, and thriued accordingly. For when as Neco had dispatched his businesse in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affaires of Iudaea. This Countrey was now so farre from making any resist, that the King himselfe came to Riblah in the Land of Hamath, where where the matter went so ill on his side, that Neco did call him into bonds and carrie him prisoner into Egypt, giuing away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. This Citie of Riblah, in after times called Amocina, was a place vnhappie to the Kings and Princes of Iuda, as may be obserued in diuers examples. Yet here Iehoiakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdome, an ill gaine, since he could no better vse it. But how euer Iehoiakim thriued by the bargaine, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdome Tributarie, without any stroke stricken, which three moneths before was too floute to giue him peace, when he desired it. Certaine it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater task lying vpon his handes, than would permit him to waite his forces vpon Iudaea: but now the reputation of his good successe at Magedon, and Carchemish, together with the dissention of the Princes Josias his sonnes (of whom the eldest is probably thought to haue stormed at the preferment of his yonger brother) gaue him power to doe, euen what should please himselfe. Yet hee did forbear to make a conquest of the Land; perhaps vpon the same reason, which had made him so earnest, in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Iewes had suffered much, in the Egyptians quarrell, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, vnto all extremities, were driuen to forsake that partie, and joyne with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselves faithfull, who could blame them? It was therefore occasion to reclaime them; seeing they were such a people, as would not vpon euerie occasion shift side, but endure more, than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay vpon them: so good a Patron did hee meane to be vnto them. Nevertheless hee laid vpon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of silver, and one Talent of gold; that so he might both reape at the present, some fruit of his paines taken, and leaue vnto them some document in the future, of greater punishment then verball anger, due to them, if they should rebell. So hee departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the vnfortunate King Iehozabaz, who died in his Captiuitie.

The Raigne of Iehozabaz was included in the end of his Fathers last yeare; so therwise it would hardly be found, that Iehoiakim, his successeur, did Raigne tenne whole yeares; whereas the Scriptures giue him eleuen, that is current and incomplete. If any man will rather call the three moneths of this short Raigne, into the first yeare of the brother, than into the fathers last; the same arguments that shall maintaine his opinion, will also proue the matter to be vnworthie of disputation; and so I leaue it.

Iehoiakim in impietie was like his brother, in faction hee was altogether Egyptian, as hauing receiued his Crowne at the hand of Pharao. The wickednesse of these last Kings, being exprest in Scriptures none other wise, than by generall wordes, with reference to all the euill that their Fathers had done; makes it apparent, that the poyson wherewith Ahaz and Manasses had infected the Land, was not so expelled by the zealous goodnesse of Josias, but that it still cleaued vnto the chiefe of the people, yea vnto the chiefe of the Priests also; and therefore it was not strange, that the Kings had their part therein. The Royall authoritie was much abated by the dangers whercon the Countrey stood, in this troublesome age: the Princes did in a manner what they listed; neither would the Kings forbear to professe, that they could denie them nothing. Yet the beginning of Iehoiakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him insolent and cruell; as we find by that example of his dealing with Vria the Prophet: though herein also the Princes doe appear to haue bene infligators. This Holy man denounced Gods judgements against the Citie, and Temple, in like sort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poore man fled into Egypt: but such regard was had vnto Iehoiakim, that Vria was deliuered vnto his Embassadour, and sent backe to the death; contrarie to the custome vsed, both in those those dayes and since among all Ciuill Nations of giuing refuge vnto strangers, that are not held guiltie of such inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankind should be exempted from all priuiledge.

It concerned Pharao to giue all contentment possible to Iehoiakim for the Assyrian Lion, that had not liued in manie yeares, beganne about these times, to roare so loud vpon the banes of Euphrates, that his voice was heard vnto Nilus, threatening to make himselfe Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had withdrawn the house of Nerodach, from opposing the Egyptians in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place, before we proceed to commit them together at Charchemish, where shortly after this, the glorie of Egypt is to fall.

§. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to passe that the Kings of Babel could not giue attendance on their businesse in Syria; which caused them to loose that Province.

MERODACH the sonne of Saladan, who taking the aduantage that Senacherib misadventure and death, together with the disention betweene his children presented, made himselfe King of Babylon, was eleven yeares troubled with a powerfull Enemie Asarhaddon the sonne of Senacherib, Raigning ouer the Assyrians in Ninurie, from whom whilest he could not any other way diuert his cares, he was faine to omit bulinesse in Syria, and (as hath bene formerly shewed) to make ouer vnto Ezekia, some part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Asarhaddon did not onely set him free, but gaue vnto him some part of Assyria if not (as is commonly but lesse probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How greatly this was to the liking of the Assyrians I wil not here stand to enquire: his long Raigne following, and his little entremedling in matters of Syria make it plaine, that he had worke enough at home, either in defending or in establishing that which he had gotten. Iosephus giues him the honour of hauing wonne Ninurie it selfe; which we may beleue; but surely he did not hold it long. For in the times soone following, that great Citie was free, and vanquished Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yielded vpon some capitulation: and refused afterwards to continue subject, when the Kings being of the Chaldean race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some thinke that this was the Assyrian King whose Captaines tooke Manasses prisoner; but I rather beleue those that hold the contrarie; for which I haue giuen my reasons in due place. To say truth, I find little cause why Merodach should haue looked into those parts, as long as the Tenues were his friends, and the Egyptians, that maligne the Northern Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was vntill the time of Pasmiticus, about the end of this Kings Raigne, or the beginning of his sonne.

Ben Nerodach the sonne and successeur of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is hee named by good consent of Authours, and that speake little of his doing. The length of his Raigne is gathered by inference to haue bene one and twentie yeares, for somuch remaineth of the time that passed betweene the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephewes Raignes (which is a knowne summe) deducting the yeares of his Father, and of his sonne Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasses Prisoner and released him. Hee sped ill in Syria; where Pasmiticus, by the vertue of his Mercinarie Greekes, did much preuaile. This may haue bene some cause that he released Manasses, and did put into his handes some part more of the Kingdome of Samarita: which is made probable by circumstances alleged before.

Nabulassar that Raigned in Babylon after his Father Ben Nerodach, had greater busines in his own Kingdome, than would permit him to looke abroad: in somuch as it may bee thought to haue bene a great negligence or ouer-sight of Pasmiticus and Neco, that they did not occupie some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes invaded Assyria, and besieged Ninurie; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remoue by the coming of Scythians, who in these ages did ouer-flow those parts of the World, laying hold vpon all, that they could matter by strong hand. Of these Scythians, and the Lordship that they held in Asia, it is conuenient that I speake in this place, shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, vpon whom they first fell, were builed in the same times with hopes of conquering Assyria.

Phraortes, the sonne of Deioees, King of the Medes, hauing by manie victories enlarged his Dominions, conceiued at length a faire possibilltie of making himselfe Lord of Ninurie.

That Citie (as Herodotus reports it) hauing bene a Soueraigne Ladie was not Head-liege forsoaken of all her dependants; yet remained in such case, that of her selfe shee was well enough.

This makes it plaine, that howsoeuer Merodach had gotten possession of this imperiall seat, and made it subject as was the rest of the Countrey, yet it found the meanes to set it selfe at libertie: as after this againe it did, when it had bene regained by Nabulassar his Grand-child.

Sharpe warre, and the verie noueltie of suddaine violence, vnto to dismay anie State or Countrey, not inured to the like: but custome of danger hardeneth euen those that are vnwarlike. Ninurie had bene the Palace of manie valiant Kings lately Raigning therein; it had suffered, and resisted, all the furie, wherewith either Domestical tumults betweene the sonnes of Senacherib, or forraigne warre of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the lesse wonderfull, that Phraortes did speed so ill in his iourne against it. He and the moit of his Armie perished in that expedition: wherof I find no particular circumstances (perhaps hee vnderuallued their forces, and brought a lesse power than was needfull) It is enough, that we may herein beleue Herodotus.

Cyaxares the sonne of Phraortes, a brauer man of warre then his Father, wanne as much of Asia the lesse, as lay Eastward, from the River of Halys; hee sought reuenge vpon the Assyrians for the death of his Father, and besieged Ninurie it selfe, hauing a purpose to destroy it. I rather beleue Eusebius, that hee tooke the Citie and iustified his displeasure vpon it, than Herodotus, that the Scythians came vpon him whilest he lay before it. For where euell authorities are contradictorie (as Eusebius, though farre later than Herodotus, yet hauing scene other Authours, that are now lost, is to be valued according to his great reading) there doe I hold it best, to yeeld vnto the best likelihoods.

To thinke that the Scythians came vpon Cyaxares, whilest hee lay before Ninurie, were to accuse him of greater improuidence, than ought to bee suspected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to suppose that hee was faine to leaue the Towne, when a warre so dangerous fell vpon his owne Countrey, doth well agree both with the condition of such businesse as that Scythian expedition brought into those partes, and with the State of the Chaldean and Assyrian affaires ensuing.

The destruction of this great Citie is both foretold in the Booke of Tobit, and there set downe as happening about these times; of which Booke who soeuer was the Authour, hee was ancient enough to know the Storie of those ages, and hath committed no such error in reckoning of times, as should cause vs to distrust him in this. As for the Prophecie of Nabum, though it be not limited vnto any certaine tearme, yet it appears to haue taken effect, in the final destruction of Ninive by Nabuchodonosor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a Conquest of Aegypt, foregoing this calamitie, whereof we will speake in due place. Some that ascribe more authoritie than the reformed Churches yeeld, to the Booke of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of necessitie, to affirme, that about these times Ninive was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the victorie thereto, to Ben Merodach a needlesse conjecture, if the place of Eusebius be well considered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulassar the sonne of Ben Merodach did seize vpon it, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about such time as the Countrey of Assyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian waire ouerwhelmed Media. For then was the Conquest wrought out ready to his hand; the swelling spirits of the Minutes were allayed, and their malice to Babylon so allwaged, that it might be thought a great fauour, if Nabulassar, appointing vnto them a peculiar King, tooke him and them into protection: though afterwards, to their confusion, this vnthankfull people and their King, rebelled againe, as shalbe shewed in the Raigne of Nabuchodonosor.

§. IIII.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Asia eight and twentie yeares.

†. I.

The time of this expedition.

NOW that I haue shewed what impediment was giuen by the Assyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much disabled to performe any action of worth vpon the Aegyptians in Syria; it is time that I speake of that great Scythian expedition, which grievously afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countreys adjacent, in such wise that part of the trouble redounded euen to the Aegyptians themselves. Of the Scythian people in general, Herodotus makes verie large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill knowne, with many Fables, of this expedition he tels many particulars, but ill agreeing with consent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needlesse to recite them, for they are farr enough distant from the businesse in hand. The computation of times, which by inference out of his relations, may seeme very strange, needeth some answer in this place: least otherwise I should either seeme to make my selfe too bold with an Author, in citing him after a manner different from his owne tale; or else to bee too forgetfull of my selfe, in bringing to act vpon the Stage, those persons, which I had already buried. Eight and twentie yeares he saith that the Scythians Raigned in Asia, before Cyaxares deliuered the Countrey from them. Yet hee reports a warre betwene Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the siege of Ninive; the siege of Ninive being ere the Scythians came. And further he tels, how the Scythians, hauing vanquished the Medes, did passe into Syria, and were encountered in Palastina by Psammetichus King of Aegypt, who by gifts and entreatie procured them to depart from him. These narrations of Herodotus may, euery one of them, bee true though not in such order of time as he hath marshalled them. For Psammetichus was dead before Cyaxares beganne to Raigne: and Cyaxares had spent halfe of his fortie yeares, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia; so that he could not, after those Ly- dian warres, Raigne eight and twentie yeares together with the Scythians. It is true, that Eusebius doth also call Psammetichus the sonne of Pharao Neco, by the name of Psammetichus; and this King Psammetichus may, by some strained conjecture, bee thought to haue bene he that met with the Scythians: for he liued with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Eusebius himselfe referres all that businesse of the Scythian irruption into Palastina, to Psammetichus the Father of Neco, whom hee leaues dead before the Raigne of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not relie vpon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise then to belecue him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them downe.

10 It remanes, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I find of this expedition scattered in diuers places: a worke needefull, for that the greatnesse of this action was such, as ought not to bee omitted in a generall Historie; yet not easie, the consent of those that haue written thereof, being nothing neare to vniformitie.

I haue noted before, that in the Raigne of Ardis King of Lydia, the Cimmerians ouer-ran the Kingdom, and were not expelled, vntill Halyattes the Nephew of Ardis got the vpper hand of them. In these times therefore of Ardis, Sadyattes, and Halyattes, are wee to find the eight and twentie yeares, wherein the Scythians Raigned ouer Asia. Now forasmuch as Psammetichus the Aegyptian had some dealings with the Scythians, euen in the height of their prosperitie, wee must needs allow more than one or two of his last yeares, vnto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Raigne in Lydia, being three and twentie yeares compleat after the death of Psammetichus, leaues the space verie scant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meet the Aegyptian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must haue receiued ere they could bee driuen quite away. To increase this difficultie, the victorious Raigne of Nabuchodonosor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may we thinke it possible, that he should haue aduentured the strength of his Kingdom against the Aegyptians and Senes, had he stood in daily feare of loosing his owne, to a more mightie Nation, that lay vpon his necke? To speake simply as it appears to me, the victories ascribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes ouer these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole bodie of their Armie, but were the defeates of some troupes, that infested their severall Kingdoms; other Princes, and among these, Nabulassar hauing the like successe, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardie Northerne Laddes. Wherefore wee may probably annexe the eight and twentie yeares of the Scythians rule, to as manie almost the last of Nabulassars Raigne, in compasse whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can say of the time, wherein Asia suffered the violence of these oppressors.

†. II.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia; with the cause of their Iourne.

Touching the expedition it selfe, Herodotus tels vs, that the Cimmerians being driven out of their Countrey by the Scythians, invaded and wasted some part of Asia; and that the Scythians not contented with hauing wonne the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into farre remoued quarters of the world, so (as it were by chance) falling vpon Media and Aegypt. In this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia, Herby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; the Scythians, as mischieuous and foolish; or else Herodotus, and some other of his Countreymen, great slanderers of those, by whom their Nation had bene beaten, and Jonia, more than once, grievously ransack. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well knowne, and their manie Conquests so well testified in Histories of diuerse Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is insufficient to staine them with the note of Cowards. There were the posteritie of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Westerne World; and whose reflow did ouerwhelme no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we doe now entreat. Her that would more largely informe himselfe of their originall and actions, may peruse Gorepius Becanus his Imazonias of manie things in which Booke, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is said to haue spoken, of all Gorepius his works, that it is easie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There wee find it proued, by such arguments and authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Seythians, and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; howsoever dittinguished in name, by reason of their diuerse Tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indeede hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Countrie whether he place in the West, as nere vnto the Ocean and boundes of the Earth, Or in the North, as being faire from the Sunne, and covered with eternall darknesse, certaine it is that he would haue them neare neighbours to Hell: for hee had the same quarrell to them, which Heracles had, and therefore hee would haue made them seeme a kinde of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirms) to insert into his workes the names of such as liued in his owne times, making such mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himselfe deserued. And for this reason it is proued by Eusebius, that the Cimmerians were so disgraced by him, because they had walled his Countrie. Perhaps, that inuasion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his discourse with Helen, was the verie same, which Eusebius noteth to haue happened somewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together invaded Asia.

This is certaine, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerii (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often breake into Greece and Asia; which though it be not in expresse tearmes written, that they did with joynt forces, yet seeing they inuaded the selfe same places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One iourne of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eusebius, was by the frights of the Cimmerians, as we finde in Diodore, who further telleth vs, that the Seythians therein gaue them assistance. The same Authour, before his entrie into those discourses of the Amazons; which himselfe acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to haue bene Wives of the Seythians, and no lesse warlike than their Husbands; alluding the example of that Queene, who is said to haue laine the great Corsican Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carrie their wives along with them to the warres; and how desperate the courage was of those women; the terrible descent of them into Italie, when Minus the Roman ouerthrew them, giues proofe sufficient. I will not here enter into a discourse of the Amazons; other place will giue me better leisure to speake of them: but seeing that they are noted by diuerse Historians to haue belonged vnto the Cimmerians, to the Seythians, and to the Sarmatians, wee may the better approue Gorepius his conclusion. That these three Nations were one, at least that they were neare allies.

Now concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Seythians, it appeares to haue bene none other than the sending a Colonie of them forth into Asia, with an Armie of Seythians to helpe them, in purchasing a new seat, and establishing the plantation.

The Sarmatians also were companions in this iourne. For the Citie of Nero-gadin Russia (which Countrie is the same that was called Sarmatia) brood in their way homewards, as shall anon be further shewed. So that all the North was vp in Armes: and therefore it is no maruaile though manie Countreies felt the weight of this great inuasion. Such another voiage was that, which the same people made five hundred yeares and more after this, when they were encountered by the Romans. For they issued from the parts about the Lake Meotis; they were then likewise assisted (saith Plutarch in the most likely report of them) by the Seythians their neighbours; they had in their Armie about three hundred thousand fighting men, besides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandered ouer manie Countreies, beating all downe before them, and finally, thinking to haue setled themselves in Italie, they diuided their companie, for the more easie passage thither and were consumed in three terrible battailes by the Roman Consuls. Mere necessitie enforced these poore Nations, to trouble the World, in following such hard adventures. For their Countrie, being more fruitfull of men than of sustenance, and shut vp on the North side with intolerable cold, which denied issue that way to their ouerswelling multitudes; they were compelled to discharge vpon the South, and by right or wrong to driue others out of possession, as hauing title to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that weaker, but more ciuile people had. Their sturdie bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all sorts of ill, gaue them great advantage ouer such as were accustomed vnto more delicate life, and could not be without a thousand superfluities. Wherefore Minus they prevailed verie faue; their next neighbours giuing them free passage, that they might the sooner beridge of them; others giuing them, besides passage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthie places; others hiring them to depart with great presents; so as the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

THE first Companie of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand; leaving on the other side, and behind them, the great Mountaines of Caucasus. These hauing passed through the Land of Colechus, that is now called Atengelli, entered the Countrie of Pontus, and being arrived in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontorie whereon Sinope, a famous Hauen Towne of the Greekes, was situate built. Here it seemes that they bestowed the weakest and most vnerscuable of their traine, together with the heauiest part of their carriages; vnder some good gard: as drawing neere to those Regions, in conquest whereof they were to trie the vtmost hazard. For in like sort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spake euen now) dispose of their impediments, leaving them in a place of strength, where Antiochus now stands, when they drew neere vnto Gaul, vpo which they determined to adventure themselves in the purchase. From Sinope, the way into Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was fire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountaines or any deepe Rivers to staie their march: for Iris and Rhydis they had already passed.

What battailes were fought betwene these inuaders and the Lydians, and with what variable successe the one or other part waied and lost, I finde not written, nor amable to conjecture. This I find, that in the time of Arctus, the Cimmerians got possession of Sardes the Capitall Citie of Lydia, only the Cattle holding out against them. Further I obserue, that whereas Herodotus tels of the acts performed by Geges and Arctus Kings of Lydia, before this inuasion, and by Halayates and Cresus in the times following: all that Arctus did against the Cimmerians, and all (saue burning the Miletian Corne fields) that was done in twelue yeares by Sadiattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands so full of this businesse, that hee could turne them to nothing else) is quite omitted. Hereby it may seeme, that neither of the two did anie thing worthie of remembrance in those warres, but were glad enough that they did not loose all.

Certainly, the miseries of warre are neuer so bitter and manie, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forsaking their owne seates, labours to roote out the established possessor of another Land, making roome for themselves, their wiues and children. They that fight for the matter are pacified with tribute, or with some other seruices and acknowledgements, which had they bene yielded at the first, all had bene quiet, and no sword bloudied. But in these migrations, the assailants bring so little with them, that they need all which the defendants haue, their Lands and Cattel, their houses and their goods, euen to the cradels of the sucking infants. The mercilesse rearmes of this controuersie arme both sides with desperate resolution: seeing the one part must either winne, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or loose their liues without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe haue felt examples hereof; and the mightie Empire of Rome was ouerthrowne by such inuasions. But our Isle of Brittain can best witness the diuersitie of Conquests; hauing by the happie victorie of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Ciuile arts, in exchange of libertie, that was but slenderly instructed therein before; whereas the issue of the Saxons and Danish warres, was, as were the causes, quite contrarie. For these did not seeke after the Dominion only, but the entire possition of the Countrie, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible crueltie, eradicating all of the British Race, and defacing all memoriall of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Cimmerician blood) found such end of their enterprise, as it may becometh that the Cimmericians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Asia, did arrive vnto. So that by considering the processe of the one, we shall the better conceiue the fortune of the other. Manie battailes the Danes wonne; yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Manie the Saxons wonne vpon the Danes, yet not so great, as could driue them quite away, and backe from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in course of time, the long continuance euen of vicer enmitie, had bred such acquaintance betweene them, as bowing the natures of both these people, made the one more pliant vnto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one milde temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons, in England, where great slaughter had made large roome; others returning home, found their owne Countrie wide enough to receive them, as hauing disburthened it selfe of manie thousands, that were sent to seeke their graues abroad. And such (as I thinke) was the end of the Cimmerician warre in Lydia; whereunto though some victorie of Halys may haue hastened the conclusion, yet the wearisome length of time seemed to haue done most in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should feare to adde hereunto my further conjecture; which is, that the matter was so compounded betwene the Cimmericians and Halysates, that the Riuer of Halys should diuide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Easterne side of the Riuer was the Countrie of the Amazons; that is, indeed, of the Cimmericians and other Scythian people; whose wiues and daughters these warlike women are supposed to haue bene.

And hereunto the quarrell ensuing, betwene Halysates and Cyaxares the Mede, hath verie good reference. For Halysates (as is said) fought in defence of certaine Scythians, vpon whom the Medes sought reuenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmericians, being much weakened with mutuall slaughters, should haue joyined in a league of mutuall defence for their common safetie: though otherwise it had bene dangerous to Halysates, if he had permitted the Medes to extend his Kingdome so farre Westward, whatsoeuer the pretences might bee, of taking reuenge vpon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the warre betwene these two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I find it of little waight, waight, and lesse probabilitie. He tels of Scythians, that being chased out of their Countrie by faction, came vnto Cyaxares; who committed vnto them certaine Boyes, to be instructed in the Scythian tongue, and feat of Archerie. Now it so fell out (saith he) that these Scythians wing much to hunt, and commonly bringing home somewhat with them, did neurt the selfe otherwhiles milke of their game, and come home as they went. Hercupon the King being froward and cholericke, bitterly reuiled them; and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boyes that was vnder their charge, whom dressing like Venison they presented vnto him; which done they fled vnto Halysates. This Herodotus deliuiers, as the ground of a warre that lasted sixe yeares betwene the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding these Fugitiues to be deliuered into his hand, the other refusing to betraye such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians, to betraye themselves to either of these Kings, vnto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treacherie that he shewed in the massacring of their Countrie men, that were in his Kingdome; of whom it is now meet that wee should speake.

†. IIII.

The warre of the Scythians in the higher Asia.

AS the Cimmericians held their course Westerly, along the shores of the Euxine Sea: so the Scythians and Sarmatians took the other way, and hauing the Caspian Sea on their left hand, passed betwene it and Caucasus through Albania, Colchene, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Seruan and Georgia, and so they entered into Media. The Medes encountered them in Armes; but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to anie agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whilst Psammiticus Raigned in Egypt. If it were in the sixt yeare of Nabulassars Raigne ouer Babylon (supposing him to haue Raigned five and thirtie; otherwile we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight and twentie yeares of their Dominion end, one yeare before the great Nabuchodonosor was King; so giuing him good leaue to provide securely, for the inuasion of Syria, which expedition he began while his Father yet liued, as Iesephus out of Berofus relates the Historie.

Now the Medes, desirous to saue themselves as well as they might, from this terrible Nation, which when they had no lust to a second triall of the sword, refused not to vndergoe the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serue to remouee these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countries pleasant and better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to bee perswaded, that a little more traualle, would adde a great deale more to their content. For they relied so much vpon their owne valour, that they feared no resistance; and being the brauest men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Egypt, I doe not thinke: Babylon was neare enough; whether if hee could send these Locusts to graze, than should not his vnfriendly Neighbours haue cause to laugh at his misfortune. What thist Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had anie, dealings with them I doe not reade. But it is well knowne, that his Dominions lay in the midst betwene Media and Egypt, as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributarie; wherefore we may verie well beleue, that they watered their horses in his Riuer, and that he also was content to giue them prouender.

rooke care that they might not looke vpon Ægypt; least the sight thereof should more easily detaine them there, than anie force or perswasion, that hee could vie, would send them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he ment to bestow vpon them, than on his Armie that should keepe them backe. Ægypt was rich; and halfe the riches thereof had not bene ill spent in fauing all. Yet Plammenius tooke the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had bene so oblitmate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For hee lay close vpon the edge of the Wilderness in Gaza (as I take it) the Southernmost border of Palestina: whence hee neuer advanced to meet with the Syrians; but gaue them leaue to feele as much of the scalding Sun-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as ni all the length of Syria could beat vpon them. When they were come as farre as Ascalon, the next Cite to Gaza, then did he assaile them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to worke so much the better, by how much the worse they were pleased with the heat of a Climate so farre different from their owne. Plammenius had at his backe a vail wilderness, ouer the forching sands whereof, the Syrians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrarie distempers, could ill haue indured to pursue him, through vknowne wayes, had they fought with him and prevailed: especially the Kingdome of Ægypt being readie to entertaine him with relief; and them with new trouble at the end of their wearie iourne. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visite their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Ægyptian King (besides that he preferred his owne Estate from a dangerous adventure, by hyring this great Armie to depart from him) found all his cost well repayed in the proceesse of his was in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more then euer troubled themselves, with the returne of their oppressors. For the Syrians, resolving now to seeke no further, beganne to demaund more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grievous exactions, they presumed to lue at discretion vpon the Countrey, taking what they listd from the Owners; and manie times (as it were to saue the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long ved ouer the higher Asia, that is, ouer the Countrey lying betwene the Caspian and Red Seas, and betwene India and Afric the selfe. Happie it was for the poore people, that in so large a space of ground, there was room enough for these new comers; otherwise the calamitie that fell, as it were by chance, vpon those priuate men, to whose wealth anie Syrian did beare a fancie, would haue lighted in generall vpon all at one clap, leauing few aloue, and none able to relieue their fellowes. Yet it seemes that the heauie burthen lay vpon Media; for it was a fruitful Countrey, not farr from their owne home, and lay vnder a Climate well agreeing with the constitution of their bodies: there also it was that they had the fatal blow, by which their insolent Rule was taken from them.

Hæd. lib. 2.

Cyaxares King of the Medes, who in this extremitie was no better then a Renter-gatherer for the Syrians, perceiving that his Land lay vnmanured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions; and that the matter could not be remedied by open force; resolved to proue what might be done by stratagem. The managing of the businesse is thus deliuered in briefe: That he, and his Medes, sought the better part of the Syrians; made them drunke; and slew them; recouering hereby the possession of all that they had lost.

Such another slaughter was committed vpon the Danes in England; but it was reuenged by their Countermen, with greater cruelties than euer they had practised before. That the Syrians, which escaped this bloudie feast, made any stirre in Media, I doe not find; neither doe I read that either in reuenge hercof, or vpon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by inuasion from Syria in time following.

This

This is the more strange, for that the Armie returning home out of Media was verie strong, and encountered with opposition (as Herodotus reports it) no lesse then it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the device of Cyaxares to fire his Countrey, tooke good effect, with lesse bloud-shed than hath bene supposed. For if hee surpris'd all the chiefe of them, it was no hard matter to make a good composition. Manie of them doubtlesse, in eight and twentie yeares, had so well settled themselves, that they were desirous of rest, and might be permitted, without anie danger, to remaine in the Countrey manie (of whom I shall speake anon) having done what they could in the businesse, for which they came forth, were willing to returne home, with what they had gotten; such as were not pleased with either of these two courses, might goe ioyne with the Commerians in Lydia, or seeke their fortunes in other prouinces, among their owne Companions. Whereas all the Families of the Nations are said to haue bene with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be vnderstood, that a great part of the Syrians, vpon hope of gaine, or desire to keepe what they had already gained, were content to become subject vnto Nabuchadnezzar: mens loue of their wealth being most effectuall, in taming the more vnquiet loue of inordinate libertie. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnezzar, euer after, so in his first beginning of warre, did beate the Ægyptians, who in ages foregoing, had bene accustomed, to deale with the Babylonians after another fashion: and this new success: of that King may be imputed, in regard of humane meanes, to such addition as of these forces.

Of the Syrian Armie returning out of Media, diuers Authors report a Story, which confirms mee in the opinion, that this Companie went forth to assist their kindred and friends, in acquiring a new seate, and establishing their plantation. For these had left their wiues behinde them; a good argument to proue that they meant to come againe. The Syrian women, to comfort themselves in their husbands absence, became bed-fellowes to their slaues. These got a litle brood of youths, that were loath to be troubled with Fathers in Law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their returne. If they were only the children of slaues; which compounded an Armie (as Herodotus would haue it, who tels vs, that the Syrians were wont to pull out all their Bond-mens cies) it must needs be that they were verie Boyes, or else that the Women did verie little while continue chaste. Wherefore I rather beleue the tale as it is told by the Russes themselves, who agreeing in therewith the consent of Historiis, make that report of their Ancestors returning homewards, which I will set downe, as I find it, in M. Doctor Elerov his exact discourse of the Russe Common-wealth. They vnderstand by the way that their Chaiques, or Bond-slaues whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their Townes, Lands, Houses, Wiues, and all. At which newes being somewhat amazed, and yet displaying the Villanie of their seruants, they made the more speed home: and so not farre from Novogrod met them in warlike manner marching against them. Whereupon advising what was best to be done, they agreed all to set open them with no other shew of weapon but with their horse-whips (which as their manner is euerie man ride with all) to put them in remembrance of their seruile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And so marching on, and lashing a'l together with their whips in their hands, they gaue the onset. Which seemed so terrible in the eares of their Villaines, and stroke such a yease into those of the smart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled all together like slaues before the Driners. In memorie of this victorie, the Novogrodians euer since haue stamped their Coat which they call a Dingoe Novogrodskoy currant through all Russia with the figure of a Horseman shaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may seeme, that all the women of that Countrey, haue fared the worse euer since, in regard of this vnuerall fault: for such a Pudkey or whip, as terrified those slaues, curiously wrought by her selfe, is the first present that the Moscow Wife, euen in time of wooing, sends to him that shalbe her husband, in token of subjection; being well assured, to seele to often on her own loines. But this was a Document vnto the Syrians, or rather Sarmatians, Sarmatians; (for Novograd lands in the Countrey that was called Sarmatia) to beware of abetting themselves any more to long from their Wives; which after this, I find not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to set downe of the Seythian expedition; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countries; but for that it appears to have beene a great cause, of the Ægyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, and about Judea, which continues yet a while the centre of our discourse.

§. V.

Of Princes lining in diverse Countries, in these ages.

Aving thus farre digressed from the matters of Juda, to avoide all further occasion of doing the like, I will here inserte a note of such Kings and men of marke, as were betwene the death of Alanaxes, and the ruine of Jerusalem. Of the Ægyptians, Babyloniens, Alees, and Lydians, I have spoken as much, as I thought needfull. In Remes, Tullus Hostilius held the Kingdome, vntill the one and twentieth yeare of Iofias; at which time Ancus Marcius succeeding Raigned Foure and twentie yeares. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but verie rich, prevailed so far by his graciousnesse among the people, that he got the Kingdome to himselfe, dis-appointing the sonnes of Ancus, over whom he was Tutor. He beganne in the fourth yeare of Zedekia, and Raigned eight and thirtie yeares. In this time it was, namely in the second yeare of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedæmonians, bethinking them how to bee auenged of the Arcadians, who gaue succour to the Messeniens against them in the former warre, entred the Territorie, tooke the Citie of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrisons were soone after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the race of the Bacidae made himselfe Lord of Corinth about these times, and gouerned it in peace thirtie yeares; leauing for succellour his sonne Periander, one of the seuen Sages, but a cruell Tyrant: who among other vile acts, slew his owne wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, strippd all the Corinthian women sharke naked, burning their appparell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceiue that the wisdome of the Greekes, was not excellent in those dayes; when such a one as this could bee admired as excellend all the Countrey.

In these times also were Zaleucus, and Dracon, famous Lawgiuers, the one among the Locrians in Italie, the other in the Citie of Athens. The Lawes of Dracon were so rigorous, that he was said to haue written them with blood: for hee rewarded euery small offence with death. Wherefore his constitutions were soone abrogated, and power giuen to Solon, by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were verie milde. He forbad any Gentlewoman to waile abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, vnlesse it were when shee was drunke; or to goe forth of the Towne by night, vnlesse it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse herselfe vp in immodest brauerie, vnlesse it were to inuigilate a lover. By which pleasant Ordinances, he effected his desire: for none would seeme, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is reported in this man as a singular example of iustice, that when his owne sonne had committed adulterie, and was therefore to looke both his eyes, he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gaue one eye of his owne to saue the young man (who also lost one) from vtter blindness.

I shall not henceforth need, so farre to wander, as hitherto I often haue done, in pursuing of actions collateral to the Historie, for inserting them in their order of time.

time. The Chaldeans will soone fall vnder the Persians; the Persians, ere long, encounter with the Greekes; the Greekes, with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successfullie present themselves, in their flourishing Estate it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befell them in their Minoritie. But in the long space of more than thirtie hundred yeares, which passed betwene the ending of Sennacherib, and the destruction of Jerusalem, we finde little matter, wherein the Historie of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the verie nearest borderers. Yet reade we of many Kingdomes, that in these many ages, were erected, and throwne downe; as likewise, many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any neare distance, all which must haue bene quite omitted, or else referred vnto a verie vnseasonable rehearfall, had they not bene disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conueniencie, may pardon the necessitie.

§. VI.

The oppression of Judea, and destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans.

OW to returne to the Jeseph Storie, from whence wee haue so farre digressed. In the third yeare of Iehoiakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet liuing, entred Judea with a great Armie, who besieging and forcing Jerusalem, made Iehoiakim his Vassall in despoight of Neco, that had established him King, and tooke with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a child, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. Also he tooke a part of the Church treasures, but staid not to search them thoroughly; for Neco halted to the succour of Iehoiakim, hoping to finde Nabuchodonosor in Judea; wherein this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazard himselfe and his Armit; it being a Countrey of an euill affection towards him, as also farre off from any succour or sure place of retreat. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Seythian horsemen in his Armie; it was the more wisely done of him, to tae backe, out of the rough, mourtainous, and ouer-hot Countrey, into places that were more euen and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his father, happening at the same time, gaue him iust occasion to returne home; and take possession of his owne Kingdome, before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more vnto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Ægyptians were not readie to follow him so farre and to bid him battaile, vntill the new yeare came in; which was the fourth of Iehoiakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Neco. In this yeare the Babylonian lying vpon the Banke of Euphrates (his owne Territorie bounding it on the North-side) attended the arriuall of Neco. There, after a resolute contention for victorie, Neco was slaine, and his Armie remaying forced to saue it selfe, which full ill it did, by a violent retreat. This victorie Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recovered all Syria, and whatsoever the Ægyptians held out of their proper Territorie towards the North. The Ægyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Iehoiakim held himselfe quiet, as being friend in heart vnto the Ægyptian, yet hauing made his peace with the Chaldean the yeare before; who contented with such profit as hee could then readily make, had iustborne to laie any Tribute vpon Juda. But this could be referrednesse of Iehoiakim, was, on both sides, taken in ill part. The Ægyptian King Psammetichus, who succeeded vnto Neco, beganne to thinke vpon restoring Iehoiakim, taken Prisoner by his father, and setting him vp, as a Domestical Enemy, against his vngatefull brother. Against Against all such accidents, the Judeans had prepared the vsuall remedie, practised by his fore-fathers: for he had made his owne sonne Iechonia King with him long before, in the second year of his owne Raigne, when the Boy was but Eight yeares olde. As for this rumour of Iechonahs returne; the Prophet Jeremie toldt, that it should prouide ill, saying: he shall not returne thither, but hee shall die in the place whither they haue led him captive, and shall see this Land no more. The Aegyptians indeed, hauing spent all their Mercenarie forces, and receiued that heauie blow at Carchemish, had not remanuing much proportion of tharpe Steele, as of faire gold, which without other helpe, is of little effect. The valour of Neco was not in Psamme, A-pries who Raigned after Psamme, did once aduenture to shew his face in Syria; but after a biggellooke, he was glad to retire, without aduenturing the hazard of a battaile. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought only with braue words, telling such friuolous tales, as men, that meane to doe nothing, vse, of their glorious acts: re- passed, against Iolias and Iechonah. In this case it was ealie for Iechonah to gine them satisfaction, by letting them vnderstand, the sinceritie of his affliction towards them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to worke more roundly. He sent a peremptorie messageto Iechonah, willing him not to stand vpon any nice points, but acknowledge himselfe a Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto such fearefull threats, as made the poore Indean lay aside all thought of

Pharaoh, and yeeld to doe, as the more mightie would haue him. So he continued in the obedience of Nabuchodonosor for three yeares. At this time Jeremie the Prophet cried out against the Temes, putting them in mind that he had now three and twentie yeares exhorted them to repentance, but because they had stoppt their eares against him, and the rest of the Prophets, hee now pronounced their captiuitie at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seuentie yeares. The same calamitie hee threatened to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Aegyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomians, and the rest; foretelling that they should all drinke out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of His furie, whom they had forsaken, and after the seuentie yeares expired, that the Babylonians themselves should taste of the same cup, and be vtterly subuerbed by the Medes, & the Judeans permitted to returne againe into their owne fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Jeremie seemed to haue beene in the fourth yeare of this Iechonah, at which time Barnah the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom hee sent to reade them vnto the people, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King: but fearing the Kings furie they had first let Jeremie at libertie, and aduised him and Barnah to hide themselves.

Iechonah after hee heard a part of it, and perceiued the ill newes therein deliuered, made no more adoe but did cut the Booke in peices and cast it into the fire. All which Jeremie caused to be new written, with this addition, that the dead bodie of Iechonah, should becault out, exposed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost, and that there should be none of his seede to sit on the Throne of Dauid.

Time thus running on, while Iechonah rested secure of all danger, as Tributarie to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Aegyptians; the mightie Citie of Tyre opposed it selfe against the Chaldean forces; and vpon iust confidence of her owne strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now forasmuch as the terme of seuentie yeares, was prescribed vnto the desolation, as well of Tyre, as of Ierusalem, and other Townes and Countries; it is apparent, that they which refferre the expugnation of this Citie vnto the nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonosor, haue iure authoritie for their warrant. Whereupon likewise it follows of necessity, that the siege thereof beganne in the seuenth of his Raigne; as hauing 13 lasted thirtee yeares.

Here I will take leaue to intrude a briefe note, concerning the severall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath risen much disputation. The third yeare of Iechonah, was the last of Nabulassar, who being deliuered deliuered from other cares, tooke notice of such as had revolted from him vnto Pharo Neco, and sent this Noble Prince, his sonne, with an Armie into Syria, to reclaim them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the same yeare. The yeare next following, being the fourth of Iechonah, was the first of Nabuchadnezzar; which Jeremie affirmeth in expresse wordes; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentie yeare hee conquered Aegypt; and then beganne to Raigne as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offenda him. The second from this yeare it was, wherein hee saw that vision, of the Image consisting of sundrie Mettalls; which did prefigure the succession of great Kingdomes, that should rule the Earth, before the coming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I find, of long disputations: but returne vnto the siege of Tyre, which beganne in the seuenth of his Raigne.

The Citie of Tyre covered all the ground of an Island, that was diuided from the maine, by a deep & broad channel of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrans, in multitude of goodly Ships, and skill to vse them, excelled all other Nations; and euerie Winde, from one part or other, brought needfull provisions into the Citie. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof neuertheless the iudgements of God (denounced against it by Elij, Jeremie, Ezechiel) had threatened the destruction; and the obstinate resolution of Nabuchodonosor, had fully determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of resistance, vnderooke a vast piece of worke; cuen to fill vp the Sea, that parted the Island from the Continent. The Citie of olde Tyrus, that stood opposite to the new, vpon the firme Land, and the mountaine of Libanus neare adjoining that was loaden with Cedars, and abundance of other trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirtee yeares were spent, in this laborious, and almost hopelesse businesse. Which needeth not seeme strange: for Alexander working vpon that foundation which was remanuing of Nabuchodonosors Petre; and being withall assisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seven months ere hee could make way into the Citie. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carrie away that wherewith Alexander laboured to couer a sheliue; with much more violence could it ouerturne, and as it were consume, the worke of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his foundations in the bottome of the deepe, struing as it were, to fill the empty bellie of this Cormorant; whereas the Medes, did only stop the throat of it. Euerie man knowes, God could haue furthered the accomplishment of his owne threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to vse, either miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earth-quakes, and the like; by making at least the Seas calme, and adding the fauourable concurrence of all second helps. But so it pleased him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to vse the hand of man; euen the hand of man struing, as may seeme, against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excheilue labour of the Chaldeans Euerie head was made bald, and euerie shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not give ouer till he was master of the Towne.

When he was entred vpon this desperate seruice; whether it were so, that some losses receiued, some mutinie in his Armie; or (which is most likely, and so Iosephus reports it) some glorious rumours of the Aegyptians, gaue courage to his euill willers; Iechonah enuouced his subiection, and beganne to hope for the contrarie of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonosor gaue him no leisure to doe much hurt: but with part of his Armie marched directly into Iudaea; where the amazed King made so little resistance (the Aegyptians hauing left him, as it were in a dreame) that he entred Ierusalem, and laid hands on Iechonah: whom hee first bound and determined to send to Babylon, but changing counsell, hee caused him to be slaine in the place, and gaue him the Sepulchre of an Asse, to be deuoured by beafts and rauens birds, according to the former Prophecies: leauing in his place, Iechonah or

Iechonias his sonne; whom after three moneths and tenne dayes Nabuchodonosor removed and sent Prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardachius, and Iedech, the high Priest. The mother of Iechonias, together with his servants, Eunuchs, and all the ablest men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carried away Captives. This Iechonias, following the counsell of Jeremie the Prophet, made no resistance, but submitted himselfe to the Kings will: wherein hee both pleased God, and did that which was best for himselfe; though at the present it might seeme otherwise, to such as considered the euill that befell him, rather then the greater euill that he thereby auoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded; which was good. But it seemes that he was partaker, at least, of his Fathers faults; which was an imitator: which was the cause, that his submitting himselfe to Gods pleasure did not preferue his Estate: for so we reade in general words, that he did euill in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonosor established Mathania his Vncle in the Kingdome of Juda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to say, as the Iustice of God. For likeas Neco, King of Egypt, had formerly displaced Iehashaz, alter his Father Iehus was slaine, and set vp Iehoiakim the sonne of another Mother; so Nabuchodonosor slew Iehoiakim who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his sonne Iechonias Prisoner to Babel, gaue the Kingdome to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Iehashaz, whom Neco tooke with him into Egypt. From Zedechias hee required an oath for his faithfull obedience, which Zedechias gaue him, and called the liuing God to witnesse in the same, that he would remaine assured to the Kings of Chaldea.

In the first yeare of Zedechias, Jeremie saw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes: the one signifying those Judeans that were carried away captiue, the other those that staid, and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Jeremie wrote in a Booke all the euill that should fall vpon Babylon, which Booke or scrole he gaue to Sherais, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to visite Nabuchodonosor, willing him first to reade it to the Captiue Ieremes, and then to bind it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words. Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rise from the euill that I will bring vpon her. This Iourne of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to haue bene in way of visitation, carrying some presents. But I further thinke, that hee had some suite there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his returne all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seemes) to those vniuerse courses, from which Jeremie exhorted both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes; one of which he wore about his owne necke, others hee sent vnto the King of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visite Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Juda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possesse and enioy their owne Countries; if not, they should assuredly perish by the sword, by fire, and by pestilence.

Hee also fortolde them, that those Vessels which as yet remained in Ierusalem, should also trauaile after the rest, and at length they should be restored againe.

The same yeare Amnias, the false Prophet, tooke off the wooden Chaine which Jeremie ware, in signe of the Captiuitie of the Ieremes, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two yeares, God would breake the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he layed on all Nations; restore Iechonias, and all the Ieremes, with the Vessels and riches of the Temple, and giue an end to all these troubles. But Jeremie in stead of his wooden Yoke ware a Coller of yron: and in signe that Amnias had giuen a deceitfull and false hope to the people, hee foretold the death of this cold Prophet, which seized vpon him in the second moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wauered long enough betwene faith and passion, in the eight yeare of his Raigne he practised more seriously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Masabites, Tyrans, and others that were promised great aides of the Egyptians: in confidence of whose reilliance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian Yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had knowledge, hee marched with his Armie in the dead of Winter, toward Ierusalem, and besieged it. Jeremie perswaded Zedechias to render the Citie and himselfe: but being confident of the helpe from Egypt and being perswaded by his Counsellors, and false Prophets, that it was vnpossible that the Kingdome of Juda should bee extirpate, vntill the coming of Silo (according to the Prophecie of Isaiah) hee despised the wordes of Jeremie and imprisoned him. For Jeremie had told the King, that the Citie should be taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, but bee taken Prisoner, and brought to the presence of Nabuchodonosor; that he should not perish by the sword, but being carried to Babel, die his naturall death.

Ierusalem being, the following yeare, surrounded by Nabuchodonosors Armies, the King of Egypt, Pharao Hophra according to Jeremie (Herodotus calleth him Apries) entred the border of Juda, with his Armie, to succour Zedechias, of whose reuolt he had bene the principall Author. But Jeremie gaue the Ieremes faithfull counsell, willing them not to haue anie trust in the succours of Egypt: for hee assured them, that they should returne againe, and in no sort relieue them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans remoued from Ierusalem to encounter the Egyptians, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough, leaving the poore people of Ierusalem to their destined miseries.

In the meane while the Ieremes, who, in their first extremitie, had manumised their Iehew Bondmen (as Gods Law required at the yeare of Isaiah) and made them free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now vpon the breaking vp of the Chaldean Armie, repent them of their Charitie: and thinking all had bene at an end, held them perforce to their former slauerie. But the Chaldees being returned to the siege, the Prophet Jeremie, when the State of Ierusalem beganne now to grow to extremitie, counselled Zedechias to render himselfe vnto them; assuring him of his owne life, and the safetie of the Citie, if he would so doe. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his inuidiclie and perjurie, had provided for him.

Three and twentie Moneths (as some doe reckon it) or according to Iosaphus eightene, the Babylonian Armie lay before Ierusalem, and held it exceeding freightly besieged. For they built Forts against it round about, or (as P. Astarty hath it) extrinsecum contra eam turrem ligneam per circuitum, they surrounded the Citie with wooden Towers, so as the besieged could neither fall out, nor recesse into the Citie any supply of men or victuals. Iosaphus reports, that they ouer-topped the Walls, with high Towers raised vpon mounts; from which they did so beat vpon the Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to forsake their Stations. Now although it were so that the besieged also raised Counterbuildings, like vnto these, Yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions therabouts, and had the Woods and Riuers to obey him, found meanes to ouerthrow all the Citizens enclosures, and to beat downe as fast from without, as they raised from within the bodie and foundation of his owne workes being guarded, by the Walls of Ierusalem interposed; and theirs within, laid open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both famine and pestilence (which commonly accompanie men freightly besieged) grew on fast vpon them, whereby, when the number, strength, and courage of the Ieremes failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entrie, their Princes did feat themselves, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this vncomfortable sight, and finding no remedie of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hope at once; and shifted himselfe together with his Wiues, Children, Princes, and principall seruants, out of the Citie, by a way vnder ground; leaving his amazed and guidelesse people, to the mercilesse swords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Jeremie the Prophet perswaded him to render himselfe, despised both the Counsell of God and the force of Nabuchodonosor; vied now that remedie, which Wopius truly termeth: triste, turpe, & infelix, vafall, foamefull, and vnfortunate.

By this secret subterrane vault, Zedechias making his stealth, recovered (by the helpe of the darke night) the plaines or deserts of Iericho: but by reason of the traine, that followed him and his, (uerie one leading with him those whom they held most deare vnto them) hee was easily traced and pursued. How great looser the companie was that attended on him, yet, as Iosephus reports it, they on whole fidelitie he most reposed himselfe, no sooner beheld the Chaldeans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted themselves into the Delarts as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the Ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Prisoner, with his Children, and Princes, he was conuighed to Rebba or Rebatha a Citie (as some thinke) of Egyptus, where Nabuchodonosor then 'aie, as a place indifferent betwene Ierusalem and Tyre, with both which at once he had to doe.

Now after Nabuchodonosor had laied before Zedechias the manie graces and benefits conferred vpon him, together with the notable falsehood and perjurie where-with he had requited them; he commaunded his Children, Princes, and Friends to be slaine before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should be the last, that euer hee should behold in the World, hee caused his eyes to be torne out of his head, and so carried him in a slauih manner to Babel, where hee consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetuall imprisonment. Here this most marueilous Prophecie of Ezechiel was performed; Advenum eam in Babylonem & ipsam non viadet. I will bring him into Babylon and he shall not see it.

Thus in the Eleuenth and last yeare of Zedechias which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, the Chaldeans entred the Citie by force, where sparing no sex nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found.

3534

In the yeare next following, Nabuzardan, General of the Armie, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Ierusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the fueneth to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood 39 four hundred thirte and one yeares.

3. Kings. 18.

After this vpon a second karch, Nabuzardan (not yet satiated with blood) commanded seauentie and two others to bee slaughtered, which had hidden themselves from the first fire, to wit, the chiefe and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of Warre, five of his House-should-servants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Iudea, and leaving the poorest labouring soules, with some that followed the partie of Nabuchodonosor, to till the ground: ouer whom he left Gouvernour, Gedalia the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Iehus had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his iustice and equitie, by Iosephus highly commended. This man, a Jew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it seemeth, in the beginning of the warre: and by Iehus desire to liue with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same aduice, which the Prophet gaue vnto Zedechias; which was, to submit himselfe altogether to the Babylonian, who being ordained by God to exercise his iustice, was therefore resistlesse. The Prophet Jeremie being left to his owne choice, either to liue in Chaldea, or elswhere, he made election of Golatha, to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Jeremie, but gaue comfort to all the other Jewes that were left vnder his charge, promising them fauour and libertie, so long as they remained obedient Subjects to Nabuchodonosor, by whom hee was established Provinciall Gouvernour of his owne Nation.

But ere that yeare was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the siege of Ierusalem, had kept himselfe out of the storme, with Baalis King of the Ammonites) being followed by tenne other chosen men, while Gedalia had feasted them in

Mispha or Mispha, the Citie of his residence, traiterously slew him, together with diuers Chaldeans and Jewes that accompanied him. This done, hee made an escape, and in his way encountering with eightie persons, repairing towards Gedalia with presents, he slew the most of them, and spared the rest, because they promised to discover vnto him some Treasures, hidden in the fields during the warre. He also tooke with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Gedalia by Nabuchodonosor. This practise and intent of Ismael had bene formerly discovered vnto Gedalia by Iehanan, one of the Leaders of the few remaining Jewes; but Gedalia was incredulous.

Iudea being now left without a Gouvernour (for Israel durst not take it vpon him, but retired himselfe, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Jewes, fearing the reuenge of the Chaldeans, resolved to flie away into Egypt, and besought Jeremie to aske counsell of God for them: who readily made them answer, that if they remained in Iudea, God would provide for them and shew them mercie; but if they sought to saue themselves in Egypt, that they should then vndoubtedly perill. Notwithstanding this aduice, the Jewes held their determination; and despising the Oracle of God, and constraining Jeremie: and Barnuch to accompanie them, they traualled into Egypt, and inhabited by the permission of Pharao, nere vnto Taphnes: where, when Jeremie often reprehended them for their Idolatrie, foretelling both the destruction of themselves, and the Egyptians also, he was by the his own hard-hearted and vngratefull Countymen, floned to death; and by the Egyptians, who creely reuerenced him, buried neere the Sepulchre of their owne

Of the connexion of sacred and prophane Historie.

40 THE course of Time; which in prophane Histories might rather bee discerned through the greatest part of his way, hitherto passed in some out-worne foot-steps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Easterne Countries by the account from Nabonissar, left surer marks, and more appliable to actions concurrent, than were the warre of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruine of Ierusalem to disco-50 ver the connexion of antiquitie fore spent, with the storie of succeeding ages. Manifest it is, that the originall and progresse of things could ill bee sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the affaires of Kingdomes and Empire afterwards growne vp are not to be found among those, that haue now no state nor politic remaining of their owne. Having therefore pursued the storie of the world vnto that age, from whence the memorie of succeeding accidents is with little interruption or fabulous discouerie deriued vnto vs, I hold it now conuenient briefly to shew, by what means and circumstances the historie of the Hebrewes, which of all other is the most ancient, may bee conioyned with the following times, wherein that Image of fundrie metalls, discouered by God vnto Nabuchadnezzar, did raigne ouer the earth, when Israel was either none, or an vnregarded Nation.

Herein I doe not hold it needfull, to insist vpon those authorities, which giue, as it were by heare-say, a certaine year of some old Assyrian King vnto some action or euent, whereof the time is found expresse in Scripture: for together with that of Ninus his line in Sardanapalus, if not before all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus and his issue that occupied that Kingdome afterwards, depending vpon the vncertaine relations of such, as were neither constant in assigning the yeares of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relie vpon. Let it therefore suffice, that the consent and harmonic, which some haue found in the yeares of those ouer-worne Monarchs, doth preserve their names, which otherwise might haue bene forgotten. Now concerning the later Kings of that Nation, howsoever it be true that we finde the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could wee only learne in what age each of them liued, but not in what year his raigne beganne or ended, were it not that the raigne of Nabuchadnezzar is more precisely applied to the times of Iehoiakim and Zedekia. Hence haue we the first light whereby to discouer the means of connecting the sacred and prophane histories. For vnder Nabuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captiuitie of Juda, which ended when 70. yeares were expired; and these 70. yeares tooke end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well knowne affords vs means of looking back into the ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first year of Cyrus his raigne in Persia, by generall consent, is ioyned with the first year of the 55. Olympiad, where, that he raigned three and twentie yeares before his Monarchie, and seuen yeares afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controuerie. Giuing therefore foure hundred and eight yeares vnto the distance betwene the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiads by Iphitus; wee may easily arriue vnto those antiquities of Greece, which were not meerey fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilest in fundrie parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in siting downe their times, which they had by Tradition from Authors of well-approved faith and industrie.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned vnto Alexander, and from him to the battaile of Actium, it were (peradventure) in this place impertinent to let downe. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captiuitie are the markes whereby wee are chiefly directed, in passing from the first vnto the latest yeares of the world, through any storie, with least interruption, it is very expedient that we take some paines to informe our selues truly of the 70. yeares, during which it continued, euen from Nabuchadnezzar vnto Cyrus.

p. I. I.

A briefe rehersall of two opinions, touching the beginning of the captiuitie: with an answer to the canils of PORPHYRIE, maiebing against S. MATTHEW, and DANIEL, vpon whom the later of these opinions is founded.

Any Commentators, and other Historians, and Chronologers finde, that the captiuitie then beganne when Seleucus was carried prisoner into Babylon, eleuen yeares before the final destruction of Ierusalem vnder Zedekias. This they proue out of diuers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plaine distinction between the beginning of the captiuitie, and vtter destruction of Ierusalem by Nabuchadnezzar, in these wordes. In the five and twentieth yeare of our being in captiuitie in the beginning of the yeare, in the tenth day of the moneth, in the fourteenth yeare after that the Citie was smitten. In which wordes hee beginneth the captiuitie in plaine termes, eleuen yeares before the Citie was destroyed. Beraudus is of opinion that it beganne in the first of Nabuchadnezzar, and the fourth of Ioskim, which hee endeouours to proue out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of S. Matthew, and Daniel, whose wordes afford matter of long disputation, but serue not to make good so much as Beraudus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole booke of Daniel, haue ministred occasion of scoffing and railing at the Christian religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who, not understanding how the sonnes of King Iudas were called by diuers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what in reckoning the sonnes, or, according to some translations, the Sonne and Nephewes of that good King, begotten about the time of the captiuitie. Vpon Daniel also the same Porphyrie doth spend the twelfth of his malicious bookes written against the Christians, affirming that these prophecies and visions remembered by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or neare the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond supposition of his, Ensebius, Apollonius, and others, haue sufficiently answered. For the seuerie Interpreters who conuerted the old Testament about an hundred yeares before Epiphanius, did also turne this booke of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greece, as a part of Scripture receiued. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, that he liued diuers yeares before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Iaddus the high Priest shewed that great Conquerour, when he came towards Ierusalem to haue destroyed it, this booke of Daniel, wherein he beheld his owne glorie foretold, as the same was plainly expounded vnto him; which not only laied his hand from the harme of that Citie and people, but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as despising all future perill and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Easterne Empire in a shorter time than Nabuchadnezzar had done one Citie, to wit, Tyre in Phoenicia.

It is true indeede that the Iewes themselves giue lesse authoritie to Daniel, than to Moses, and the Prophets, accounting his booke among those which they call Cetaphum, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they lay Esdras and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their returne from Babylon. But first, that the booke of Daniel (I meane so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonically: secondly, that it was written by Daniel himselfe, and not by Esdras and the Seniors; we may assure our selues by testimonie of Councells, and Fathers. For in the Councell of Laodicea hold about the yeare of our Lord 368. after the death of Iouinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Councell three and fortie yeares, this booke of Daniel was received ciued, verified, and confirmed among the other Canonick Scriptures, as in the Epitomic of the same Councill it may be seene, and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witnesseth Eusebius in his Ecclesiasticall historie, the fourth booke, and five and twentieth chapter, so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonickall bookes vpon Origen, so doth Hilarius in his Preface vpon the Psalmes, and Epiphanius in his booke of Waights and Measures, &c. To these I may adde S. Hierome, Gregorie Nazianzen, and others. For the Hagiograph bookes or holy Writings the Iewes and Rabbines reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalms, Prouerbs, Iob, Canticles, Iuth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Hester, Ezra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Esdraus, that wrote this booke, Gods commandement vnto him by his Angell, to seale vp the same to the time appointed, is an answerable testimonie. Yea that which exceedeth all strength of other prooffe, our Saviour Christ who citeth no Apocriphall Scripture, in Mathew and Marke allengerh Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his nineteenth chapter. Further, in the first of Iohn, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth, verse the second. S. Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Reuelation is wholly an interpretation of *Daniel*s visions.

§. III.

That the 70. yeares of captiuitie are to be numbed from the destruction of Ierusalem; not from the migration of Iechonia.

Auing thus farre digressed, in maintaining that authoritie, which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now conuenient, that we retorne vnto the differences of opinion, concerning the beginning of these 70. yeares. Neither will I stand to trouble my selfe and others with laying open the grounds or weaknesse of that which Eusebius and some few namelesse Authors, haue sometimes held in this point, which is lately reuiued by Beralduis; but will forth-with enter into consideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers haue fo earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Four Kings of Iuda were carried away captiues to Babylon: First, Manasses; then Iehoiakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Iechonias, and with him Ezekiel: lastly, Zedekias, at which time the Citie and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these captiuities the beginning of the 70. yeares is referred by none that I haue read; to the second by few and with weake prooffe; to the third by very many and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel already cited, there is a strong argument gathered out of Ieremie, which may seeme to make the matter plaine. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with Iechonias, vseth these words. Thus saith the Lord: After 70. yeares be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and performe my good promise towards you, and cause you to returne to this place.

Ierem. 29. 10.

But it stands in neede with little reason that we should seeke the interpretation of a prophetic out of circumstances, when the prophetic is such as doth sufficiently expound it selfe. Ieremie had already, in the fourth yeare of Iehoiakim, denounced the iudgement of God against the Land, for the finnes and impoentencie of that obstinate people, in these wordes. Behold, I will send and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nabuchadnezzar, the King of Babel, my seruants, and will bring them against this Land, and against the inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and

and a continuall desolation. Noweouer, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladnesse, the voice of the Bridgroom, and the voice of the Bride, the noise of the mill-stones, and the light of the candle, and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serue the King of Babel 70. yeares. And when 70. yeares are expired, I will visit the King of Babel. Here wee see prescribed vnto the captiuitie the terme of 70. yeares, which were to commence, neither when the prophetic was vttered; nor when Iehoiakim, who then reigned, was taken by Nabuchadnezzar, nor yet in the time of Iechonias; but with the vaine desolation of the Citie, whereof Ieremie did againe giue notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliuerance before rehearsed. And so did the people vnderstand this prophetic, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70. yeares at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the Historie of Iuda, where it is said thus. They burnt the house of God, and brake downe the wall of Ierusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: And they that were left by the sword, carried he away to Babel, and they were seruants to him and to his sonnes, vntill the Kingdome of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of Ieremie, vntill the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the daies that she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70. yeares. But in the first yeare of Cyrus King of Persia (when the word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of Ieremie, was fulfilled) the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. Wee seldome find one peece of Scripture so precisely and plaineely expounded by another, as in this Prophetic, to haue afterwards bene the Subiect of alteration. For one can hardly deuise, how either the desolation could haue bene expressed more sensibly than it was by the Prophet, or the euent of the prophetic haue bene more exactly set downe, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it bee requisite that we bring more prooffe in so euident a case, the ninth chapter of Daniel yeelds testimonie sufficient, vnto this exposition of *Ieremie*s his prophetic, that Ierusalem was to lie wast 70. yeares. For in the first yeare of Darius the Medean, which was the last of the 70. Daniel obtained of God the deliuerance that had been promised by praier, which he made vpon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth vs in these wordes. In the first yeare of his reigne, I Daniel vnderstood by bookes the number of the yeares, whereof the Lord had spoken vnto Ieremie the Prophet, that hee would accomplish 70. yeares in the desolation of Ierusalem. So that how focuer the time of Daniel his owne captiuitie bee reckoned from the taking of Iehoiakim, and that the people carried away with Iechonia, did accompt, as well they might, the yeares of their owne captiuitie; yet with the general desolation of the Countrey, wherein were few or none of the Iudaes left remaining to inhabit, beganne in the nineteenth yeare of Nabuchadnezzar for the great captiuitie, which by Gods appointment continued vnto the end of 70. yeares. This I will not further seeke to proue, by the authoritie of Iosephus and others affirming the same; for as much as that which alreadye others haue bene produced, is enough to satisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrarie.

What Kings reigned in Babylon, during these 70. yeares of the captiuitie, and how long each of them did weare the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, for as much as neither their ad's were notable in the age wherein they liued, nor the length of their reignes, any way helpfull to the concordance of times, fore-going or succeeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seeme fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betooke himselfe to caſe, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdome, and for the honor of his Majestie, where it may seeme that he and his Heires kept a great ſtate, and did very little. The idle behaviour of the Aſſyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no lesse. For whereas vnder Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofes) they attempted, and finished, that hardie peece of worke, of winning the strong Citie of Tyre, by ioyning it vnto the continent, filling vp the deepe and broad channell of the Sea, diuiding it from the maine with a mole, or peece of earth, and other matter, the reparation wherof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders works in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach nearer to the enemy than their bowes would carrie, but were ready to turne their backs, as soone as any, though inferiour in numbers, aduenturing within the distance offered to charge them.

Now as their actions, from the end of Nebuchadnezzars warres, till the ruine of their Empire, were not worthe to bee recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and reigne of their severall Kings, unworthie of the great labour that hath in vaine beene taken in that businesse. For when it is granted, that the captiuitie of Juda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. yeares, we may as reasonably forbear to search into the particular continuance of two or three slouthfull Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children, living in the Egyptian servitude; resting satisfied in both with the generall assured summe.

Yet for as much as many have traualled in this businesse, vpon desire (as I take it) to approve the beginning and end of the 70. yeares, not only by the reignes of other Princes, ruling else-where, but by the times of the Aſſyrians themselves: I will not refuse to take a little paines in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I thinke, may best be held for likely, if the certaine truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting downe the yeares of their severall reignes. The first (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who meerey follow the authoritie of the Scriptures, without borrowing any helpe from others. These name only three Kings, Nebuchadnezzar, Eulmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither haue they only the silence of Daniel, who names none other to be their warrant, but the prophesie of Ieremie, precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very fame. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all would dispose of all, according to his owne will, and making it knowne that he had some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serue him, and his Sonne, and his Sonnes Sonnes, vntill the very time of his Land come also; then many Nations and great Kinges shall serue themselves of him. These wordes expresse the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeede I finde no other necessitie of quaqualification to be vsed herein than such as may grow out of mens desire to reconcile the Scriptures vnto profane authors. And this desire were not vnult, if the consent of all histories were on the one side, and the letter of the holy Text were single on the other side.

But contrarywise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, and the proofes of their different reports are so slender and vnufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not bin thus deliuered in Scriptures, but only set downe by some Author of equal credite with the rest, might verie well haue found and deferred as good beliefe, as anie of those things which they haue deliuered in this point. For some there are, who following Iosephus, deriue that Empire, as by descent from father to sonne, through five generations; beginning with Nabuchodonosor the great, and giuing to him 43. yeares, to Eulmerodach 18, to Nightsar the son of Eulmerodach 40, to Labofardach the sonne of Nightsar 9. moneths, and lastly to Balthasar (whom Iosephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his father) 17. yeares. And this opinion (saue that he forbears to reckon the yeares, and plainly calles Balthasar the sonne of Labofardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alledging Berosus, and Iosephus as a ſectator of Berosus for his Authors; though Berosus, as he is cited by Iosephus, report the matter farre otherwise. For he tells vs that Eulmerodach the sonne of Nabuchodonosor did raigne but 2 yeares, being for his wickednesse and lust, slaine by his sisters husband Nightsaroor, who occupied the kingdome after him 4 yeares, and left it to his owne sonne Labofardach, who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of 9 moneths slaine by such as were about him, and the kingdome giuen to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it vnto Cyrus after 17. yeares. This relation ill agrees with that of Iosephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number eyther of yeares, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, haue procured vnto them some authoritie, so that the names which they haue inserted, are taken as it were vpon trust. There is a third opinion, which makes the three last Kings brethren, and sonnes of Eulmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather beleue Xenophon, who saith that the last King of Babylon was immediate successeur to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholasticall Historie, who is founder of this opinion, placeth betweene him that took Ierusalem, and Eulmerodach, another Nabuchodonosor: plaine it is that he hath, out of any Historie sacred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we haue reason to follow him. Eusebius, Sulpicius, Seuerus, and Theodoret, vpon better ground, haue supposed, that Eulmerodach and Balthasar were brethren and sonnes of the great Nabuchodonosor. There is built on the fifth chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthasar (for of Eulmerodach there is none that cuer doubted) is often called Nabuchodonosor his sonne. And so common grew this explication, that Saint Hierome called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Ieremy before cited, prooues that Balthasar was not the sonne indeede, but the grand-child of that great conquerour, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Eastern languages, he was called the sonne.

Annius his Metaphyses hits very rightly the 70 yeares of captiuitie, giuing to Nabuchodonosor 45 yeares, to Eulmerodach 30 yeares, and to the three sonnes of Eulmerodach, nephewes of Nabuchodonosor 14 yeares; that is, to Reg-Assar the eldest sonne three yeares, to Lab-Assar Daeb the second sonne six yeares, and to Balthasar the third sonne five.

To this account agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole summe of 50 yeares, and in the number of generations, I haue sometime subscribed, as not daring to reiect an appearance of truth, vpon no greater reason than because the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not satisfie my selfe herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few such of the moderne Writers as deserve to be regarded, haue consented with this Metaphyses; and for that in making Balthasar to succeed

succede vnto his brother in the kingdome, and not vnto his father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whole Historie of the elder Cyrus in his Assyrian warre I can not lightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the king was at his drunken feast.

Seeing therefore diligently into all circumstances that might giue any light in this obscuritie, I found manifest proote, that the time allotted vnto Balthasar, by Annius his Metaphyses, was farre short of the truth, which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the 70 years hee pleased among the rest. For in the third year of Balthasar, Daniel saw a vision, after which he was sicke certaine dayes, but when hee rose vp he did the kings businesse: from which businesse, that hee did afterwards withdraw himselfe, and liue retired, so long that he was forgotten in the Court, it appears plainly, both by the many words which the old Queen vsed to set out his sufficiency, and by the King asking of him, when he came into his presence, whether he were Daniel. Now to thinke that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two years haue become worne out of remembrance, were in my iudgement a very strange conceipt, which rather than I would entertaine, I can well be contented, to thinke the whole storie (thus related) a part of Annius his impostures.

One of these reports of Iosephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by coniectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captiuitie being 70 years, and these yeares extending vnto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nebuchadnezzar, his sonne and grand-child, must haue reigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the yeares of these three descents, by inserting some, whose reignes might fill vp the whole continuance of the captiuitie, with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Eulmerodach and Balthasar, ioyned vnto the yeares following the nineteene of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Ierusalem was laid desolate) are nothing euen.

Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the yeares of Eulmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18 yeares giuen to him by Iosephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should bee read and numbred 28 yeares, and the two yeares that Berosus hath allowed to Eulmerodach should be written 23; in the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2), and in the later there should haue bin added the figure of (3) to that of (2): this granted (to wit) that Eulmerodach reigned 28 yeares, whereof five together with his father, and 23 after his death, and the same number of 23 added to the 25 which Nabuchodonosor liued after the destruction of Ierusalem, make 49, then 4 yeares of Niglissar according to Berosus, 9 moneths of Labassardach his sonne, and 17 yeares of Nabonidus or Balthasar make vp the number of 70 yeares to the first of Cyrus. But whether by error in figures, or in words, the numbers be utterly mistaken, in all copies extant; vpon how weak a foundation do they build, who haue nothing to helpe them, save onely the bare names of two vnkowne Kings, found in Authors manifestly corrupted, and such as if they had beene entirely extant, were not worthe, to haue that place of Ieremie called into dispute, in regard of their authoritie?

§. V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and reignes of the Babylonian Kings.

Ther suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, so I purposely forbore to rehearse, as falling vnder the same answer. That of Ioseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deserving to be considered apart from the rest. He giues to Nabuchadnezzar 44 yeares, to Eulmerodach 2, to Belsazar, 5; and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the the 19 of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Ierusalem was destroyed, vnto the time of Cyrus he accompteth onely 59 yeares; beginning (as many do) the captiuitie 11 yeares sooner, from the transportation of Iechonia. But hereof enough hath beene said already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running betweene the 19 of Nabuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Chaldean Empire: wherein if he haue erred, then is all further inquisition fruitles.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzar's raigne, I shall hereafter vpon better occasion deliuer my opinion. The time which he giues to Eulmerodach is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berosus than with the Scriptures. For vice find in Ieremy, that this Eulmerodach in the first of his raigne, shewing all fauour to Iechonia, did among other things take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eate bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was a continuall portion giuen him of the King of Babel, every day a certaine, all the dayes of his life vntill he died. The very found of these words (which is more to be esteemed, than the authoritie of Berosus, were he perfectly extant) imports a farre longer time than 2 yeares, wherein Iechonia, vnder this gentle Prince, enioyed the comfort sent by God, whose commandement he had obeyed in yielding himselfe to Nabuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Iechonia did liue it can not be proued; but plaine it is hereby that all his remaining daies he did not eate bread before this King. Now that he liued not so short a while after this as 2 yeares, it is more than likely, for he was but 55 yeares old when he was set at liberty, hauing been 37 yeares in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18 yeares; after which time it seemes plaine that hee begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zorobabel, who is said to haue bene but a young man, and one of Darius his Pages three score yeares after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it selfe.

Of Belsazar, to whom Scaliger giues the next five yeares naming him also Labassardach, I should wonder why he calles him Nabuchadnezzar's daughters sonne, we reitnot that herein I find him very carefull to helpe out Berosus, by shifting in his Chrysolosorum, as husband to Nabuchadnezzar's daughter, and Protector of his son foure of these yeares; by which meanes thereremains about one yeare to Belsazar alone, agreeing neerely with the 9 moneths assigned by Berosus to the sonne of Niglissar. But Ieremy hath told vs that it was to Nabuchadnezzar, and to his son, and to his sonnes sonne (not to his daughters sonne) that the Empire was promised: which difficultie if Scaliger could not helpe, it was well done of him, to passe it ouer with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these (whome others, desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scriptures) haue iudged to be all one with Balthasar, is by Scaliger thought to bee Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firme Berosian: for Berosus makes him of the same stocke or race a Babylonian. I speake not this to disgrace the trauaile of that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and iudgement, that he was not so wedded to any author, as affected with the loue of truth) but to shew that he himselfe hauing in some points disliked those Writers, whome in generall he approoueth, might with greater reason haue wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that hee whome Berosus calles Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First, the phrase of Scripture, which signifies vnto vs, that Darius tooke the kingdome, not saying that hee wanne it by force of armes; Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Originall, so or of the Greeke translation, which expressing no force of armes doth only signifie, that Darius tooke or recieued the kingdome: I see no reason why we should thereupon inferre, that the next king entred by Election: seeing Daniel relateth not the meanes and circumstances of Balthasar's death, but onely the swift accomplishment of his owne prophetic. Neither could it indeede haue properly bene said (if Daniel me had cared to vie the most expresse termes) that Darius of the Medes breaking into the citie, did win the kingdome; seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, through by his forces, and to his vie. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his workes printed at Basilie, in the year 1559. I finde only thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Apollonius. That Nabuchodonosor was more valiant than Hercules; that hee subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Affrica as farre as to the Armenians; and that as the Chaldeans report, being returned into his kingdome, and rapt with a diuine furie, he cried with a loud voice. O Babylonians, I foretold yee of a great calamitie that should come vpon you, which neither Bel, nor any of the Gods should avert: There will come a Persian, halfe an Asie, that shall bring slavery vpon yee: and that, this and the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I beleue little or nothing, sauing that Nabuchodonosor knew before hand, that his Empire should be translated, as Dauid had foretold from the golden head, to the silver breast. But that he wan all Africa or Lybia, I hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaliger copie of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells vs that Nabuchodonosor wanne both Affrike and Spaine, I beleue the fragment so much the lesse: and am as little moued with the authoritie of it, where it calles a Median the pride and confidence of the Assyrians, as where it tells of Nabuchodonosor his owne vanishing away. Indeed that same title of halfe an Asie, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable as cunningly forged out of Apollonius his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mede, because his parentage was more noble on the mothers side, than on the fathers; as Achilles are begotten by Aster vpon Mars. And thus much in answer of the two principall foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the conninctie and coherence which it hath within it selfe, I easily allow it. But this proues nothing, for more fictions haue not wanted these commendations: neither can any man beleue that one so iudicious, industrious and deeply learned as Ioseph Scaliger, would ouer-shoote himselfe in setting downe repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeal. And herein it seemes that Scaliger, well knowing his owne sufficiency, hath bene little careful to satisfie men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the prophetic of Daniel were true, that the kingdome of Balthasar was diuided, and giuen to the Medes and Persians, either wee must thinke that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else wee must bethinke our selues what Persian it might be that shared the kingdome with him. For it is not more certaine, that Balthasar lost his life and kingdome, than that his kingdome was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to haue bene Darius, they should be thought to haue done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords ouer all the subiect provinces, in somuch that the Greeke Historians did commonly call those warres which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made vpon Greece, The warres of the Medes. Yet to cleare this point, euen Daniel himselfe resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, vnto a Ramme with two hornes, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chaldeans were not to haue bene condemned by Ioseph Scaliger, for maintaining vpon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes, was partner with Cyrus in his victories, and not a Chaldean King by him subdued. Neither was Ioseph to be the lesse regarded for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his nephew Cyrus, though herein hee varied from Berosus, and others, whose authoritie elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Ioseph had no reason to beleue any mans faith or knowledge of those times, halfe so well as Daniel, whom I beleue that hee vnderstoode as farre as was needfull in this case. Lawfull it was for him to allegat all Authors that had any mention, though vnperfect of the same things things that were contained in the writings of the Jewes, to whose histories thereby he procured reputation in the Roman world, where they were strangers, and might seeme fabulous. Euen so doe Eusebius, and other Christian Writers, willingly embrace the testimonies of heathen bookes making for the truth in some particulars yet will they not therefore be tried in generally by the selfe same Euboeike philosophers, but leaue them where they are against the truth; as Iosephus in this case hath left Berosus. And thus much I thought it meete to lay of Scaliger opinion in this point; holding neuerthelesse in due regard his learning and iudgement, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had bin very great.

§. VI.

What may be held as probable of the Persons and Times of NABUCHODONOSOR his successors.

It now remains that I freely acknowledge mine owne weaknes, who cannot find how the 70. yeares of captiuitie are to be diuided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I finde that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already is rehearsed, beill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truly say with Peregrinus, that we ought liberally to pardon those whose feeble haue failed them in the slipperie wayes of Chronologie, wherein both learning and diligence are subiect to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulness, or heedlesse reckoning. Yet will I adventure to deliuer my opinion, wherein the iudgement of Lyra and others (holding those onely to haue reigned ouer Chaldeans, whose Names are found in the Scriptures) appears more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Coniectures before rehearsed. Not that I will take vpon me to defend Lyra his Coniectures, when hee supposeth by Neglisar and Labosardach to be meant the same persons which are called in Scriptures Eutimerodach and Balthasar (for this can by no good colour be maintained) but onely to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to haue occupied the whole time of twenty yeares. First therefore let vs consider the reigne of Nabuchodonosor, in whose eighteenth yere Ierusalem was taken and sacked, but in his nineteenth layd vnto desolate.

Most of Writers haue giuen to him 43. yeares of reigne, following therein Berosus. There are who haue added one yeare more, and some haue made it vp 45. To dispute about the certaintie were needlesse: for in theu by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall heare the certaine truth.

Manifest it is, that the 19. yeare of Nabuchodonosor, is ioyned with the 11. of Zedekias, as also that his eight yeare, was the first yere of Iechonias his captiuitie, the reigne of Zedekias occupied all the meane space being of 11. yeares. This is generally agreed vpon, so that it needes no further proofes: As for the beginning of his successor Eutimerodach, it was in the feuen and thirtieth yere of Iechonias his captiuitie; so that Nabuchodonosor after his eight yere (which was the first of Iechonias his bondage) reigned 35. whole yeares, and peraduenture a good part of the fixe and thirtieth, forasmuch as Iechonias was enlarged with so great fauour, not vntill the end of the yeare. Substrating therefore out of these foure and forty, which Nabuchodonosor reigne did wel-neare occupie, those eightene yeares of his which passed away before the captiuitie of Iuda, and ruine of the citie, we haue remaining fixe and twenty yeares of the fuentie, that were almost wholly spent, when his sonne began to reigne.

It is now to be considered how the remainder of the fuentie yeares were diuided betweene the kings ruling in Babylon vntill the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I said before) than greatly needfull: the whole summe being certaine, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were were slouthfull Princes. Neither can any man the more iustly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70. yeares, for that the distribution of some part of them is only coniectural; seeing that none who giues any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both vnlkely and desperate coniectures in diuiding them. I will therefore be bold to doe as others haue done, knowing well before hand, that whosoever shall discouer my error, must doe mee the pleasure (which I could rather will in a case more materiall) of making mee to vnderstand the truth.

Ierem. 27. 7.

Of the foure and fortie yeares remaining in accompt at Nabuchadnezzar's death, we are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then hauing authoritie good enough to warrant vs from blame of presumption, in giuing vs seuentene yeares to Balthasar, we finde left in our handes to bestow vpon Eutimerodach sixe and twentie yeares. Of the yeare belonging to Darius the Mede I haue already spoken what I thought sufficient, in deluering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this captiuitie. That Balthasar did raigne seuentene yeares, we haue the authoritie of Iosephus, before cited in expresse wordes; We haue also the generall consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berosus his Nabonidus, who raigned so long; and Balthasar to haue bene one. But nothing moueth mee so much to beleue this Tradition, as first those euident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third yeare of Balthasar he followed the Kings businesse, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his raigne, (a proofe sufficient of no lew yeares, passing vnder this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniels employments tooke end either that yeare or the next.) Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his warres against the Assyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans father, and being alwaies prosperous, could hardly haue occupied any longer time, though we make large allowance to his deedes in the lower Asia, which tell out in the mid-way: I haue already shewed, that there appeares in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the raigne of Eutimerodach was not short: and that men of great iudgment haue found it most probable that hee was King three and twentie yeares. More, I thinke, they would haue allowed him, had not the desire of satisfying Berosus caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to be wished, that bookes of such antiquitie, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeld in many darke passages of Antiquitie. I will yet confesse, that were his workes neuer so excellent, and in all things else vnquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend vnto him in some one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemy. How much lesse ought I to obey a broken fragment of his, containing only seven or eight lines, and part euen of the title corrupted, as they beleue that follow him in the rest? The Scriptures haue told vs that God gaue the Empire to Nabuchadnezzar, to his sonne, and to his sonnes sonne: How long each of them held it, we finde not expressely; yet would we gladly know it of Berosus, or of any other that would reach vs prouided alwaies, that helping vs in a particularitie, he destroy not thereby the generall truth. More wordes are needlesse. It is enough to say with others, that Berosus or Iosephus who cited him, hath been wronged by the carelesnesse of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to erre in writing two for sixe and twentie, as for three and twentie, or perhaps more easie. For the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5. signifying 6. hath a nearer resemblance of 8 than stands for 2. than hath 7. which is vsed for 3. So that the numerall notes 8 5 expressing 26. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not vnusall, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seeme not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in 8 7 standing for 23. I doe not well perceiue. As for the arithmetically figures now in vsd, they were were long after the time of Iosephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore doe not appertaine to this businesse; vnlesse we should ghesse that his workes were corrupted in that vnlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanitie, but in a sort wholly giuen ouer to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serue to make Berosus our friend, so let it be; if not, I will not purchase the fauour of his authoritie, by forsaking Ieremie and Daniel, when they seeme his opposites.

§. VII.

Of the victories which NABUCHODONOSOR obtained betwene the destruction of Ierusalem and conquest of Egypt.

With what actions this time of 70. yeares was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few haue written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peradventure haue bene some cause that the time it selfe was, and is yet sought to be abridged, as not hauing left sufficient matter to witness the length of it. But by such an argument we might as well denie to many people euen their being. For euery Nation (I know not whom I should except) betwene the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slouthfull age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no maruaile, if the posteritie of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things readie to their hand, which their hearts could haue desired, betooke themselves to their ease and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall sonnes of greedie fathers, their owne wildome greater, which knew how to enioy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their daies in the restlessle trauaile of purchasing. I though indeede the raigne of Nabuchodonosor was so diuided, that his youthfull and stronger yeares hauing bene exercised in victorious armes, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthy labours past. The nineteenth yeare of his raigne it was, when destroying utterly the great and mightie Citie of Ierusalem, hee enriched himselfe with abundance of spoile, and terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearefull example. From that time forward, vntill his three and twentieth yeare, he laboured in the conquest of those adioyning Regions, which God had exposed vnto his sword, and commanded to ware his yoke; namely the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrans, Sicionians, and Egyptians, though some of these were already become his followers, and serued vnder him, when Ierusalem was beaten downe and burnt. But the Tyrans whose Citie was founded on an Island, safe enough from any danger of a Land-Armie, and whose fleet was so strong that they needed not to feare any enemy at Sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their neighbour Cities, nor with the obstinate resolution of this mightie Prince, employing all his power to their subuersion.

That the Citie of Tyre was rather well pleased than any way discouraged with the fall of Ierusalem (which had held the same course that Tyrus did, and endured all that might be in the same quarrell against the common enemy) it appeares by the wordes which Ezechiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyrus; Anna, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned vnto mee; for seeing she is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at the length, euen in the nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonosor, that great worke of his whereof we haue already spoken, beganne to appeare about the waters, and threaten them with ineuitable mischief.

But those prophecies of Ieremie and of Eliay, which appoint vnto this desolation of Tyre the same terme of 70. yeares, that was prescribed vnto the raigne of the Chaldeans, doe plainly shew, that hee followed Ierusalem, the same nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonosor, in the same, or a very like: fortune. The particularities, which doubtlesse were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner vterly lost. Thus much wee finde, That the Citizens perceiuing the Towne vnable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fled into the Isle of Cyprus. Neuertheless it comes that this euasion serued only the principall men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer sort vnto the enemies furie. For not onely such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the sword; but the like execution was done in the Irees, into which with excellent labour the Assyrian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus NABUCHODONOSOR caused his Armie to serue a great service against TYRE, wherein every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare, yet had he no wages, nor his Armie; but was faine to rest contented with the Honor of having destroyed that Citie, which in all mens iudgements had bene held invincible.

The destruction of these two great and powerfull Cities, hauing made the name of the Chaldeans dreadfull in the eares of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonosor vsed the aduantage of that reputation which hee had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable with lesse paine. The Kingdome of Egypt was the marke at which he aimed; a Countrey so abounding in all riches and pleasures, that it might well haue tempted any Prince, finding himselfe strong enough, to seeke occasion of quarrell against it; and so farre an enemy to the Crowne of Babylon, that had it bene poorer, yet either it must haue bene subdued, or the conquest of Syria could ill haue bene established. Neuertheless it was needfull that before hee entred into this businesse, the Countreys adiacent should be reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his deuotion, or at least be vnable to worke him any displeasure. And herein the decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For the people of Alab, Ammon, Leam, Damascus, Kedar, Hazor, and other adioyning Regions whom God for their sins had condemned to fall vnder the Babylonian sword, were such, as regarding only their owne gaine had some of them, like Raues, followed the Chaldean Armie, to feede vpon the carcases that fell by the crueltie thereof; others taking aduantage of their Neighbours miseries, occupied the Countreys which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor; all of them thinking, that when the Assyrian had satished his furie, he should be faine to forsake those desolate parts, and leaue the possession to those that could lay hand vpon it. Particularly the Edomites and Phisijans had shewed much malice to the Iewes when their Citie was taken. What good fruitie they had done to the Chaldeans, I finde not; if they did any, it is likely to haue been with reference to their owne purposes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to reioyce at the fall of Ierusalem, but presently they entred vpon the Countrey of Gad, and rooke possession, as if not the Assyrian, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceiue what other ground that practise had of Basal King of the Ammonites, when hee sent Jsmael, a Prince of the blood of Iuda, to murder Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Governour ouer those that remained in Israel, and to carrie captiue into the Ammonites Countrey the people that abode in Mizpab, than a desire of embroiling Nabuchodonosor with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his owne Countrey, and abandon those wasted Lands to himselfe and others, for whom they lay conveniently. Such or the like policie the Nababes did exercise; whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, and their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right.

All these Nations had the art of rauening, which is familiar to such as liue or border vpon deserts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the vttermost cunning of their theueth wits. But Nabuchadnezear did cut asunder all their deuices by sharpe and suddaine warre, ouerwhelming them with vnexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the prophecies of Eley, Ieremie, and Ezechiel, who fore-told, with little difference of wordes, the greatnesse and swiftnesse of the miserie serie that should come vpon them. With which of them he first began, I finde not; it seemes that Moab was the last which felt his hand: for so doe many good Authors interpret the prophecie of Eley, threatening Moab with destruction after three yeares, as hauing reference to the third yeare following the ruine of Ierusalem; the next yeare after it being spent in the Egyptian expedition. This is manifest, that all the principall Townes in these Regions were burnt, and the people slaine, or made slaues, few excepted, who being preferred by flight, had not the courage to returne to their habitations ouer-hastily; much lesse to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor, but liued as miserable out-lawes, or at least oppressed wretches, vntill the end of the seuentie yeares, which God had prescribed vnto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Iuda.

¶ VIII.

That Egypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning slaine by NABUCHODONOSOR, contrary to the opinion of most Authors: who following HERODOTVS and DIODORVS, relate it otherwise.

When by a long course of victorie Nabuchodonosor had brought into subiection all the Nations of Syria, and the bordering Arabians, in such wise that no enemy to himselfe, nor friend of the Egyptian, was left at his back, that might giue impediment vnto his proceeding, or take aduantage of any misfortune; then did hee forth-with take in hand the conquest of Egypt himselfe, vpon which those other Nations had formerly bene depending. Of this expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets Eley, Ieremie, and Ezechiel, haue written so plainly, that I hold it altogether needlesse to looke after more authoritie, or to cite for proofe halfe of that which may be alleaged out of these. Neuertheless wee finde many and good Authors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to straine these prophecies with vnreasonable diligence vnto such a sense, as giues to Nabuchodonosor little more than the honour of hauing done some spoile in Egypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affaires. So preposterous is the delight which many men take in the meanes and second helps conducing to their purpose, that often times they preferre the Commentator before the Author; and to vp-hold a sentence giuing testimonie to one cause, doe carelesly ouertrow the historie it selfe, which thereby they sought to haue maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Egypt, which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former booke; but that which they haue spoken of Apries, was purposely referred vnto this place. Herodotus affirmes that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein hee telleth not (vnlesse we should vnderstand that he was victorious in the Warre which he is said to haue made vpon Tyrrus and Sidon) that hee reigned sixe and twentie yeares, and was finally taken and put to death by his owne subiects; who did set vp Amasis, as King, which preuailed against him. The rebellion of the Egyptians hee imputeth to a great losse which they receiued in an expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole Armie was destroyed. This calamitie the people of Egypt thought to bee well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous expedition, with a purpose to haue them consumed, that so hee might with greater securitie raigne ouer such as staid at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of such as were slaine, rebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appeale the tumult; but Amasis became Captaine of the rebells, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land consented vnto this new Election; whereby Apries was druen to truit vnto his forraine Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom hee kept in readinesse thirte thousand good Souldiours that fought valiantly for him, but were vanquished by the great numbers of the Aegyptian forces, amounting vnto two hundred and fiftie thousand, which were all by birth and education, men of warre. Apries himselfe being taken prisoner, was gently intreated by Amasis for a while, vntill the Aegyptians, exclaiming vpon him as an extreme enemy to the land, got him deliuered into their hands, and strangled him, yet gaue him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Herodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus neerely agrees, telling vs that Apries did vanquish the Cyprians and Phenicians in battell at Sea, tooke by force and demolished Sidon, wanne the other towns of Phœnicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally perished as is before rehearsed, when he had reigned two and twentie yeares. This authoritie were enough (yet not more than enough) to informe vs of Apries his historie, if greater authoritie did not contradict it. But the destruction of Aegypt by the Babylonians, fore-told by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compell our belief, than haue the traditions of Aegyptian Priests (which the Greece Historians followed) and greater probabilities to perswade those that looke only into humane reasons. For Esay prophesied long before of the shameful captiuitie of the Aegyptians, whom the King of Assur should carry away naked, yong and old, in such wise that the Iewes who fled vnto them for deliuerance from the Assyrian, should be ashamed of their owne vaine confidence in men so vnable to defend themselves.

But Ezekiel and Jeremy, as their prophecies were nearer to the time of execution, so they handled this Argument more precisely. For Ezekiel telleth plainly, that Aegypt should be given to Nabuchodonosor, as wages for the seruice which hee had done at Tyre: Also he recounteth particularly all the chiefe Cities in Aegypt, saying, That these by name should be destroyed and goe into captiuitie; yea, that Pharaoh and all his armie should beaine by the sword. Wherefore it must needs be a violent expolition of these Prophecies, which by applying the issue of such threatnings to an insurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in Aegypt, than change of the Kings person, wherein Amasis did succed vnto Apries, by force indeede, but by the vniforme consent of all the people. Certainly, if that notable place of Jeremie, wherein he foretelleth how the Iewes in Aegypt should see Pharaoh Hophra deliuered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had bene, were to bee referred vnto the time of that rebellion whereof Herodotus hath spoken, as the generall opinion hath ouer-ruled it, then was it vainely done of the same Prophet (which God forbid that any Christian should thinke, seeing he did it by the appointment of God himselfe) to hide in the clay of a Bricke-hill, those very stones, vpon which the throne of Nabuchodonosor should be set, and his pavilion spread. Yea then was that prophetic no other than false, which expressed the end of Pharaohs thus. Behold, I will visite the common people of Noe, and Pharaoh and Aegypt, with their Gods and their Kings, euen Pharaoh, and all that trust in him: and I will deliuer them into the hands of those that seeke their lues, and into the hands of Nabuchodonosor King of Babel, and into the hands of his seruants. The clearness of this prophesy being such as could not but refuse that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would say to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greece Historians. Wherefore looking vpon Iunius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to be Amasis, and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Aegyptian Priests had notably deluded Herodotus with lies, coined vpon a vaine-glorious purpose of hiding their owne disgrace and bondage. And surely it may well be thought, that the historie of Nabuchodonosor, was better knowne to the Iewes whom it concerned, than to the Greekes that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather ther belieue Iosephus, reporting that Nabuchodonosor in the three & twentieth yeare of his raigne, and the fift yeare of the destruction of Ierusalem, did conquest Aegypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his stead, than Herodotus or Diodore; who being meere strangers to this businesse had no great reason to labour in searching out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would tell them. Now if setting aside all aduantage of authoritie, we should only consider the relations of Iosephus, and of the Greece Historians, as either of them might be verified of it selfe by apparant circumstances, without reflecting vpon the Iewes Prophets or Aegyptian Priests; me thinks the death of Apries can no way be approved as hauing bene wrought by consent of the people, but affords great matter of suspition; yea though no man had opposed the reports of Herodotus and Diodore. For the great loue and honour which the Aegyptians did beare vnto their Kings, is notorious by the vniforme testimonie of all others that haue handled the matters of that Country, as well as by the report of Diodore himselfe. How then can wee thinke it probable, that Apries hauing wonne great victories, did for one only losse fall into the hatred of all his people, or which may serue to perswade vs, that a King of Aegypt would seeke, or so demean himselfe, that he might be thought to seeke the destruction of his naturall subiects? As for that armie of thirte thousand souldiours Carians and Ionians, which the King of Aegypt whom Amasis tooke prisoner, is said to haue kept for his defence: doth it not argue that hee was a forraier, and one that armed himselfe against the Aegyptians, wilhing them few and weak; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as assuredly their owne, as the strength of their owne bodies? It were more tedious than a nic way needfull, to vse all Arguments that might be alleaded in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amasis, who fought to haue kept him alieue, doth intimate that hee was some forren Governour, not a naturall Prince; otherwise the people would haue desired to saue his life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disprove that opinion, whereunto I should not haue yielded, though it had stood vpon great apparence of truth, considering that the voyce of Truth it selfe cries out against it; but leaue the circumstances prouing the Conquest of Aegypt by Nabuchodonosor to be obserued, where due occasion in course of the storie following shall present them.

§. IX.

How Egypt was subdued and held by NABUCHADONOSOR.

It is a great losse, that the generall Historie of the World hath suffered, by the spoile and waite which Time hath made of those Monuments, that should haue preserved the memorie of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mightie Prince Nabuchodonosor, wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now vncertaine. That his victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Prouinces, were such as did more enlarge his dominion, than all his former warres had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel: who reckons vp in his thirtieth chapter (besides the whole Country of Aegypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may seeme to haue reached out into Amerina, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these warres are in a manner vtterly lost; but that the victory was easie and swift, any man shall find, who will take the pains to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I thinke worthy of more particular oblation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Booke) thought himselfe safe in Aegypt by the well defended situation of his Country, did very vnwisely in suffering his enemies to sweepe the way cleane vnto his owne doores, by consuming all his friends and adherents in Syria. For as the labour of this businesse did more harden than weare the Chaldean army, so the confidence and vaine securitie of the Egyptians, relying vpon the difficult passages which the enemy was to make through the Arabian deserts, and the much aduantage which the great ruler of Nilus would afford vnto themselves, did litle auaile them in prouision for the warre, and much alonith them (as may iustly be thought) in the time of execution: it being vually scene, that the hearts of men faile, when those helps faile, in which they had repofed more confidence than in their owne vertue. Hitherto the kingdom of Egypt had flourished vnder the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand five hundred and foure score 10 yeares; but from this time forward it remained fortie yeares without a King, vnder the subiection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recover by litle and litle the former greatnes, yet so, that it was neuer dreadful vnto others, God hauing said of that people, I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath bene said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the wife, I am the sonne of the unaccused Kings; and whereas he had vaunted, The River is mine, and I haue made it; the Princes of Egypt now became fooles, the river failed them, the King himselfe was taken and slaine, and that ancient linage quite extinguished. This came to passe in the first year after the destruction of Ierusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nabuchadnezzar, at which time (saith Iosephus) Hee slew the King then reigning, placed an other in his roome, and carried captiues thence to Babylon, the lewes whom hee found in that Countrey. Now concerning the time which Iosephus giues vnto this businesse, and the businesse it selfe, I haue already shewed, that it is warranted by all the prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Ierusalem, and carrying away those vnto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruines of that great city, which was in the fame three and twentieth year of NEBUCHADNEZZAR, is not vnprobably thought by good authors to haue bene at the returne from this Egyptian expedition. But whereas Iosephus tells vs that there was another King put in the roome of Apries by Nabuchadnezzar, we must vnderstand, that he was onely a Viceroy, and not (as some haue mistaken it) thinke that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his raigne in the three and twentieth of Nabuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant vnto the Prophecies before alledged, as to all Chronologie and historie. Some there are, which to helpe this inconuenience imagine that there were two successively bearing the name of Amasis; others that there were two Apries, the one flaine by Nabuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is only about a name, it being once granted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was deputed of life and kingdom by the Assyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceiue, that Apries of whom the Greeke Historians wrote, could not be the depute of Nabuchadnezzar, seeing that hee was the Grand-child of Pharaoh Necho, and made warre (as they report) vpon the Phenicians, who were, before the Egyptians, become subiect vnto the Crowne of Babylon. I might adde perhappes, that he whom Nabuchadnezzar left as Gouernour of Egypt, was more likely to haue had some Chaldean or Assyrian, than Egyptian name; vnlesse wee should thinke that hee had bene a traitor to his naturall Prince, and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantship of the Countrey: about which it were but frivolous to dispute. Thus much in briefe we ought to beleue, that Nabuchodonosor made an absolute Conquest of Egypt; that he was not so foolish as to giue it away, any man may guesse, that he appointed one to rule the Countrey, it is consequent vnto the former, and hath authoritie of Iosephus; that this Gouernour (or some successeur of his) was afterwards taken and slaine by Amasis, I see probability enough to perswade my selfe, and yet can well be content, that others vie their libertie, and beleue what they list. As for the armie which this Egyptian King Apries is supposed to haue kept of Ionians and Carians; I hold them to be none other than the garrisons of mercenarie soldours which were left by the Assyrian for the guard of his Viceroy, and custodie of the new subdued Prouince: as likewise the company returning from Cyrene and Barce, who together with the friends of such as were slaine in that expedition, remembered before out of the Greeke Historians, depofed and slew Apries, I take them to haue bene the Egyptian fugitives which then recovered their owne Countrey. Sure it is that this Prophecie of Ezekiel was verified, At the end of fortie yeares will I gather the Egyptians from the people wherethey were scattered, and I will bring againe the captiuitie of Egypt, and will cause them to returne into the land of Pathros into the land of their habitation, and they shall be there a small kingdom. If the Egyptian Priests alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amasis his obtaining the kingdom, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they deuised matter that had no shadow of truth, onely to keepe the Greekes from knowledge of their Countries disgrace; then are they litle to be regarded, since we know the truth with them.

Of the sundry accounts drawne from sundry acts of NEBUCHADNEZZAR and of the destruction of Ninuie, by him; and the time of which action is vncertaine.

THese victories brought the greatnes of the Assyrian Empire to the fall, and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzars raigne in sundry places of Scripture. To speake any more of the questions arising about the supputation of Nebuchadnezzars his times, might seeme to be the ouer-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captiue in the third year of Iehoiakims raigne (which ranne along with some part of Nebuchadnezzars fifty yeare) and was kept in diet three yeares more, before he was brought into the Kings presence; it could not be the second of Nabuchadnezzars kingdom, wherein he interpreted the forgotten dreame of the great image, foretelling the succellion of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The same or the like may be said of diuers places which referre sundry matters vnto their set yeares; as that of Ezekiel before-cited, where hee fore-tells that Egypt should be giuen in reward for the seruice done before Tyrrus, dating his prophecie in the seuen and twentieth yeare; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth yeare: for these yeares held no dependance vpon either the beginning of Nabuchadnezzars kingdom, or of his Empire, nor yet vpon any of the captiuities, but had reference to some memorable action, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easie to be found, nor worth the labour of vncertaine search.

Of any warre made by Nabuchadnezzar after such times as hee returned from the Conquest of Egypt I doe not reade: excepting that against Ninuie, the destruction whereof was fore-tolde by the Prophet Naum. Ninuie had long before bene taken by Merodach (as in due place hath bene shewed) and together with the rest of Assyria made subiect to Babylon. Yet was it left vnder a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldean, as Iehoiakim & Zedekiah tributary Kings of Iuda had done, tasted likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Ninuie followed the Conquest of Egypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Naum the Prophet made betwene this Citie that was to fall, and the Citie of No in Egypt that was fallen already. But how long after this came to passe, it is (me thinks) vnpossible to find out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronologie, that it was in the first of Nabuchadnezzars raigne; the place of Naum last cited is enough to disproue it. Whereas it is referred by some vnto the first of his Monarchie, which beganne at the end of the Egyptian warres; the whole Prophecie of Naum which went betwene the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time intercurrent;

current. So that to enquire into the very yeare of this destruction, or other circumstances of the Warre, whether menaged by Nabuchodonosor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like vnto the vaine curiositie of Tyberius Caesar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hebebor to the like idle paines which he should take, who would seeke to learne what woman that Uzzab Queen of Amurru was, whose wofull captiuitie the same Prophet Naum likewise did fore-tell.

Of the later time of Nervchadnezzar; his buildings, madnesse, and death.

DEN. 4. 27.

F the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I thinke there are no monuments extant; save those which we finde among the prophecies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great workes at Babylon, wherewith he pleased himselfe so well that he brake out into these glorious wordes. Is not this great Babel that I have built for the house of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my maiestie? Surely if those things be true that are by Iosephus rehearsed of him out of Berosus and Megasthenes, hee might well delight himselfe with the contemplation of such goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that besides other stately workes, he raised those huge arches wherewith were borne vp the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the aire, and equalling the tops of Mountaines; which most sumptuous frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Assyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to haue bene reared, and finished in fiftene daies.

But of all this, and other his magnificence, we finde little else recorded, than that (which indeede is most profitable for vs to consider) his ouer-valuing of his owne greatnesse abased him vnto a condition, inferiour to the poorest of men. And not vnderstandedly fell these iudgements of God vpon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not only with many victories, and much happinesse in his owne life, but with a discouerie of things to come after him, yea and had approued the certainty of his dreame, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memorie, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet: hee neuertheless became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had sene and acknowledged, that hee caused a golden Imago to be set vp and worshipped: ordaining a cruell death as reward vnto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was vnto them repugnant to the law of him that is the King of Kings. Hereof S. Hierome hath well noted; zelus obliuio veritatis, et qui dandum seruum Dei quasi Deum adorauerat, nunc statuum sibi fieri iubet, et ipse quasi Deus in statu adoratur: A haste forgetfulness of the truth, that hee was so lately had worshipped. (DANIEL) the seruant of God, as if hee had bene God himselfe, should now command a Statua to be erected vnto himselfe, wherein himselfe might be worshipped as God. From this impietie pleased God to reclaim him, by the strange and wonderfull deliuerie of those blessed Saints out of the fierie furnace; who being throwne into it bound, for refusing to commit Idolatrie, were assisted by an Angell; preserved from all harme of the fire; loosened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious wordes, and restored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his image he had violated. Yet this deuotion of Nabuchadnezzar was not so rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit answerable to his hastie zeale. Therefore was hee forewarned by God in a dreame of the terrible iudgement hanging ouer his head, which Daniel expounding, aduised him to brake off his sinne by righteousnesse, and his iniquitie by mercie towards the poore, that there might be an healing of his error. Hereby it seems that that iniustice and crueltie were the faults, for which hee was threatened, but this threatening sufficed not vnto his reformation. For that so great a Monarch should be driuen from among men (according to the tenor of the dreame and interpretation) yea compelled to dwell with the beasts of the field, and made to cate graisse as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in mans iudgement, that easily it might be thought an idle dreame, and much more easily be forgotten at the yeares end. One whole yeares leisure to repent was giuen to this haughtie Prince: which respite of the execution may seeme to haue bred in him a forgetfulness of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelue moneths, walking in the roiall Palace of Babel, hee was so ouer-joyed and transported with a vaine contemplation of his owne seeming happinesse, that without all feare of Gods heauie iudgement pronounced against him, hee vttered those losse wordes before rehearsed, in vaunting of the maiestieall workes which he had reared, as well belcoming his maiestieall person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voice from heauen, telling him that his Kingdome was departed from him, rehearsed ouer vnto him the sentence againe, which was fulfilled vpon him the very same houre.

That Salomon and many other Princes and great ones, haue taken delight in their owne buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that euer I haue read of any, that were punished for reioicing in workes of this kinde (though it is hard in ioy, or any passion of the minde to keepe a iust measure) excepting only this Nabuchadnezzar.

The like may be said of Dauid: for other (and some very goodly) Kings haue multiplied all their forces to the very last man; but few or none haue bene knowne to haue bene punished as Dauid was. Surely I not only hold it lawfull to reioyce in those good things, wherewith God hath blessed vs; but a note of much vnthankfulness to entertaine them with a fullen and vnseeling disposition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obscure cloudes, hindring the influence of that blessed light, which clarifies the soule of man, and predisposeth it vnto the brightness of eternall felicitie; so that insolent ioy, which man in the pride of his vaine imagination conceiueth of his owne worth, doth above all other passions blast our mindes, as it were with lightening, and make vs to reflect our thoughts vpon our seeming inherent greatnesse, forgetting the whilst him, to whom we are indebted for our very being. Wherefore these malis mentis gaudia; The euill ioyes of the minde, were not vnaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bellosed in the entrance of Hell, and placed further inward than sorrowes, cares, and feares; not farre from the yron Cabins of the Furies. And certainly it is no vnlkely token of vengeance neare at hand, when these vnreasonable flushes of proud and vaine ioy, doe rage in a minde, that should haue bene humbled with a iust repentance and acknowledgement of ill deserting.

This was verified vpon Nabuchadnezzar, whose punishment was singular and vnexempld. For he ranne among beasts in the fields and woods, where for seuen yeares hee liued, not only as a salvage man, but as a salvage beast, for a beast he thought himselfe: secundum suam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore sed himselfe in the same manner, and with the same foode that beasts doe; Not that he was changed in figure externall according to Mediana, in so much as he appeared a beast to other mens eyes, as S. Hierome in the life of Hilarus (how true God knowes) speaks of a woman that appeared to all other mens sight a Cow, but to Hilarus only a woman; neither was he changed as Iphigenia the Daughter of Agamemnon was said to be into a Hinde, nor made a Monster as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed; but according to S. Hieromes exposition of these wordes. At the same time was my vnderstanding restored vnto me, &c. Quando dicit (saith S. HIEROME) sensum sibi redditum, ostendit non formam se amisisse (ed mentem); When he saith that his sense was restored vnto him, he sheweth that hee had not lost his humane shape, but his vnderstanding. Seuen yeares expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonosor, both to his vnderstanding, ding, and his estate, for which hee acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power and euermlasting being; that he was the Lord of heauen and earth, and wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his works were all truth, and his waies righteous. Which gaue argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his saluation; namely S. Augustine, Theodoret, Ezra, Cassiodorus, and others. And for that place of Ezra the fourteenth out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforesaid Authors apply the same to Balthasar, because Ezra both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapter speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon ioyntly.

OF EVILMERODACH.

AVING already spoken what I could of the succession and yeares of Nabuchadnezzar posteritie; the most that may be said of him, is said of Evilmerodach, which I will not here againe rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his Father had gotten; and left his Kingdome burning in a warre that consumed it to ashes. He lost Egypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth yeare of his raigne, which was forty yeares after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the account of Herodotus, who allows to Amasis foure and fortie yeares of raigne; nor with that of Diodorus, who giues him five and fiftie, saying that he died in the third yeare of the threecore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Egypt. There were indeed but seven and thirtie yeares, which passed betweene the second yeare of the foure and fiftie Olympiad (which was the nineteenth of Evilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the last of Cambyses his raigne, wherein hee wanne Egypt; of which seven and thirtie yeares it is credibly held, that Plinennius, the sonne of Amasis, raigned three: so that Amasis could be no longer King than foure and thirtie yeares. But seeing that these two Greeke Historians haue beene abused by Egyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no maruaile though they were also decieved in the length of his raigne. This is the plain answer to this objection. For to say either that the numbers were miswritten, and foure and fortie set downe in stead of foure and thirtie, or that Amasis did temporise a while with the Assyrians, and not beare himselfe as absolute King of Egypt, vntill the nineteenth of Evilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath bene proued out of Ezekiel, that Egypt became againe a Kingdome) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Egyptian troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deale with Evilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame, and reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in present forces; or whether (as I rather thinke) some foile recouied by the Assyrian invading Media, emboldened the Egyptians to rebell against him: I will neither undertake, nor seeke to define. Xenophon tells that the first seruice of yong Cyrus in warre was vnder Assyages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Assyrian Prince, who did set vpon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteen or sixteen yeares old. If therefore Cyrus liued threecore and three yeares (as he is said to haue died well stricken in yeares) which is held to be the ordinary terme of no short life, then was this encounter in the third yeare of Evilmerodach his raigne. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the warre beganne more early betweene these Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumstances insinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchadnezzar gaue courage vnto those that had felt him a troublesome Neighbour, to stand vpon prouder termes with the Assyrians, than in his flourishing citate they durst haue vsed. How foucer the quarrell beganne, wee finde that it ended not before the last ruine of the Assyrian Monarchie. For the Babylonians, being too proude to digest the losses which hee received by the Medes and their Allies the Perians, drewe vnto his partie the Lydiens, and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong persuasions, hoping so to ouerwhelme his Enemies with a strong inuasion, whome in vaine hee had sought to weare out with a lingring warre.

This happened after the death of Assyages, who left the World in the nineteenth yeare of Evilmerodach, at which time Amasis tooke possession of Egypt. So that the Assyrian hauing his handes already full of buineffe, which more earnestly did assist him, seemed thereby to haue giuen the better means vnto the Egyptians, of new erecting their Kingdome, which by long distance of place did sundrie times finde occasion to rebell in after-ages, and set vp a King within it selfe, against the farre more mightie Perians.

The issue of these great preparations made by Evilmerodach against the Medes, was such as opened the way vnto the fulfilling of those prophesies, which were many yeares before vttered against Babel by Ezra and Ieremie.

For the Assyrians, and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to haue buried the Medes, and Perians, vnder their thicke showers of arrowes and darts, were encountered with an armie of stout and well-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battaile, wherein Evilmerodach was slaine. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchadnezzar had raised and vp-held, being shaken and grieuouly crackt vnder his vnfortunate Sonne, was left to bee sustained by his vnworthy Nephew: a man more likely to haue ouerthrowne it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repaire it, when it was in way of falling.

p. XIII.

A private coniecture of the Author; serving to make good those things, which are cited out of Berosus, concerning the Successors of Evilmerodach, without wrong to the truth: the qualities, and death of Balthasar.

THOUGH I haue already (as it seemes to mee) sufficiently proued that Balthasar was the Sonne, and immediate Successour to Evilmerodach, yet considering earnestly the coniectures of those Writers, which following Berosus, insert Nigissar or Nirigissar, and his sonne Labsarsadach betweene them: as also that which I finde in Herodotus of Nitocris a famous Queene of Babylon, who was greatly adorned and fortified that Citie; I haue thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what means it was possible that some error might haue crept into the Historie of those times, and thereby haue brought vs to a needlesse trouble of searching out the truth, as it were by candle light, in the vncertaine fragments of lost Authors, which we might haue found by day light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. First, therefore I observe, that the time which Berosus diuides betwixt Evilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the yeares in which Nabuchadnezzar liued wild among brute beasts in the open field: Secondly, that the suddenness of this accident, which came in one houre, could not but worke much perturbation in that state, wherein doubtlesse the honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamitie pitied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause clause which promised his recouerie, as being verified in that which had bene more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason iudge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for setting the government, whilst the King was thus distracted, we shall finde it most likely, that his Sonne and Heire did occupie the roiall Throne, with condition to restore it vnto his Father, when God should enable him to repossesse it. In this his rule Eutimerodach being to supplie the utter want of vnderstanding in his Father, as Proteitors doe the vnrpesence of it in yong, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the infolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That he had in him very small abilitie of government, it appears by his ill maintaining the Empire, when hee held it in his owne right. That his Sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his sister) was a woman of an high spirit, it appears by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying that there was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and vfeull workes about the River of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Assyrians, and amongst them Babylon. Wherefore it were not vnreasonable to thinke, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers misgovernment, vfed praides to get the rule into her owne hands, and afterwards, as a Mother, to leaue it vnto her vngracious sonne. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could haue reigned, wee doe not finde; but we finde in Berosus (as Iosephus hath cited him) that Niniasar, who got the Kingdome from Eutimerodach, was his sisters husband; which argues this to haue bene the same woman. As for Labasardach the sonne of Niniasar, if at the end of nine Moneths raighe he were for his leud conditions slaine by the Nobilitie, as the same Berosus reporteth, it seemes that God prepared hereby the way for Nabuchadnezzars restitution (whose terme of punishment was then expired) by raising such troubles as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the People. I will not here vfe many wordes to confute that which Berosus hath further set downe of Eutimerodach, telling vs that he was slaine by his sisters husband; for the plaine words of Scripture naming the year wherein he gaue libertie to zechonias, doe plainly testify that he out-liued the three or foure and fortieth year of his Fathers raighe, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to haue succeeded Eutimerodach in the Kingdome, might indeede haue so done, though not when hee held it in his owne right. Of Balthasar who was his Sonne and Heire, we finde, that he had such conditions, as God permitte to be in a King for the ruine of the people. He was from his yong yeares of a mischieuous nature; hauing in his Fathers time slaine a Noble yong man that should haue married his sister, only for spight and enuie to see him kill two wild beastes in hunting, at which himselfe hauing throwne his laureline had misfed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beautie, said it were a happie woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous viciaries caused many which had loued his Father (as a good and gracious, though vnfortunate Prince) to reuolt from him vnto the enemie as soone as he was King. Neither doe I finde that he performed any thing worthy of record, but as a Coward and a Foole hee lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to giue battaile to them that daily tooke somewhat from him; Yet carelesly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on euery side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom hee had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a foole taken in vnexcusable securitie, yet had not that happinesse (such as it is) of a death free from apprehension of feare, but was terrified with a dreadfull vision, which had shewed his ruine not many houres before, y<sup>e</sup>uen whilst he was drinking in that wine, which the swordes of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his last bloud. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable raighe of seuentene yeares he perished rished like a beast, and was slaine as he deserued. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath bene spoken heretofore; in matter of his affaires, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose storie that of Balthasar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the originall and first greatnesse of the Persians.

§. I.

That the Medes were chiefe actors in the subuersion of the Babylonian Empire.

THE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthasar, the Emperour of Babylon, and of Assyria, was ioynd first to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria and of Media it selfe.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings besides himselfe, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Prouinciall Gouvernours hauing cut downe the last branch of Ninus in Sardapalus, diuided betweene them the Easterne Empire. Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces dying about two yeares after that the Line of Belochus was ended in Balthasar, the Dominions afield of the Conquerour, as of the conquered, fell to a third Familie, namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achamenes, the Princes of which bloud raigning in Persia, had formerly bene dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the World.

Of the Familie of Achamenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, wee shall hereafter finde occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Medas the third sonne of Iaphet; that they had Kings soone after the flood, Lactantius and Dionodorus haue found record; For Lactantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Dionodorus speaketh of Pharnus with his seuen Sonnes, slaine by the Assyrian in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Assyrians. I take the list and number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I haue spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these.

Who reigned.

And though the Greekes ascribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach vs that Darius was not only King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Armie victorious ouer Balthasar was his; as the Assyrian and Babylonian Empire also was during his owne life. For wee finde in Daniel that Darius of the Medes took the Kingdome being threescore and two yeares old. And further what Officers it pleased him to set ouer the Kingdome. And so was it prophesied by Isay long before: Behold I will stirre up the Medes against them, &c. And by IEREMIE: The Lord hath raised up the Spirit of the King of the Medes, for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and in the eight and twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Lukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Iulius Africanus doth wel open; who taking authoritie from Diodore, Cassius, Thallus, and others, deliuereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus beganne to raigne, which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subgated by the Persians, so before that, both the Babylonians and Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Iustine, and Herodotus, are not to be receiued, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

Lib. 16.

§. II.

By what means the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

Ow the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the handes of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians: but rather their different relations of his beginnings haue bred the former opinion of those who giue the conquest of Babel to the Persian only. For some there are who denie that Astyages had any other Successour than Cyrus his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrarie side affirmeth that Cyrus was no way defended from Astyages (whom hee calleth Astages or Apamas) but only that hauing vanquished him in battaile, and confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Smytis. But I finde the relations of Ctesias often cited and feldome followed, and him selfe sometimes very iustly reprobued of willfull vntruth.

Viginius a diligent and learned Historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Astyages had no such Sonne as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirme his opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Iustine, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, and before them Cassius, Thallus, and Phlegon, who doe not finde any such Successour. Neither doe Tacitus, Theophilus Antiochenus, Iulius Africanus, Cicero, Alexandrinus, Iulius Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, S. Hierome, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithfull Author by them read, that hath giuen other Sonne or Successour to Astyages than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of argument ab authoritate negatiue, doth neuer inforce force consent; we may bee the bolder (all this great list of Noble Writers by him alleged notwithstanding) to affirme that either Astyages himselfe must haue bene Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; Or else to giue him some other Successour, according to Iosephus, and Xenophon, the same whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifest, and without dispute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chiefe, and was absolute Lord of that Conquest, Cyrus during his life being no other than the Lieutenant of his Armie, and subiect to his authoritie; The strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassalls of Darius, being ioyned together to compound it.

Zen. li. c. 19.
10. and 110 c. 13
Hec. 6. 34.

But it is very certaine that the honour of that great victorie ouer Babylon was wholly giuen to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and forenamed by God himselfe, not only for this action, but for the deliuerie of his Church; a greater worke in the eyes of God, than the subuerfion of any State or Monarchie, how powerfull soeuer.

And it may well bee thought, that the Souldiers employed in that seruice did rather ascribe the glorie to him that was the best man of Warre, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling vpon Cyrus by succession, and continuing in his posteritie, did much augment the fame of his vertue, which among prophane Historians ore-grew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both because hee was old, and did nothing in person; as also because hee soone after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was possessor of whatsoever belonged to Darius, before the fame of any such King or Conquerour was carried farre off.

And for the Greek Historians, they tooke all things from the relations of the Persians, who giue to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equall. Only Daniel in the first, fift, and sixt Chapters of his prophecies, makes it plaine that himselfe not only liued a great Officer vnder King Darius, but that hee continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus, which being the year 30 of Daniels death, could not haue bene distinguished from the raigne of Darius, if they had begunne together and raigned ioynly; Neither can it bee imagined that Darius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permission, considering that Cyrus beganne after him.

§. III.

XENOPHONS relation of the Warre which the Medes and Persians made with ioynt forces vpon the Assyrians and others.

Hese Testimonies of the Scriptures, which neede no other confirmation, are yet made more open to our vnderstanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these warres: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Assyrian had enlarged his Empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countreies, hee beganne to hope that if the Medes could bee brought vnder his subiection, there should not then bee left any Nation adioyning able to make head against him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threescore thousand foote, and about ten thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being ioyned made an exceeding strong Armie.

The Assyrian considering the strength of such a Neighbour, inuited Craesus King of Lydia, a Prince very mightie both in men and treasure, and with him other

Lords

Lords of Asia the lesse to his assistance, alleging that those Easterne Nations were very powerfull, and so firmly conioyned by league and many alliances, that it would not be ealie, no nor possible, for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements strenghtned with great presents, he drew to himselfe so many adherents a he compounded an Armie of two hundred thousand foote, and three score thousand horse, of which ten thousand horse, and fortie thousand foote were led by Cresus, who had great cause of enmitie with the Medes, in regard of the Warre made by them against his Father Alyattes; But this great Armie was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus generall of the Persian forces, vtterly broken; Vpon which defeat the Assyrian King being also slaine, so many of the Assyrians reuolted, as Babylon it selfe could not longer be assured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great summes of money out of Asia the lesse, Egypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were also cattered by Cyrus, who following his aduantage, posselt himselfe of a great part of the lesse Asia, at which time it was, as I take it, that Cresus himselfe was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soone after, the Armie lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his sisters sonne, prevailed against Balthazar, as in due time shall be set downe.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him leued, are numbred thirtie thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, therest of the 20 common sort were Archers, or such as vied the Dart and the Sling: So saith Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the patterne of a most Heroicall Prince, with much Poeticall addition; So it cannot be denied, but that the bulke and grosse of his Narration was founded vpon meere Histori- 10 cal truth.

Neither can it indeed bee affirmed of any the like writer, that in euery speech and circumstance he hath precisely tied himselfe to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his owne inuention, appropriating the same to the times and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Morall and Politicall discourse, and examining but the Historic of things 30 done, it will easily appeare that Xenophon hath handled his vnder-taken subiect in such sort, that by beautifying the face thereof, he hath not in any sort corrupted the bodie.

§. IIIL.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times fore-going this great Warre.

EOr it is commonly agreed vpon, that Achamenes, the sonne of Perse 40 being Governour of Persia, did affociate himselfe with Arbaces, who commanded in Media in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victorie obtained, held for himselfe the Dominion of those Countries which he had formerly ruled for the Assyrians; as also that they conueyed ouer the same honor and power to their posteritie; which in Media was not absolutely Regall, but with some restraint limited, vntill such time as Deioces tooke vpon him the full authoritie and maiestie of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the raigne of Deioces, are vsually accounted about an hundred and fortie yeares, in the last sixtie whereof there reigned in Assyria mightie Princes, namely Salmanassar and his Successours, whose great atchieuements in Syria 50 and else where witnesse, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their aduantage to vnder-take any offensive warre against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the league continued as yet betweene these the Successours of Belus, and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now

Now from the beginning of Deioces to the first of Astages, there past about 100 ninetie yeares, in which if Herodotus haue written truly, that Phraortes conquered Persia, and how he and other the Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their dominions, and commanded many parts of Asia, it had bene but an vnuaduled enterprife of the Assyrians and Babylonians, to haue wasted themselves against the Syrians and Egyptians, leaving so able and victorious a Nation on their backs. But that the Medes had done nothing vpon the South parts of Persia, and that the Persians themselves were not masters of Susiana in Nabuchodonosors time, it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Governour for the Babylonians in Susa or Susan, the chiefe Citie thereof. It is true indeed, that the Medians, either vnder Cyaxares 10 or Astages, or both, had quarrell with Alyattes the father of Cresus, which after some six yeares dispute was compounded.

How the affaires of Persia stood in so many ages, I doe not find any memorie. It seemeth that the roughnesse of the mountainous Countrey which they then possessed, with the confederacie which they continued with the Medes, gaue them more securitie than fame: For if their Kings, being the posteritie of Achamenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatnesse which they afterward obtained would not haue suffered any forgetfulness thereof. But as we find all Xenophons reports, both of these Warres and the state of those Countries to be very con- 20 stant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, so it appeares, that the race of Achamenes held the Principalltie of Persia from father to sonne for many descents. And therefore we may better give credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyses the father of Cyrus was King of Persia: than to those that make him a meane man, and say, that Astages gaue him his daughter Mandane in marriage, to the end that her sonne (whose naturallie he feared) might be disabled from any great vnder-taking by his fathers ignobilitie.

For what cause of griefe could it be to Astages, that the sonne of his daughter should become Lord of the best part of Asia? No; it was more likely, that vpon such a Prophecie his loue to his grand-child should haue encreased, and his care 30 became the greater to haue married her to some Prince of strength and eminent vertue.

Yea, the same Herodotus, who is the first Author, and as I thinke the deuiler of the mischief intended against Cyrus by his grandfather, doth confesse, That the line of the Achamenides was so renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his prosperitie did thence deriue himselfe, and vaunt of it: which he would neuer haue done, had they bene ignoble, nor had they been the vassals of any other King or Monarch.

50 Of the Achamenide there were two races: of the first was Cyrus the great, whose issue male sayled in his two sonnes, Cambyses and Smerdis. This royall familie is thus set downe by the learned Reineccius.

Achamenes, the sonne of Perſes, first King of Persia.

Drinus.

Cyrus, the first of that name, had Cambyses and Atossa, who, married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, had Artystona and other daughters.

Camby/cs had

Cyrus the Great, Cyrus had

Cambyſes who ſucceeded him, and Smerdis flaine by his brother Cambyſes.

Of the second were those seven great Princes of Persia, who hauing ouerthrowne the vsurped royaltie of the Magi, chose from among themselves Darius the sonne of Hystaspes King.

This Kingdome of Persia was first knowne by the name of Elam, so called after Elam the sonne of Sem, and the people therein inhabiting Elamitæ; by Elianus, Elymæ; by Iosephus, Elimi.

Suidas doth calls this Nation sometimes from Affur, sometime from Mageo, of whom they were called Magyay's, which Magyay's, according to Enchebus, are not to be taken for the Nation in general, but for those who were afterward called the Magi or Wile men. So doe the Greekes, among many other their faynings of them, affirme, That the Perfians were anciently written Atar, and that they called themselves Cephentes. But that they were Elamites, Mages and the Prophets, Efay, Ieremie, Ezechiel, Dauid, and Efdras in many places confirm: Which also S. Hierome upon Daniel the fhuic and twentieth, vpon Daniel the eight and twentieth, and in his Hebrew questions approueth, saying, Elam a quo Elamite a Principes Perfidijs : E L A M, of whom were the Elamites Princes of Perfia.

And that Citic which the Author of the second booke of the Maccabees calleth Persepolis, is by the Author of the first called Elimaïs, but is now called Siras, being the same which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof, twice attempted in vain, and to his great dishonour. And yet this Citic, now called Siras, was not the old Persepolis: for Alexander, at the request of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The first King of Perſia vs to be knowne, if wee follow the current of Authors interpreting the foureteenth chapter of Genesis, was Chedorlaomer, who liued with Auraphel or Ninias, and ioyned with him in the warre against those Arabians, who was afterward extinguished by the forces of Abraham.

of CYRUS his name and first actions.

touching the name of Cyrus, Strabo sayth, That the fame was taken from a Riuer which watereth Persia; this great Prince hauing Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the first of that name; Herodotus otherwise; and that Cyrus Strabo sayth, signifieth a father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore so intirely by the people.

It is true that for his Justice and other excellent virtues he was indeed called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any such signification, I think it be mistaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to say as the Sunne, in the same Language. Howsoever it be, yet the Prophet Ezay, almost two hundred years before Cyrus was borne, giues him that name, Thus saith the Lord unto CYRUS his anointed &c.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which, the Conquest of Egypt, and other Provinces thereto subiect, together with the taking of Croesus himself, are so recounted by Herodotus,<sup>30</sup> Croesus, and others, but placed among his last achievements by Strabo. In opinion for this difference of time is founded upon two reasons; namely, That that of Median there is no mention in that last warre against Croesus: and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad, and that the glorious victorie which Cyrus had over Babylon, to the five and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might have been void (and was by the Greeks) to exclude the Modes from the honour of having won Eshlon it self, which in due place I have answered. The latter seemed to have reference to the second War which Cyrus made upon Lydia, when it related to; at which time he so established his former Conquest, as after that time these Nations never offered to revolt.

40 Wherefore I like better in this particular to beleue with Hierocitus, whome the most of Chronologers follow, and finde the enterprise of Sardis to precede that of Eshlon.

ø. II.

Of CROISVS the King of Lydia, who made warre upon CYRVS.

In the last Booke spoken somewhat of Cresus, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which governed in more ancient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors knowne) was Zylus, the sonne of Atys: Which familie extinguished, the Kingdome was by an Oracle conferred vpon Argon, descended from Heacles, whereof there were two and twentie generations, Caudales being the last, who by slewing his faire wife named to Gyges his fauorite, he was by the same Gyges (thereto (thereto vrged vpon perill of his owne life by the Queene) the next day flaine. Which done, Gyges enioyed both the Queene and the Kingdome of Lydia, and left the same to Atys his sonne, who was later to Sadyattes, the father of Halyattes (who thrust the Cimmerians out of Asia) and Halyattes begat Cresus: Which hie Kings, of a third race, enioyed that Kingdome an hundred and seuentie yeares. Halyattes the father of Cresus was an vndertaking Prince, and after he had continued a warre against Cyaxares the Median, a Prince verie powerfull, and maintained it six yeares, a peace was concluded vpon equall conditions betwene them.

Alyages, the sonne of Cyaxares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himselfe greatly honoured by obtaining Aryenis, Cresus sister, whom he married.

But Cresus so faste enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territorie to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were foure in effect of equall strength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian, and the Lydian: onely Nabuchodonosor, after he had ioyned Phoenicia, Palestina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no competitor during his owne life.

But Cresus, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrell of the Babylonians, he yet mastered Aulis, Loris, and Ionia, Provinces posselt by the Greekes in Asia the lesse, adioyning to Lydia; gaue law to the Phrygians, Bithinians, Carians, Atyians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also infort the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their Citie with Dianae girdle, Heraclitus witnesseth. Moreover, Athenaus out of Berosus (which also Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victorie which Cresus obtained against the Sacians, a Nation of the Serians, in memorie whereof the Babylonians his allies did yearly celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacaea: All which hee performed in foureteene yeares.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and enuious of Cyrus fame, doubting also, that his prosperous vndertakings might in the end grow perillous to himselfe he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom hee presented with marvellous rich gifts, what successe he might hope for against Cyrus, if he vnderooke him: from whom hee received this riddle; CROESVS passing over the River Halys, shall disloue a great Sermon. For the duell being doubtfull of the successe, payed him with matchanize of both sides like, and might be inuerted either way to the ruine of Perse, or of his owne Lydia.

§. III.

CROESVS his Expedition against CYRVS.

Erceupon Cresus being resolu'd to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, if he could, despised all the arguments v'ed by Sandanes to the contrary, who desired him to fore-thinke, That he vrged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region, a people not couered with the soft silke of wormes, but with the hard skinnies of beasts; not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; ouer whom if he became victorious he could thereby enrich himselfe in nothing but fame, in which hee already excelled: and if by them beaten, and subiect, so great would his losse appeare of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither battly be told, nor readily conceiued.

Notwithstanding this solide Councell, Cresus hauing prepared a powerfull armie, he led the same towards Media, but in his passage he was arrested at Pterium, a Citie of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he fought by all means to surpris or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I doe not finde: for out of doubt, Cresus as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and abilities; so was hee not vnder any in territorie and fame that then liued.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the Gods, because they fauoured a disturber and vlturper of the Commonweale against him who fought for the Romane libertie, That Kingdomes and Commonweales had their encrease and period from diuine Ordinance: so at this time was the Winter of Cresus prosperitie at hand, the leaues of his flourishing fortune ready to fall; and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had giuen date to the one, and a beginning of glorie to the other.

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainement of diuerse skirmishes, the Persians and Lydians beganne to ioine in grosse troupes: supplies from both Kings thrust on vpon the falling off, and aduancement of either Nation: and as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day, so when the darke vaile of night had hidden each armie from the others view, Cresus doubting what successe the rising Sunne would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speede possible rettyred, and taking the next way into Lydia, recovered Sardis his first Citie and Regall Seat, without any pursuite made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arrived, and nothing suspecting Cyrus approach, or any other warre for that Winter, he dismissed the souldiours, and sent the troupes of his sundry Nations to their owne Prouinces, appointing them to rassemble at the end of sixe moneths, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the warre at the time appointed.

§. IIII.

The Conquest of Lydia by CYRVS.

CYRVS in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his armie in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heeles, as to be discouered. But hauing good intelligence of Cresus his proceeding, he so measured his Marches, as he presented not himselfe before Sardis, till such time as Cresus had disposed his armie to their Wintering garrisons: when being altogether vlooked for, and vnfeared, he surrounded Sardis with his Armie: Wherein Cresus hauing no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinarie Gards, after foureteene dayes siege the same was entred by assault, and all executed that resisted. Cresus hauing now neither armie to fight, nor wings to flye, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompassed, thrust himselfe into the heape and miserable multitude of his vassals, and had vndergone the common fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a sonne of his, who had become dumbe all his life (by extremitie of passion and feare enabled) cried out to the souldiours to spare Cresus. Who thereupon being taken and imprisoned, depoyled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and set on the top of a great and high heape of wood, to be consumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was set and kindled, remembering the discourse which he had had with the Athenian Law-giuer, he thrice cried out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that inuocation, he first vied silence: but vrged againe, he told them, That he now found it true which Solon had long since told him, That many men in the race and courtes of their liues might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could discern himselfe for happie indeede, till his end.

Of which answere Cyrus being speedily informed, remiebring the changes of fortune and his owne mortalitie, he commaunded his ministers of Iustice to withdraw draw the fire with all diligence to saue Crasus, and to conuict him to his presence: Which done, Cyrus demanded of him, Who it was that had perswaded him? Or what selfe reason had conuicted him to invade his territorie, and to make him of a friend an enemy? To whom he thus answered, It was thy prosperous and my vnprosperous destinie (the Græcian God flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inueterers and conductors of Crasus warre against Cyrus.

Cyrus being pierst with Crasus answer, and bewailing his estate, though victorious ouer it, did not onely spare his life, but entertained him euer after as a King and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercie indeed, Quæ non causam sed fortunam spectat.

And herein is the reall difference discerned betwene that behavior which wee call Beneficium latronis, & gratiam Principis: A theefe sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but vniuilly: A King that giueth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his owne euill.

The report made by Xenophon is, That Cyrus did friendly entertaine Crasus at the first sight, not mentioning that which Hærodotus deliuiers, and is here already set downe, that hee should haue bene burnt alive. It may well bee, that Xenophon portraying (in Cyrus) an herocratic Prince, thought an intent so cruell fitter to be forgotten than rehearsed, as too much misbecoming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that needernesse of alliance might withhold Cyrus (had he bene other wise vicious) from so cruell a purpose against his grandmothers brother. Howeuer it was, the Morall part of the storie hath giuen credit and reputation to the report of Hærodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it passe for currant, though the trust reposed in Crasus afterwards may seeme to argue, that Cyrus did not vse him inhumanely at the first.

For as Hærodotus himselfe telleth vs, when Cyrus past with his armie ouer Araxes into Scythia, he left Crasus to accompanie and aduise his sonne Cambyses, Gouverneur of the Empire in his absence, with whom he liued all the time of Cyrus, and did afterward follow Cambyses into Aegypt, where he hardly escaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was I doe not finde.

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the world rooke end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lycians; in Balthasar, Cycaxares, and Crasus.

§. V.

How Cyrus woon Babylon.

After this Lydian warre ensued the great Conquest of Babylon, which gaue vnto Cyrus an Empire so large and mightie, that he was iustly reputed the greatest Monarch then liuing vpon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action tooke vp, it is vncertaine; onely it seemes, that tenne whole yeares did passe betwene his taking those two Cities of Sardes and Babylon, which neuertheless I doe not thinke to haue bene wholly occupied in prouision for the African warre, but rather to haue bene spent in setting the Estate which he had already purchased. And herunto perhaps may be referred that which Ctesias hath in his fragments of a war made by Cyrus vpon the Scythians, though related as foregoing the victorie obtained against Crasus. He telleth vs, That Cyrus invaded Scythia, and being victorious ouer that Nation, tooke Amorges their King prisoner: but being in a second battaile overthrowne by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, and therein taken, the one King was deliuered for the other.

Likewise it may be thought, that no small part of those troubles which arose in the

the lower Asia, grew soone after the departure of the victorious armie, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Asia the lesse, many Nations, conquered formerly by Crasus, and now by Cyrus, revolted from him; against whom he employed Pactius, and then Harpagus, who first reduced the Phæsiens vnder their former obedience: and then the rest of the Greekes inhabiting Asia the lesse, as the Ionians, Carians, Ælians, and Lycians, who resolutely (according to the strength they had) defended themselves. But in the attempt vpon Babylon it selfe it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, hauing taken order before-hand, that nothing should be able to diuert him, or to rayse that siege, and make frustrate the worke vpon which he did set all his rest. And great reason there was, that he should bend all his care and strength vnto the taking of that Citie, which beside the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was so strongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, and surrounded with waters vnfordable, so plentifully victualled for many yeares, that the inhabitants were not onely free from all doubt and feare of their estate, but despised and derided all purposes and power of their besiegers.

The onely hope of the Medes and Persians, who despaired of carrying by assault a Citie so well fortified and manned, was in cutting off all supplies of victuals and other necessaries; whereof though the Towne was said to be stored sufficiently for more than twentie yeares, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of peoples dwelt within those gates, one great want or other would sooner appeare, and vanquish the resolution of that vnwarlike multitude. In expecting the success of this course, the besiegers were likely to endure much traualle, and all in vaine; if they did not keepe it straight watch and strong gards vpon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the vast circuit of those walls which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently assured vnto their Commaunder: The consideration wherof ministred vnto the Babylonians matter of good pastime, when they saw the Lydians, Phrygiens, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Towne to keepe them in, who hauing bene their ancient friends and allies, were more likely to ioyne with them, if occasion were offered, than to vse much diligence on the behalfe of Cyrus, who had, as it were, yesterday laid vpon their neckes the galling yoke of seruitude. Whilst the besieged were pleasing themselves in this deceitfull gladnesse, that is the ordinarie fore-runner of suddaine calamitie; Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made strong, constant, and inuentive, deuised by so many channels and trenches as were sufficient and capable of Euphrates, to draw the same from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and assured; which when by the labour of many hands hee had performed, hee stayed the time of his advantage for the execution: for hee had left certaine bankes or heads vncut, betwene the maine riuer which surrounded the Citie, and his owne Trenches.

Now Balthasar, finding neither any want or weaknesse within, nor any possibility of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding sumptuous feast, publike Playes, and other Pastimes, and thereto inuited a thousand of his Princes or Nobilitie, besides his wiues, curtizans and others of that trade. This he did either to let the besiegers know, that his prouisions were sufficient, not onely for all needfull vses, but euen for iolitic and exesse: Or because he hoped that his enemies, vnder the burthen of many distreites were well neere broken, or in honour of his most reuerenced Idoll: Or that it was his birth or coronation day: Or for many or all these respects. And he was not contented with such magnificence as no Prince else could equall, but (vying Daniels words) he lifted himselfe up against the Lord of Heauen: For he and his Princes, wiues and concubines, made carowling cuppes of the Vessels of God, in contempt of whom he prayed his owne puppers, made made of Siluer and Gold, of Brasse, of Iron, Wood, and Stone, Quanta fuit stultitia in vasis aureis libentes lignos & lapideos Deos laudare; How great a foolishnesse was it (sayth S. Hierome) drinking in golden Cuppes, to praise Gods of Wood and Stone. While Balthasar was in this fort triumphing, and his braines well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by diuine power wrote on the wall opposite vnto him certaine words which he vnderstood not: wherewith so great a feare and amazement seized him, as the ioynts of his loynes were loosed, and his knees smote one against the other. Which passion when he had in some part recovered, he cryed out for his Chaldeans, Astrologians, and Southsayers, promising them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the Kingdome to him that could reade and expound the writing; which it exceeded their art. In this disturbance and astonishment the Queene hearing what had past, and of the Kings amazement, after reuerence done vied this speech: There is a man in thy Kingdome in whom is the spirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father, light, and vnderstanding and wisdom, like the wisdom of the Gods, was found in him, when the King Nabuchodonosor thy father, the King (I say) thy father made chiefe of the Inchanters, Astrologians, Chaldeans, and Southsayers, because a more excellent spirit and knowledge and vnderstanding &c. were found in him, even in DANIEL &c. Now let DANIEL be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

Orig. & Theod.
44. 10.

This Queene, Isephus takes for the grandmother; Origen and Theodor for the mother of Balthasar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that there was not any of the Kings wiues, because absent from the feast; and being past the age of dauncing and banquetting, he came in vpon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his distraction: and whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others of younger yeares and times, this old Queene remembered well what he had done in the dayes of Nabuchodonosor, grandfather to this Balthasar, and kept in mind both his religion and diuine gifts.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings presence, who acknowledged those excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promises of reward and honour, to reade and interpret those wordes miraculously written; to whom Daniel made answer in a farre different stye from that he vied towards his grandfather: for the cuill which he foretold Nabuchodonosor, he wished that the same might befall his enemies, but to this King (whose neglect of God and vice he hated) he answered in these wordes, Keepe thy rewards to thy selfe, and gree thy gifts to another, yet will I reade the writing vnto the King, and shew him the interpretation: Which before he had performed, he gaue him first the cause of Gods iust judgement against him, and the reason of this terrible sentence; whereof the King and all his Wifemen were vnto ignorant: Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting Gods goodnesse to his father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of those benefits, as he deprived him of his estate and vnderstanding; so vpon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite power he restored him to both. This King notwithstanding lifted himselfe vp against the same God and presumed both to abuse those vessels, dedicated to holy vses, and neglecting the Lord of all power, prayed and worshipped the dead Idols of Gold Siluer, Brasse, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore those wordes, from the Oracle of a true God declaired, (to wit) Aene Teliel, Yphraisin, gaue the King knowledge, that God had numbred the time of his Kingdome, and finished it: That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods iustice, and found too light; and that his Empire was diuided and gien to the Medes and Persians.

The very evening or night of this day, wherein Balthasar feasted and perished, Cyrus either by his espiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himselfe, whose ensigne he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunitie to inuite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobilitie were no less filled with the vapours of wine, than their hearts were with the feare of Gods judgement, he caused all the bankes and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut

downe with that diligence, as by them he drew the great Riuer of Euphrates drie for the present, by whose emptic channell, his armie made their entrance, finding none to disturbe them. All the Towne lay buried (as the Poet sayth) in sleepe and wine: such as came in the Persians way were put to the sword, vntill they saved themselves by flight, as some did, who ranne away crying, and filling the strettes with an vncertaine tumult.

Such Assyrian Lords as had revolted from Balthasar, and betaken themselves to the partie of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected companie to the Kings Pallace; which hauing easily forced, they rushed into the chamber where the King with his Princes were banquetting, slew both him and them without any mercie, who struggled in vaine to keepe those liues which God had newly threatened to take away. And now was the prophetic of Ieremie fulfilled, and that of Esay two hundred yeeres before this subuersion, who in his three & fortie Chapter and elsewhere writeth, this destruction so feelingly and liuely, as if he had bene present both at the terrible slaughter committed, and had scene the great and vnkedred change and calamitie of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the sorrowes and bewaylings of euerie suruiuing soule thereunto subiect. His prophetic of this place he beginneth in these wordes: Come downe and sit in the dust, O virgine daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no throne, &c. And againe, Sit still and get thee into darkenesse, O daughter of the Chaldeans, for thou shalt no more be called the Ladie of Kingdomes. For though it cannot be doubted, that God vied Nabuchodonosor and the Chaldeans, to punish the idolatrie of the Indians, yet Esay teacheth vs in this place, T that he did not yet forget that the execution of his judgements was mixt with a rigorous extremitie. For (sayth Esay) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people, I have polluted mine inheritance, and giuen them into thine hand: thou diddest shew them no mercie, but thou diddest lay thy very heauie yoke vpon the ancient. I will rise up against them, sayth the Lord of Hostes, and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the (sonne and the nephew. And in the thirteenth, Euery one that is found shall be stricken through; and whosoener ioyneth himselfe, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces before their eyes, their houses spoiled, and their vines ransacked. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victorie of Cyrus, or that received the report from others truly as it was, that could better leaue the same to posteritie after it happened, than Esay hath done in manie places of his prophecies, which were written two hundred yeeres before any thing attempted.

The greatnesse and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by diuers graue Authors let downe, might seeme altogether fabulous: for besides the reports of Saint Iherome, Solinus, and Orosius, Aristotle in the third of his Politiques, the second Chapter, receiued the report for true, T that one part of the Citie knew not that the rest was taken three dayes after. Which is not impossible, if the testimony of Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who findes the compasse thereof at three hundred and threescore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes fise and fortie miles: the walls whereof had so great a breadth, as sixe chariots might passe in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitarchus, three hundred threescore and fise foot, garnished with an hundred and fiftie Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenth Booke of Geographie giues it a greater circuit, adding fise and twentie furlongs more to the former compasse, reckoning the same at three hundred fourescore and fise furlongs, which makes eight and fortie myle and one furlong: but findes the wall farre vnder that which Diodorus reports: And so doth Curius measure their thicknesse but at two and thirtie foot, and their height at an hundred cubites; which is also very much: euerie cubit containing a foot and halfe of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the Citie he giues the same with Siculus, and eight furlongs more. Herodotus findes a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, foure hundred and fourescore furlongs in circle; the thickness of the wall he measures at fittie cubites, and the height at two hundred of the same regall cubit. For entrance it had an hundred gates of Brasse, with posts and hookes to hang them on of the same metall: and therefore did the Prophet Ezra rightly intitle Babylon The Princesse and glorie of Kingdomes.

But when Cyrus had wonn her, he stript her out of her princely Robes, and made her a slave, dividing not only all her goodly houses, and her whole Territorie, with all the riches therein contained, among his souldiers: but bestowing the inhabitants themselves as bondslaves vpon those that had taken possession of their goods.

Touching the raigne of Cyrus, and the time which he enioyed in rest and pleasure, I can say no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to haue lasted onely seven yeares: in which time he made such Constitutions as differ little from the Ordinances of all wise Kings, that are desirous to establish a royall power in themselves and their posteritie.

§. V I.

The end of CYRUS.

His last warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diuersly written, Herodotus and Iustine deliuer, That after the Conquest of Asia the lesse Cyrus invaded the Massagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, gouerned by Tomyris their Queene: and that in an encounter betweene the Persians and these Northerne Nomades, Tomyris lost her Armie, and her Sonne Spergafestes, that commaunded it: In reuenge whereof, this Queene making new leuiies of men of warre, and following the warre against Cyrus, in a second battaile beat the Persian armie, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his bodie, and cast the same into a boile of bloud, vntill the wordes; Thou that hast all thy life time thirsted for bloud, now drinke thy fill, and satiate thy selfe.

It should hereby seeme, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was perswaded to abate their furie by some forcible inuasion and depopulation, because in the time of Cyraxares, father to Astyages, those Scythians inuaded Media and Asia the lesse, and held the same in a seruile subiection eight and twentie yeares.

This warre which Metasthenes calleth Tomyrique, lasted (sayth he) sixe yeares, and tooke end at the death of Cyrus.

But in this particular I beleuee vnto Vigener, that this Scythian warre was rather the same which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the Conquest of Lydia, according to Cicilius before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparta, though he deliuer the successe of that warre otherwise than Herodotus doth: The rather (sayth Vigener) because Strabo in his eleuenth booke reciteth, That Cyrus surprised the Sacians by the same stratagem by which Iustine sayth he defeated the sonne of Tomyris. And the same Cicilius also reporteth, That the last warre which Cyrus made was against Amortheus, King of the Derbicians, a Nation (as the rest of Scythians, whom though he ouercame, yet he then receiued the wound of his death, which he suffred three dayes after.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his owne Citie of Pasagardes, which himselfe had built, and where his Epitaph was to bee read in his time; which is said to haue bene this: O vir quicunque es Cyndeunquo advenis, neque enim te aduenturum ignoravi: Ego sum CYRUS qui Persi imperium constitui, pulillum hoc terra quoniam tegitur corpus mihi ne inuideas; O thou man, whoseer thou art, or whenceeuer thou thou comest; for I was not ignorant that thou shouldest come: I am CYRUS that founded the Persian Empire, doe not enuie vnto mee this little earth, with which my bodie is covered.

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either vpon hope of treasure, supposed to haue bene buried with him, or vpon desire to honour his dead bodie with certaine ceremonies; in which there was found an olde rotten Target, two Scythian Bowes, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his bodie lay, Alexander caused to be covered with his owne garment, and a Crowne of gold to be set vpon it. These things well considered, as they giue credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, so they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaues his bodie in the hands of Tomyris.

And surely, had Cyrus lost the Armie of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his sonne would so soone haue transported all his remaining forces into Aegypt, so farre off from that quarter: the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media; neither had Cambyses bene able in such hast to haue vnderaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather beleuee Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged and in peace: and that finding in himselfe, that hee could not long enioy the world, hee called vnto him his Nobilitie, with his two sonnes, Cambyses and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tanaxares: and after a long Oration, wherein he assured himselfe, and taught others, of the immortalitie of the Soule, and of the punishment: and rewards following the good and ill deservings of euery man in this life; he exhorted his sonnes by the strongest arguments he had to a perpetuall concord and agreement. Many other things he vttered, which make it probable, that he receiued the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when he gouerned Susa in Persia; and that Cyrus himselfe had read the prophetic of Ezra, wherein he was expressly named, and by God (for the deliuerie of his people) praedordained. Which act of deliuering the Jewes from their Captiuitie, and of restoring the holy Temple and Citie of Hierusalem, was in true consideration the noblest worke that euer Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an instrument of Gods power, vntill for the chastising of many Nations, and the establishing of a Gouernment in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the grace to be an instrument of Gods goodnesse, and a willing aduancer of his Kingdome vpon earth; which must last for euer, though heauen and earth shall perill.

§. VII.

Of CYRUS his Decree for building the Temple of God in Ierusalem.

Being therefore spoken of his great victories, mentioned by sundry Historians, the glorie of all which as a reward of this his seruice done vnto him that was Author of them and of all goodnesse: I hold it meete at length to speake of the Decree made in the first of his Raigne, being perhaps the first that euer he made, after his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captiue Jewes should returne againe into their owne Territorie, and re-build the House of God in Ierusalem, hauing now endured and finished the threefore and tenne yeares captiuitie, by the Prophets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, he gaue order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessarie and wanting. He also restored vnto them siue thousand foure hundred threefore and nine Vessels of Gold and Silver, wherout Zabuchodonosor, the grandfather of Balthasar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the Jewes, which returned out of Chaldea vnder their leader Zorobabel, the sonne of Salthiel, and nephew to King Ieconias, and Iesuo or Iofia the sonne of Iofadab, were about fiftie thousand; where, as soone as they arrived, they built an Altar to the living God, and sacrificed thereon, according to their owne Law, and afterward bethought themselves how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple.

But no sooner did the Jewes begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritanes and other idolatrous Nations adioyning gaue all the impediment they could. So did the Gouernours of those Prouinces vnder Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no sort fauoured the Jewes, nor the labours and purposes they had in hand. And not only those which were but Prouinciall Lieutenants and other officers of lesse place, but Cambyses himselfe; who hauing the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was busied otherwise, countermanded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that whatsoeuer Cambyses did when himselfe had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition; They may herein resolute themselves out of Esdraes, That by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus life &c. And therefore it is true, that the Jewes themselves asseure, as it is written in the second of Iohn, That the Temple was fixe and fortie yeares in setting vp, hauing receiued so many hinderances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

And if wee seeke the naturall and politike causes which moued Cambyses to withstand his fathers decree, as well while he gouerned vnder him, as when himselfe became sole and soueraigne Monarch, we shall finde them in that Epistle remembered by Esdraes, written by Belshazzar, Mithridates, and the rest, Presidents and Councillors in Phoenicia, wherein they complaine, that the Jewes were euermore rebellious and troublers of Kings; that their Citie being once built, they would then refuse to pay tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings.

But that which for that present seemed the most forcible impediment was, that Cambyses, hauing it in his resolution to invade Egypt, and that it was a common opinion, That the Jewes were defendes of those Nations, because they issued thence vnder Mofes, when they conquered Iudas; their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might returne to their old vomit, and giue the same disturbance to Cambyses Conquest, which they did to Senacherib, Nabuchodonosor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written in Ezekiel, Egypt was the confidence of the house of ISRAEL.

But it is to be vnderstood, as Codoman and others haue obserued, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Councillors & Gouernours of Phoenicia complained against the Jewes, did not precede, but succeed Darius Hyaspes, as in the sixt and seuenth chapters of Esdraes it is made plaine: and also that those Gouernours (whose Epistle sheweth as much) did not withstand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and indoling of the Citie, as by the reasons giuen in the said Epistle, and by the Kings answer, it is euident.

Also in the sixt of Ezra, the fourteenth verse, the Kings are named in order as they gouerned, and Artaxerxes written after Darius; as: And they built and finished it (to wit, the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Israel, and by the commandment of CYRUS and DARIUS, and ARTAHASTE King of Persia. Lastly, in the seuenteenth of Ezra it is written; Now after these things, in the reigne of ARTAHASTE King of Persia: which was as much to say as after the finishing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of Esdraes is there named by anticipation, not in his owne time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citie and Temple of Hierusalem. Which action, though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly pushed by by the men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrus. The other ordinances of Cyrus, with his forme and manner of government, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire vnto his eldest sonne Cambyses, appointing Smerdis or Tanaxerxes his younger sonne to be Satrapa or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadusia, and then died, after he had reigned (sayth Herodorus) one and thirte yeares, or (according to Iulius) but thirte.

§. VIII.

Of CYRUS his issue: and whether ATOSSA were his daughter, or (as some thinke) were the same with Queene HESTER.

CYRUS had issue two sonnes, Cambyses and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atossa, Meroe, and Artystona: Cresius addeth to these, Amytis. Atossa and Meroe their brother Cambyses married; Artystona, Darius Hyaspes obtained; so did he Atossa, Cambyses being dead; who (as some Writers haue supposed) inflamed both her husband Darius, and Xerxes after him, to invade Greece, to be auenged of the whole Nation for the cruel intent that Aman (whom the old translation calleth a Macedonian) had against the Jewes, though the opinion of Iosephus be more probable, who findes Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be vnderstood, how Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, should haue bene Ester; whose Historie seemes rather to appertaine to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the sonne of Hyaspes, or of Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to haue Greece brought vnder the yoke of Persia, was partly grounded vpon the honour which thereby shee thought her husband might obtaine, partly vpon a feminine humor of getting many braue Dames, Corynthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women: Wherefore I cannot giue assent to the opinion of Codoman, who vpon the neere sound of the two names, Atossa and Hadaissa (by the later of which Ester was also called) makes them to haue bene one person. For though it be true, that Ester concealing her parentage a while, might be taken for a great Ladie; yet Codoman inference is nothing probable, that she should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare vnto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certaine it is, that Ester did at length discover her Kindred and Nation; whereby if Historiours could not be kept free from this error, yet the people, and especially the Nobilitie, must needs haue vnderstood the truth: who neuertheless did so well know the parentage of Atossa, that for her sake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her sonne Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdome before his elder brother, against whom also he could haue pretended a verie weakie layme. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

CHAP. IIII.

The estate of things from the death of CYRVS to the Reigne of DARIVS.

§. I.

Of the number and names of the Persian Kings.

the successors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metasthenes, who hath numbered the Persian Kings and their times as followeth.

Darius Medus , and Cyrus ioinctly	2
Cyrus alone.	22
Priscus Artaxerxes .	20
Darius Longimanus .	37
Darius Nohus .	19	years.
Artaxerxes Mnemon .	55
Artaxerxes Ochus .	20
Artaxerxes , or Artanes .	4
Darius the last, conquered by Alexander .	6

To which Philopagrecht, which number of years added make in all an hundred ninetie and one. But in this Catalogue Metasthenes hath left out Cambyses and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Assuerus for the immediate successor of Cyrus; in place (sayth Melancthon) of Darius the sonne of Hystaspes: for Metasthenes, as Melancthon coniectureth, doth not account Cambyses in the Catalogue, because his reigne was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a second opinion, though ridiculous, of Seder Olam, who finds but foure Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus have also a differing account from the Greekes; whom neuertheless Eusebius and most of the Latines follow. And so doth Krentheim, who hath fully answered, and as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account: For in this sort doe the Greekes marshall the Persian Kings with the times of their reignes.

fol. 135.

Melancthon giues Cyrus but 29.	Cyrus in all.	30
Melancthon 20	Cambyses , with the Magi .	8
	Darius Hystaspes .	36
	Xerxes .	21
	Artaxerxes Longimanus .	40	years.
Melancthon 40	Darius Nohus .	19
Melancthon 26.	Artaxerxes Mnemon .	43
	Artaxerxes Ochus .	23
	Artanes .	3
Melancthon 4.	Darius the last.	6

Which numbers, put together, make in all two hundred and thirtie.

This account (as I have said) the most Chronologers and the best learned approve. These Persian Princes being all warranted by the authoritie of the Scriptures, as Peencer in his historical Animaduersions hath gathered the places; finding first Cyrus in the second of Chronicles, chap. 36. vers. 22, 23. Ezra 1. chap. 1. vers. 1. and often elsewhere.

Secondly, Cambyses in the 1th of Daniel who may indeede be well esteemed for one of those three Kings in the second verse named, and so the marginall Commentor vpon the Geneva vnderstands that place; but, vnder correction, mistakes the matter greatly, when he saith in the same note, that Darius Hystaspes was an enemy to the people of God; and stood against them: his great fauour and liberality to the Iewes being elsewhere proved.

Thirdly, is Darius Hystaspes found in Ezra the first, c. 4. v. 5. who in the sixth verse is also named Ahasuerus.

Fourthly, in the eleuenth of Daniel verse the second, Xerxes is plainly foretold and described, and the great warre which hee should make against the Greekes by Daniel remembered.

Fiftly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verse seuen, who is also called Artahastia, c. 4. 1. lib. Ezra vi. 7. and cap. 7. v. 7.

Sixty, Darius Nohus, Ezra cap. 4. vers. 24. & esp. 5. vers. 6. Nehem. cap. 12. vers. 22.

Seuenthy, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Neh. c. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Artanes: for Darius the last he was of another Familie, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who descended from Xerxes the sonne of Ateissa, Cyrus his Daughter; and the issue male of Cyrus failing with his owne Sonnes.

But to proceede. Eusebius with the Latines, following the Greekes, apply the beginnings and ends of euery Persian King with their Acts, to some certaine Olympiad; As the war of Astyages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Ahyattes (Cyrus his Father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus reigne to the beginning of the five and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The inuasion of Aegypt by Cambyses to the third year of the threecore and third Olympiad, and so of the rest. Which reference with good agreement betwene severall formes of computation adde the more credit vnto both.

Again, this historickall demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomickall computation of Ptolomie, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of Nouember, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the four hundred and foure and twentieth year of Nabonassar. And the Eras of Nabonassar begonne on the sixe and twentieth of Februarie: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth Month of the first year of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the account of the Olympiads, as doe the Greeke Historians, or that of Nabonassar with Ptolomie, we shall finde euery memorable accident to fall our right with each computation.

lib. 3. cap. 8.

For Ptolomie reckons the time answerable to two hundred and foure and twentie Italian yeares, and an hundred and fortie daies from Nabonassar, to the sixteenth of Iulie in the seuenth year of Cambyses.

The Greekes, and namely Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Aegypt by Cambyses in the second or third year of the threecore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyses seuenth year in the first of the threecore and fourth Olympiad: which first of the threecore and fourth Olympiad runnes along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonassar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewise the twentieth of Darius, who succeeded Cambyses, is according to Ptolomie the two hundred and sixe and fortieth of Nabonassar, which (observing the differences of Nabonassar, Era and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twentie yeares) it agrees with the third of the threecore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greekes. In this Iosephus agrees with the Greekes throughout, siting that he ioyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus, in the destruction of Babylon, which is true, and not contrarie to the Greece computation, but may very well stand with it.

Lastly, the disagreements and confused accompts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian Kings formerly rehearsed, doth giue the greater credit to this of the Greekes, which being constant in it selfe, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

of CAMBYSES, and the conquering of Aegypt by him.

WE will therefore according to the truth giue the Empire of Persia to Cambyfes, the sonne of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, saving the desire to increase the greatnesse of his Empire: whereof hee was possesse in his Fathers time while Cyrus made warre in the North. Cleſius with others giue him a longer raigne than agreeth with the Greece accompt before receiued.

In the fifth year of his sole raigne, and in the third year of the threescore and third Olympiad, according to Diodor and Eusebius, he invaded Aegypt, and hauing 10 ouerthrowne the King thereof, Pſammenitus, he not only caused him to bee slaine, but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his children.

Herodotus and Cleſius giue cause of this Warre (being no other indeede than the Ambition of Cambyfes) that when he sent to Amasis King of Aegypt, to haue his daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predecessor, which Cambyfes disdained.

How soeuer it were; true it is, that Cambyfes gathered an Armie fit for such an enterprise, and caused the same to march. But before they entred Aegypt, Amasis died and left Pſammenitus, whom Cleſius calleth Amirtaus, his succellour; who in- 30 joyed Aegypt after his father (according to the best copies of Herodotus) but sixe Moneths, though other Chronologers giue him fixe years.

But how long soeuer he held the Crowne, in one battaile he lost it, and was himselfe taken prisoner.

It is said that Cambyfes following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered King, but that hee also trusted him with the government of Aegypt, and that vpon some reuolt, or the suspicion thereof, hee caused him to bee slaughtered. But the race of this King was not so extirpated, if wee may beleue Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a Sonne called Inarus, who caused the Egyptians to reuolt both from Xerxes and Artaxares.

*Neither did the Romanes euer consume their dead to ashes, till the time of Sylla Diodor, who caused his owne to be deuoured by that element, fearing the Law called Tulliana, yet like for like, because himselfe had vntombed the caualerie of Caius Marius after his death

That Pſammenitus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyfes, I hold it very 40 improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amasis the King of Aegypt, who died before his arriuall, that hee caused his body to bee drawne out of the graue, and after diuers indignities vsed, commanded the same to bee burnt, contrarie to the custome both of the Egyptians and Persians. For the Egyptians vsed to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugges, to the end the wormes might not deuoure them. The * Persians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feede it with Carrion.

§. III.

§. III.

The rest of CAMBYSES his acts.

FTER this victorie obtained in Aegypt, Cambyfes sent an Armie into Cyprus, and constrained Euelthon King thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Island of the Egyptians.

While Cambyfes yet busied himselfe in Aegypt, he so much detested the Idolatrie of that Nation, as he caused the Images themselves, with 10 the Temples wherein they were worshipped, to bee torne downe and defaced. That done, he directed a part of his Armie into Lybia, to ouerturne the Temple of Iupiter Ammon; but the Deuill in defence of his Oratorie raised such a tempest of Sand, wherewith the greatest part of that Country is couered, as the Persians were there-with choked and ouerwhelmed.

Notwithstanding which misadventure, Herodotus and Seneca report, that disdaining to be resisted, he prepared the rest of his Armie, which himselfe meant to con- 15 duct into those parts, but that finding a beginning of those incommodities, which his first sent troupe had tried, hee changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings haue power ouer men, yet the Elements doe not obey them, according to that old English proverb, Go with the King, stay with the Tide.

After his returne from the attempt of Aethiopia, hee caused Apis the Egyptian Bull, worshipped by that Nation as God, to be deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeale, and beene executed as in seruice of him that only is, and liueth. But soone afterwards, when in a dreame it seemed vnto him that Smerdis did sit in the royall Throne of Persia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) hee gaue it in charge to his fauourite Praxaspes, to murder Smerdis his brother. And hauing married his owne sisters, contrarie to the Persian Lawes, hee committed a most causelesse and most detestable murder vpon the one of them, called Meroe, then by himselfe with child, because shee bewailed the death 30 of her brother Smerdis. I finde it written of this Cambyfes, That because his Predecessors obserued religiously the ordinances of their Empire, he assembled his Iudges and enquired of them, whether there were any law among the Persians that did permit the brother to marrie his owne sister: it being his owne intent so to doe.

The Iudges (who had alwaies either lawes or distinctions in store to satisfie Kings and times) made answere, that there was not any thing written allowing any such coniunction, but they notwithstanding found it in their customes, that it was alwaies left to the will of the Persian Kings to doe what best pleased themselves; and so, as Cauesius termes it, inuenerunt occasionem: That is as much to say, as the Iudges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselves. And yet, where it concerned not the Kings priuate satisfaction, hee caused Pſammenus one of his Iudges, and perchance one of those which fauoured his incestuous march, to bee slaine a liue for an vnjust iudgement giuen, and the same his hide to bee hung vpon the iudgement seate. After which bestowing the fathers Office on his sonne, hee would him to remember, that the same partialitie desrued the same punishment.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exercised against the sonne of his beloved Praxaspes was very strange and vngratefull. For when he desired to bee truly informed by him what the Persian thought of his conditions, Praxaspes answered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praise from all men; only it was by many obserued that hee tooke more than vnall delight in the tast of Wine. Which 50 which taxation inflamed, hee vsed this replication: And are the Persians double tongued, who a so tell me that I haue in all things excelled my Father Cyrus? thou Praxaspes shalt then wittesse: whether in this report they haue done mee right: for if at the first thou I pierce thy sonnes heart with an arrow, then is it false: that hath bene spoken; but if I misse the marke, I am then pleased that the same be accounted true true, and my subiects beleueed. This being spoken, he directed an arrow towards the innocent child, who falling dead with the stroke, Cambyſes commanded his bodie to be opened, and his heart being broched on the arrow, this monstrous Tyrant greatly reioicing, shewed it to the Father with this saying, in stead of an Epitaph: Now PRAXASPES thou maieſt reſt placely thy ſelfe that I haue not loſt my wits with wine, but the Perſians theirs, who make ſuch report.

Many other barbarous cruelties hee exerciſed, till at the laſt, according to the phraſe of our Law, he became ſeas he ſay. For when he was informed that Patiſates, and Smerdis the Magi, (Cædrenus writeth them Sphenidanes and Cimerdus) Miniſters of his domeſticall affaires, taking advantage of the great reſemblance betweene Smerdis the Kings brother, and Smerdis the Magus, poſſeſſed themſelves of the Empire, hee made all haſt towards Perſia, and in mounting haſtily on horſe-backe, his ſword diſ-theathing pierced his owne thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling into an ouer-late and remedieleſſe repentance of the ſlaughter which hee had executed vpon his owne brother, he ſoone after gaue vp his wicked ghoſt, when hee had reigned eight yeares, accounting therein thoſe ſeuene Moneths in which the Magi gouerned, while he was abſent.

pag. 117.

In Cambyses the Mac mine of Cyrus failed. For he had no iſſue either by Aroſſa or Terpe; yet Darius out of Hecrome giues him a Daughter called Pantaptes, and a ſonne called Orenes, who being drowned in the Riuer Ophites by Antioch, the ſame was afterward in memorie of the Princes death called Orenes.

He built the Citie of Babylon in Aegypt, in the place where Lalopolis was formerly ſeated, and that of Meroe in the Iſland of Nilus, calling it by the name of his ſiſter Meroe.

§. IIIL.

Of the inter-regnum betweene CAMBYSES and DARIVS.

CYRVS and his two ſonnes being now dead, and the Kingdome in the poſſeſſion of one of the Magi, the counterſait of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Prouinciall Gouernours of the Empire (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyſus, Aſſaphines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all deſcended from Achamenes the firſt Perſian King, hauing diſcouered the fraud of this impoſture, ioyned their forces together, ſurpriſed and rooted out the Conſpirator with his Companions, and aſſiſtants. In which action ſaith Herodotus Intaphernes and Aſſaphines were ſlaine; but Herodotus otherwiſe, that they were only wounded, for he ſaith, that all the ſeuene Princes were preſent at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Gouernour, theſe Princes grew into conſultation how the ſame might be ordered from thence-forth. Otanes one of the ſeuene did not ſancie any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities ſhould confederate, and by iuſt lawes defend their libertie in equalitie, giuing diuers reaſons for his opinion, being as it ſeemed greatly terrified by the cruelties of Cambyses; As firſt, that it was not ſafe to giue all power to any one, ſeeing greatneſſe it ſelfe, euen in good men, doth often infect the minde with many vices, and the libertie and freedom in all things is moſt apt to inſult, & to commit all manner of wicked outrage. A gaine, that tyrants do commonly vſe the ſeruices of wicked men, and fauour them moſt; they vſurpe vpon the lawes of their Countrey; take other mens wiues by force, and deſtroy whom they pleaſe without iudgement.

Megabyſus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyrannie of a multitude was three more intolerable, than that of one. For the multitude doe all things without without iudgment runne into buſineſſe and affaires with precipitation, like raging and ouer-bearing floods.

He therefore thought it ſafeſt to make election of a few, and thoſe of the beſt, wiſeſt, and moſt vertuous; becauſe it is euer found that excellent Counſailers are euer had from excellent men.

Darius gaue the third iudgement, who perſwaded the creation of a King, becauſe euen among few diſturbance of concord is ſeldome found, and in great Empires it doth euer happen that the diſcord of many Rulers hath inſort the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, ſaith Darius, farre ſafer to obſerue the Lawes of our Countrey, by which Kingly gouernement hath bene ordained.

The other foure Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the ſame Imperiall gouernement by God eſtabliſhed, and made prosperous. And to auoide partialitie, it was accorded, that the morning following theſe ſeuene Princes ſhould mount on Horſe-back, and on him the Kingdome ſhould be conferred, whoſe horſe after the Sunne-riſing ſhould firſt ney or Bray. In the evening after this appointment was made, it is ſaid that Darius conſulted with the Maſter of his horſe Ocharnus, who in the Suburbs of the Citie when the election was reſolued of, cauſed the ſame Horſe, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to couer a Mare, who as ſoone as he came into the ſame place was the firſt horſe that brayed. Whereupon the other fixe Princes deſcended from their horſes, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Plato in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memorie of the ſeuene Princes, whereof Darius himſelfe was one, that deliuered the Empire from the vſurpation of the Magi, hee diuided the whole into ſeuene gouernements; Herodotus ſaith into twentie Satrapies.

Of DARIVS his Lineage.

DARIVS was deſcended of the ancient Perſian Kings, to wit, of the Achæmenides, of which, Cyrus the Great was the lineall Succellour. For in this ſort Herodotus deriues him as before.

Cyrus the firſt, who had Teiſpius, who begat Ariaramnes, who was father of Aſſananes, the father of Hyaſſapes, the father of Darius, ſurnamed Celes, the father of Xerxes.

to be sent into Persia, others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was deliuered, and made Governour of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyfes into Egypt; he then ioynd with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the neyng of his horse, or, as others affirme, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he the more assured to himselfe by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Nieces for his wiues.

Hysaspes, according to * Herodotus, had besides Darius these three sonnes, who were great Commanders in the warre which Darius made in Asia the lesse, Thrace, Macedon, and Greece; Atarnes, Artaphernes; and Artabanus, who diswaded Xerxes from the second Graecian warre. Hysaspes had also a Daughter married to Gobryas the Father of Marcellinus, who commanded the Armie of Darius in Macedon, and married the Daughter of Larus, Arctozofire his Cosen germaine.

Reineccus giues to Hysaspes five sonnes, Darius who succeeded Cambyfes, Artabanus, Artaphernes, Olanes, and Atarnes, with two daughters.

§. II.

Of Darius his gouernement, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

DARIUS deuised equal lawes whereby all his subiects might be gouerned, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gaue access to all his subiects, and behaued himselfe so mildly to all men that many Nations desired and offered themselves to become his Vassalls: Only hee laied duers paymments and taxes on the people, which had not bene accustomed in Cyrus time, to the valew of fouretene thousand five hundred and threescor talents, saith Herodotus.

The warre which Cambyfes made a farre off in Egypt, and the contention betwene the Magi, and the Princes of Persia, for the Empire, gaue heart to the Babylonians to recouer their libertie, and to shake off the Perlian yoke, whereof Darius being aduertised, he prepared an Armie to recouer that Citie and State reuolted. But finding the same a difficult worke, he vied the seruite of Zopirus, who for the louche bare Darius, did cut off his owne Eares and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to flic to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the crueltie of Darius: who, for hauing giuen him aduice to giue ouer the siege of their Citie, had in this sort dismembred and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gaue him that credit as they trusted him with the disposition and commandment of their greatest forces: which when Zopirus had obtained, after some small colourable ouer-throws giuen to the Persians vpon sallies, hee deliuered the Citie into Darius his hands, who had lye before it twentie Moneths.

§. III.

Of Darius his fauour to the Iewes in building the Temple.

IN the second yeare of Darius, hee gaue order that the building of the Temple at Iherusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his owne charge, and out of the reuenues of the Crowne. And whereas the Gouernours of those Prouinces which are situate betwene Euphrates, and the Phanician, and midland Sea, (whom Ezra calleth the Captaines beyond the Riuer) had hindred the worke in Cambyfes his time, Darius gaue commandment that they should not thenceforth come neare vnto Ierusalem, to giue any impediment to the building, but that they should should with-draw themselves, and get them farre off till all were finished and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, procul recedite ab his; With-draw your selues farre from them; In our Englishe, Be yee farre from thence, to wit, from the Citie, and Temple, now in building.

Hee also made a decree, which concerned his owne Subiects, That whosoever should thence forth hinder the setting vp of the Temple of God, that his house should be torne downe, and the disturber hanged on a Gallows made of the Timber thereof. He also in the same decree maketh inuocation to God, That hath caused his name to dwell there, (to) destroy all Kings and people that put to their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Ierusalem, &c. In foure yeares after which decree (the Iewes being really furnished with money and all things necessarie for Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth yeare of Darius Hysaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first returne.

§. IIII.

Of Darius his Scythian Warre.

AFter the recouerie of Babylon hee inuaded the Scythians, whose King Iustine calleth Lathienus; and saith, that Darius vnder-tooke this warre against him, because hee refused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to conuoy his Armie into Scythia, hee built a Bridge of small Vessells ouer the Riuer Ister or Danubius, and gaue the custodie of the same in charge (among others of Asia the lesse) to the Ionians and Aolians; among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Graecians to breake downe the bridge, to the end Darius might not returne thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficultie; but the same was resisted by Histiasus Prince of Milet, a Citie of Ionis, which Nation being a Colonie of the Graecians, Diodorus calleth Tartors to their Countrie, because they ioynded themselves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good slaues, for as much as they would not runne away from their Master, but were more mindfull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondages; when they were presented with as faire an occasion of libertie as could haue bene desired. For the great Armie of Darius entring the desert Countrie called Bessarabia, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any succour to relieue them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chim Tartars, their posteritie, at this day, all horse-men, vying the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Graefers, driuing their Heards from one place to another as opportunity of pasture led them. Standing Townes they had none, but vied for Houses the Waggon wherein they carried their wiues and children. These Waggon they place at euery Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Towne, remouable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himselfe, called now the great Chim, any other Citie than such an Agora, (as they name it) or Towne of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himselfe, and wasted his prouision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither waies to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or liuing creatures, nor any thing at all, which either hee himselfe might make vse of, or by destroying it might grieue his enemies; he began to perceiue his owne folly, and the danger into which it had brought him. Yet sitting a good face vpon a badde game, he sent braue messagers to the Scythians, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make triall of his valour and fortune in plaine battaille. Or if he acknowledged himselfe the weaker, then to yeeld by faire means, and become his Subiect giuing him Earth and Water, which the Persians vied to demand as a signe that all was yeelded vnto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Heroglyphicall answer; sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and five Arrows: which dumb shew

Darius interpreting by his owne will, thought that hee did yeeld all the Elements wherein those creatures live, and his weapons withall into his handes. But Gobryus one of the seven Princes who had slaine the Agagi, contrived their meaning a-right, which was thus; O yee Persians, get yee wings like Birds, or doe under the water, or creepe into holes in the earth, for else yee shall not escape our wronges. And this interpretation was soone verified by the Scythians themselves, who assailed the Persian camp, draue the horse-men into the trenches, and vexing the Armie with continuall Alarums day and night, were so fearelesse of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and even in his light, they did not forbear the pastime of courting a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of theirs Darius was so discouraged that he forooke his Camp by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were like and weake behinde him, and so with all speede marched away towards the River Ister. Hee was pursued hardly by the Scythians, who mist him, yet arriuing at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Persian King should neuer more be able to doe them either good or harme. Which wordes had certainly bene proued true, had not Hystianus the Attilian prevailed with his people, to attend the coming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise faile to meete, when they returned from Iusto secke him out.

Arivs hauing thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the inuasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which Warre hee employed Megabius, who murthered the Paeonian, and transplanted them, and posselt Perinthus, Chalcedon, Bizantium, and other places, being also soone after subiected, and added to the Persian Empire by Otanes, the sonne of Sisymanes whom Cambyses had exoriated for false iudgement. So were the Cities of Scythia and Carcia likewise taken in for the Persian, who hauing now reduced vnder his obeyfance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadors to Amintas King of Macedon adioyning, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the Soueraignetic ouer that Kingdome. Amintas doubting his owne strength, entertained the Embassadors with gentle wordes, and afterward inuiting them to a solemne and magnifcent feast, the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might bee present: which being granted, the Embassadors who were well filled with wine, and presumed vpon their greatnesse, and many victories, beganne to vse such imbracings, and other lasciuious behauiour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings Sonne, great Grand-father to Alexander the Great, disliking the Persians barbarous presumption, besought his father to withdraw himselfe from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadors, whom withall hee entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while, promising their speedie returne. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-fauoured young-men to clothe themselves in the same garments, and to vse the same attires which the Ladies had worn at the feast, giuing them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long knives, of which they were provided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soone after giuen by Darius for a seuer reuenge of this murder. But Alexander somewhat before the death of Amintas, gaue his sister Gyges in marriage to Bubarus, a principall Commander of Perinthus Forces on that side, who perswading her husband how helpfull the Alliance of Macedon would proue for the inuasion of Asia intended, so prevailed, as Alexander der escaped that tempest, which threatened to fall vpon him very suddenly; the warre of Asia the lesse, called Ionick, falling out at the same time.

§. VI.

The first occasion of the Warre which Darius made vpon Greece, with a rebewfall of the gouernement in Athens, whence the quartell grew.

Now the better to vnderstand the reason and motiues of that great Warre, which followed soone after, betweene the Persians and Grecians, it is necessarie to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citie indured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius inuasion on that side the Sea with admirable successe. Neither doe I hold it any impertinencie, to be large in vnfolding euery circumstance of so great a businesse, as gaue fire to those warres, which neuer could be thoroughly quenched, vntill in the ruine of this great Persian Monarchie, Persopolis the capitall Citie of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadfull as in the pride of their greatnesse, the Persians had raied in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former bookes it may be gathered, how Athens, and other parts of Greece, were anciently gouerned, the same being already set downe, though scattering, and in seuerall times, among other the Contemporarie occurrences of the Emperors, and the Kings of Iudea; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember againe the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedemonians they maintained still their ancient policie vnder Kings, though these also after some fiftene descents bridled by the Ephori.

Cleobius King of the Athenians in the former bookes remembred, who willingly died for the libertie of his people, was therefore so honoured by them, as (thinking none worthe to succede him) they changed their former gouernement from Monarchicall to Princes for terme of life, of which Medon the sonne of Coarus was the first, after whom they were called Medontidae; and of these there were twelue Generations besides Medon, to wit.

Megacles.

Solon, and others, who are the lesse to be regarded, by reason of the yearly change.

This Solon being a man of excellent wisdom, gave lawes to the Athenians, which were published according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth yeare of Tarquinus Priscus, and were in after-ages derived vnto the Romans, and by the Decem-viri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into twelve Tribles, which were the ground of the Romane lawes. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, wherein his owne duties violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed vnto the practise and maintenance of a popular government; the estate of Athen was very soone changed into a Monarchie by Pisistratus the sonne of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions whereof Megacles and Lycurgus two Citizens of noble Families were become the heads, tooke occasion by their contention and insolencie to raise a third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plausible, for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in generall. Having by this means obtained loue and credit, he wounded himselfe, and feining that by malice of his enemies he had like to haue bene slaine for his loue to the good Citizens, he procured a guard for his defence, and with that band of men surprizing the State-houfe, or Cittadell of Athen, hee made himselfe Lord of the Towne; Hegesistratus being then Gouvernour. But the Citizens who in euery change of government had fought to remoue themselves further and further from the forme of a Monarchie, could so ill brooke this vsurpation of Pisistratus, that he was driuen for lack of helpe to flie the Towne, as soone as Megacles and Lycurgus toyning their forces attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his tyrannie founded vpon the dissention of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; so was it soone after well redressed by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his owne, he did (as is the vsuall practise of the weaker side) call in the common enemy Pisistratus, to whom he gaue his Daughter in marriage; by which alliance the Familie of the Alcmaonides, whereof Megacles was chiefe, became very powerfull, yet so that Pisistratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alcmaonides, and especially Megacles being incensed against Pisistratus for his mildmanner towards his Wife. Wherefore they practised with the Souldiers of the Towne, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so farre, that Pisistratus vpon the first discouerie of their intent, perceived no other remedie for his affaires than to with-draw himselfe to Eretria, where hee remained cleuen yeares. Which time being expired, having hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, hee againe recovered the principallitie of Athen: after which third obtaining his estate, hee gouerned Athen seuentene yeares, according to Aristotle, and reigned in all thirte and three yeares, saith Eliaius, but as Justine hath it foure and thirte, accounting the time belike as well before before as after his severall expulsions. Herodotus giues the Father and the Sonne fixe and thirte yeares; Aristotle fixe and thirte. But Thucydides affirmeth, that hee died very old, leauing for his Successours his two Sonnes Hippias and Hipparchus, who gouerned the Athenians with such moderation, as they rather seemed the Lineall Successours of a naturall Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, and some three yeares before Hippias was expelled out of Athen, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucydides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with vnaturall lull after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled

Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that hee was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers and authors of that scandall. Hippias fearing that this enterprife vpon his brother had more and deeper rootes than were apparent, first sought to discouer the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton; by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who because shee would not reueale her Companions, did cut out her owne tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himselfe, enter into a strait amitie with Aantides, Tyrant of the Citie Lampascus, whom hee knew to be greatly fauoured by Darius, to whose Sonne Hipparchus hee gaue one of his Daughters in marriage. But some three yeares after the death of his brother, doubting

I know not what strong practise against himselfe, hee beganne to vse the Citizens with great seueritie, which neither Pisistratus the Father, nor Hippias himselfe had ever exercised during their vsurpations till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing least that this disease might rather increase, than diminish in Hippias, they stirred vp Cleisthenes one of the noblest and best able of their Citie, to practise their deliuerie: who calling to his assistance the banished Alcmaonides, together with an Armie of the Lacedemonians, ledde by Cleomenes their King, so affrighted Hippias, as by composition hee gaue ouer his Citie, and the possession of Athen, and from thence imbarcking himselfe tooke land at Sigeum, whence hee went to Lampascus in Asia gouerned by Aantides, who presented him to Darius. Hee was deprived of his estate, as Herodotus and Thucydides agree, twentie yeares before the battle of Marathon: all which time he continued, partly with Aantides, at other times with Artaphernes Lieutenant for Darius in Sardis, the Metropolis of Lydia; perswading and practising the enterprife vpon Athen, which Darius in the end to his great dishonour vnder-tooke, twentie yeares after Hippias had resigned his estate.

Thus farre I haue digressed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceiue the better the causes and motiues of this warre: whereof the hope that Hippias had to be restored to Athen by the helpe of Darius, which made him so licke and perswade the Persians to conquer Greece, was one; but not the most vrgent.

§. VII.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principall cause of the warres ensuing betwixt Greece and Persia.

Another, and a strong motiue to this expedition, was the Ionick warre, breaking out in Asia about the same time. The Colonies transported out of Greece in Asia, which occupied the greatest part of the Sea-coast, having enioyed their libertie about five hundred yeares, euen from the Ionick migration, to the time of Croesus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards, as parcell of his Dominions, were taken in by

But as it is the custome of all Nations halfe conquered (witnesseth Ireland) to rebell againe vpon euery aduantage and opportunitie: so did the Ionians, and other Gracians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, seeke by all meanes possible to free themselves.

At this time they found such men readie to spurre them into Rebellion, as had by the Persian beeing giuen vnto them for bridles, to hold them in subiection. Euery one of those Townes had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the gouernment of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Persian, by whose only might they held the people in subiection. And this their dutifull affection they had well declared, when Darius being in great extremitie, they vied all meanes to deliuer him and his Armie (that otherwise had beene lost) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great peece of seruice Histiass the Tyrant of Miletus expected the chiefe thanks, as hauing beene chiefe Author of their expecting Darius, when the rest, either perswaded by the Scythians, or carried away with their owne desires, were readie to haue abandoned him. But it came so to passe that Darius being more fearefull of the harme that Histiass (being powerfull and craftie) might doe to him in the future, than mindfull of the good which he had alreadye receiued at his hand, found meanes to carrie him a-long to Susa, where hee detayned him with all kinde visage of a friend, yet kept such good espiall vpon him, as an enemy, hee could not start away. Histiass had subtiltie enough to discouer the Kings purpose, which ill agreed with his owne desires. For he thought it more pleasant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citie, hauing a small Territorie, than to sit and feast at the great Kings table, and heare the counsailes by which a large Empire was managed; being himselfe an idle beholder, and enjoying with much restraint of libertie, none other pleasures than a priuate man might bestow vpon himselfe.

Wherefore hee bethought himselfe of raising of some tumules in the lower Asia, to pacifie which if he might be sent, as one that had great experience and authoritie in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to stay at home, and either satisfie the King with excuses, or deale as occasion shall require. Resolving vpon this course, hee sent very secret instructions to Aristagoras his kinsman, whom hee had left his Deputie at Miletus, aduising him to stirre vp some Rebellion. These directions came seasonably to Aristagoras, who hauing failed in an enterprize vpon the Isle of Naxos, through the false dealing of a Persian his Associate, stood in feare of disgrace, if not of some further ill that might befall him, as one that had wasted the Kings treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore hee readily embraced the counsaile: and the better to draw the whole Countrie of Ionis into the same course, which hee determined to runne, hee abandoned his tyrannie, and did set Miletus at libertie. This plausible beginning wanne vnto him the hearts of the Milesians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom some hee tooke and sold as slaues to their citizens, others hee chased away) caused the whole Nation to bee at his command. The Persian fleet, whereof hee lately had beene Admirall in the enterprize of Naxos, hee had surprisid in his first breaking out, together with the principall Officers, and Captaines; so that now hee thought himselfe able to deale with the great Kings forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would shortly be vpon his neck, and crush both him and his assistants to peeces, vnlesse that hee were able to raise an Armie that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were insufficient to performe. Therefore hee tooke a journey to Sparta, where hauing assaied in vaine with many arguments, and the offer of fillic talents, to win to his partie Cleomenes King of the Lacedaemonians: hee went from thence to Athens, and with better success be sought the people to lend him their assistance. The Athenian Embassadors which had beene sent to the Persian Kings Lieutenants in the lower Asia, desiring them them not to giue countenance to Hippias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answeres, hauing found verie churlish entertainment. So that the euill which they were to expect in all likelihood from the Persian, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their consanguinitie with the Ionians, and the persuasions of Aristagoras, drew them on apace, if perhaps his treasures were not helping. Twentie shippes the Athenians furnished for this voyage; to which the Eratrians added five more, in regard of ancient kindeesse that had passed betweene the Ionians and them. With these and their owne forces joynd, the Ionians entred the Riuer Caistrus, which falleth into the Sea by Ephesus: by which aduantage they surprisid Sardis when no enemy was heard of or suspected; in so much, as the Eratrians, who ruled as Vice-roy in those parts, had no other hope of safetie, than by retreating himselfe into the Castle, which the Gracians could not force: from whence he beheld the slaughter of the Citizens, and the Citie flaming.

The Persians at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defiance, and recovered the Market place, strengthened by the Riuer Pactolus, which ranne through it, and borrowing courage from desperation, they both defended themselves, and charged their enemies; who well aduiling themselves, made all the halt they could toward the Sea side. But Artaphernes hauing gathered all the strength he could, pursued the Gracians, and found them neere Ephesus; where setting resolutely vpon them, hee slaughtered a great part of their Armie; the rest fawing themselves in Ephesus. In this fight Euaclides, Capitaine of the Eratrians, perished: but his fame and memorie was by that excellent Poet Simonides preferred. After this ouerthrow, the Athenians, which were sent to Aristagoras and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, nor by their teares, be perswaded to make any second triall of their fortunes, on that side the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noyse in the world, than the good success which the Persians had in one or two skirmishes; could raise. Wherefore the Ionians brauely proceeding, wone a great part of Caria; and sending their Fleet into the Hellepont, got Bisantium and other Townes into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyses, began hereupon to take heart; and entring into confederacie with the Ionians, who were able to giue them aid by sea, rebelled against the Persians.

These newes coming to the eare of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatred of the Athenians, vpon whom hee vowed to take sharpe reuenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to thinke, that they would not haue dared to attempt such things, but by the instigation of those, to whom their ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to prouoke him. This was the maine ground of the Warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against Athens: To which, the solicitation of Hippias, before remembered, gaue onely some forme and assistance: the bulinesse, when once it was thus farre on foot, being like enough to haue proceeded, though hee had perished ere it were aduanced any further.

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Persia against many of the Islanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Greekes; for all of them gaue to his Rebels free harbour: the Islanders moreover did hope to furnish out a Naue of three hundred and sixtie vailie against him. These prouocations did rather breede in him a desire to abate their pride, than any feare of harme that they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surpris. In euerie fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yett lost the fruits of their discipline, wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captaines. In one sea-fight by the Isle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the vpper hand; but they were Phoenicians, Aegyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished: neither was that victorie of any vse to them; the Cyprians, in whose aid they came, being utterly beaten by the Persian Armie at Land, and reduced into their old subjection. So had the Persians likewise by open warre and faire force overthrowne the Carians in two battales, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recovered the Townes vpon Hellepont, with some Æolian and Ionian Cities: when Artaxerxes with his friends: quitting Attica, fled into Thrace, desirous to feare himselfe in Amphipolis, a Colonie of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territorie belike hee landed, overthrew him, and cut his troups in peeces.

About the same time, Hystian the first mover of this insurrection came downe into those quarters; who hauing undertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whome his double-dealing was detected.

But this euasion preferred him not long. For after many vaine attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, least the King should pardon him vpon remembrance of old good turnes; as it seemes that hee would haue done, by the buriall which he commaunded to be giuen to his dead bodie that was crucified, and by his heauie taking of his death.

Hystian had sought to put himselfe into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his condition, chose rather to keepe him out, and make shift for themselves, without his helpe. The strength of their Citie by land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings, and their good Fleet which promised vnto them the libertie of an open sea, emboldened them to trie the vttermost, when very few friends were left upon that Continent to take their part. But their Nauie was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forsaking them vpon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the causeless flight of those that should haue assisted them. Neither was it long before the Towne itselfe being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens slaine, their wiues and children made slaues, and their goods a bootie to the Persians, whome for fixe yeares space they had put to so much trouble.

§. VIII.

The Warre which Darius made vpon Greece, with the battaile of MARATHON, and Darius his death.

His warre with good successe finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable successe; Darius obtinate in the enterprise and conquest of Greece (though at first he pretended to make the warre but against the Athenians and Eretrians, who jointly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his embassadours demand an acknowledgement from them all: among whome, some of them not so well resolved as the rest, submitted themselves, as the Ægians and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed (by the assistance of the Lacedemonians, after diuers encounters forst them to giue pledges, and to relinquish the partie of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedemonians in this warre, and caused his companion King Demantus to be deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius, farre the more confident of victorie, by reason of these discords, alienations, and ciuile warres among the Greekes. He therefore gaue order to Hippagoras to prepare a Fleet of shippes fit to transport his Armie ouer the Hellepont: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and tenne thousand horse. The charge in chief of his Armie he committed to Datis, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the sonne of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athen twentie yeares before, and by Ataphernes his brother, Gouverneur of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the lesse. These Commanders hauing their Companies brought downe to the Sea-side, imbarked themselves in fix hun-hundred Gallies and other Vessels; and first of all attempted the Islands called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way betwene Asia the lesse, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces ouer the Ægean Sea; but on the contrary they might alwayes both relieue themselves in their passage, and throw themselves from all suddaine tempests and outrage.

To this end they first possessed themselves of Samos, secondly they attempted Ægea: Which Island, the inhabitants despairing of their owne forces, abandoned. So did the people of Deles, of which Apollo was native: Which Island Darius did not onely forbear to sicke, but recalling the inhabitants, he gaue order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacrifice, to Apollo erected. And hauing recovered these and other Islands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Euboea; for that Citie (as already hath bene shewed) had assisted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians tooke ground, and besieged Eretria verie straitly, and after fixe dayes assault, partly by force, and in part by the treason of Euphalus and Philagius, they tooke it, sacked it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus farre the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sayles. From Euboea the Persians past their Armie into Ariea, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athen, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed towards Athen.

The Athenians finding the time arriued, wherein they were to dispute with their owne vertue against Fortune, and to call lots for their libertie, for their wiues, their children, and their liues, put themselves in the best order they could to make resistance, and withall sent away with speed to the Lacedemonians for succour, employing in that Negotiation one Phidippides; who passing through Attica, encountered in the way a familiar Diuell, which he supposed to be Pan, who willed him to assure the Athenians of victorie, promising that some one of the Gods should be present at the battaile to assist them and defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his returne seeing he could not bring with him any present succours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly auailing to bring newes from the Gods, and promise of assistance from Heauen, which no doubt (though the deuice was likely to be his owne) yet it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages haue bene more stirred vp with fond Prophecies and other like superstitious fooleries, than by any just cause or solide reason. The Athenians being now left to themselves, with one thousand onely of the Platians (who hauing bene formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thebians, did in this extremitie witness their thankfulness and gratefull disposition) began to dispute, Whether it were most for their advantage to defend the wals of Athen, or to put themselves into the field with such forces as they had, the same consisting of tenne thousand Athenians, and one thousand of the Platians. In the end, and after great diuerſitie of opinions, Athistides, who persuaded the triall by battaile, prevailed. The Armies being now in view, and within a myle of each other, the Athenians disposed themselves into three troups: two wings or hornes, as they teame them, and the bodie of a battaile. The Persians, when they perceived so small a Troope aduancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather disposſt of their vnderstanding, than possſt with the resolution whereof they made shew. So inuincible and resistless the Persians esteemed their owne numbers to be, and that small troupe of their enemies then in view, rather to be despised than to be fought withall: But in conclusion, the victorie being doubtfully balanced for a while, (some the vertue of the Grecians, and sometimes the number of the Persians prevailing, the Grecians fighting for that they had, the Persians for that they needed not, these great forces of Darius were disordered and put in rout; the Athenians following their victorie euen to the Sea-shore; where the Persians, so many of them as lost not their wits with their courage, saved themselves in their shippes.

The

The Persian Armie consisted of an hundred thousand foot and tenne thousand horse; of which there were slaine in the place fixe thousand three hundred, and of the Grecians an hundred foure score and twelue. For howsoeuer it came to passe, either by strange visions, which were afterward called Panic terrors, or by some other affright, it seemeth, that the inuading Armie, after the first encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and lost that number, by Herodotus let downe, in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Iulius report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian Armie were slaine, the same hath no appearance nor possibilitie of truth. In this fight Hippias the persuader of the enterprise was slaine, sayth Lamius and Cicero; but Suidas tells vs, That he escaped and died most miserably in Lesnos.

Ad Att.

The greatest honor of this victorie was cast vpon Atilides, who both persuaded the trait by battaile, and behaued himselfe therein answerably to the counsell which he gaue. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but young and of the first beard. Those of the Grecians, of marke and commandement, that fell in the first encounter, were Cullmachus and Sicilius. It is also said, That Cynegyrus following the Persians to their embarking, layd hands on one of their Gallies, to haue held it from putting off the shore, and hauing his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which being also deprived, he tooke hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first year of the three score and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the Warre made by Corsolanus against his fellow-Romans: Alexander the sonne of Amintas being then King of Macedon, and Phenippus then Governour of Athens, according to Plutarch; or Hyblades, after Hyalcarnissus.

In vita Arist.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned backe into the lesser Asia, Atilides fought and obtained an employment against the Islanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and passing ouer his Companies in three score and tenne Gallies, after fixe and twentie dayes assault he brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith him selfe being made vnable, and his companies discouraged, he returned to Athens; where those vngratefull Citizens forgetting all his seruices past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battaile of Marathon, did by the persuation of Xantippus, the father of Pericles (who enuied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fiftie Talents; where his weak and wounded bodie being not able to endure the one, nor his estate to pay the other, he after a few dayes ended his life.

Which enuie of the better sort to each other, with their priuate Factions, assisted by the vnthankfull and wilsie people, brought them, not many yeares after, from a victorious and famous Nation to base subiection and slaueerie. Atilides left behind him one sonne called Cymon, begotten on Hegisipia, daughter of Olurus King of Thrace, who (sayth Plutarch) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to Themistocles in understanding, but exceeded them both in iustice and good gouernment.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recouer his honour, than sorrow for the losse recieued in Greece, gaue order for new leuies of men, and all other warlike provisions. But the Agyptians revoltuing from his obedience (a Kingdome of great strength and reuenuie) greatly distracted his resolution for the reuinuation of Greece. The dissention also among his sonnes; of whom, the younger being borne after he was King, and by so great a mother as Atossa, diddained to giue place to his elder brother, borne before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affaires, gaue end to all his consultations and enterprises, and joyined him to the earth of his ancessors, about a yeare after the battaile of Marathon, and after that he had reigned fixe and thirtie yeres. He left behind him fise sonnes, namely Artabanes, borne before he obtained the kingdome, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achemenes gouernor of Egypt, Majestes and Anabages.

Of XERXES.

§. 1.

The preparation of XERXES against Greece.

XERXES received from his father, as hereditarie, a double Warre; one to be made against the Agyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Grecians; of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the success: ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this Warre, which was chiefly bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were diuided in opinion. Marctanus, who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Assacion, vnder Darius, and had also Hystaspes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his sister Atossa, perswaded by many arguments the Europe in warre. But Artabanes, brother to the late Darius, and vncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous success of the two late inualions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsell. The one in person vpon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants vpon the Greekes; in each of which Darius left to his enemies both his Armie and his honour.

He therefore besought Xerxes to be right well aduised before he did too farre imbarke himselfe in this businesse. For whatsoeuer vndertaking hath deliberate and sound counsell for conductor, though the success doe not alwayes answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variableness of her owne nature, which only the diuine Prouidence and not any humane power, can constraime.

But to obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanes, as whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred which he made knowne to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion and counsell) assisted the Grecian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the Warre of Egypt was ended, foure yeares were consumed in describing and gathering an Armie for this inualion: which being compounded of all Nations subiect to the Persian Empire, consisted of fiftene hundred thousand foot, and eightie thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts for Carriage, if we may beleue Herodotus: for of this multitude, Tragus findes the number lesse by seven hundred thousand footmen.

The Commandours of the severall Nations were the Princes of the bloud of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commandements of this nature giuen, some few people excepted, who had of their owne leaders.

The charge of the whole Armie was bestowed on Mardonius, the sonne of Gobryas by a sister of Darius, to whom were joynd some others of Xerxes his nearest kindred, as Generals ouer all; sauing that the charge of tenne thousand select Persians, called the immortall Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died or were slaine, there was another preſently choſen in his ſtead) was giuen to Hydarnes, the eightie thouſand horſemen were led by the ſonnes of Darius, who commanded the late Armie of Darius in Greece.

The Fleet of Gallies were two thouſand two hundred and eight, furniſhed by the Phoenicians, who had Commanders of their owne Nation, and by the Cypriotes, Cilicians, Pamphilians, Lyicians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Æolians, and Helleſpontines; who were truſted with the furniſhing of their owne Veſſels, though commanded by the Princes of Perſia, as by Artabanus the ſonne of Darius, and others. The reſt of the Veſſels for transportation were three thouſand. There were alſo certaine Gallies furniſhed by Artemiſia, the daughter of Lygdamis, Princeſſe of Halicarnasſus, 10 and the Iſlands adioyning, which her ſelfe commanded. Thoſe Gallies by her prepared and furniſhed, exceeded all the reſt of the Fleet, excepting thoſe of Ziden, in which Xerxes himſelfe was imbarcked.

¶ II.

XERXES Armie entertained by PYTHIUS: His cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his bridge of Boates ouer the Helleſpont: and the diſcouſe betwene him and ARTABANVS vpon the view of his Armie.

Hen this world of an Armie was thoroughly furniſhed, he cauſed all the Nations of which it was compounded to make their Rendez-vous and repaire at Sardis in Lydia. And when hee had aſſembled to the number of ſeuentee hundred thouſand foot, as he entred the bodie of Celanus, he was by one Pythius the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flockes and Heards of Cattell gaue food to Xerxes and his whole Armie. The Feaſt ended, he alſo preſented him with two thouſand Talents of Silver, and in Gold foure Millions, wanting ſeuē thouſand of the Perſian Darius, which make ſo many of four markes.

The King overcome with the exceeding liberalitie of Pythius, did not only reſuſe his treaſure offered, but commanded that ſeuē thouſand Darius ſhould be giuen him to make vp his foure Millions; of which, ſo many thouſands were wanting when he made the preſent. But ſoone after, when Pythius beſought him to ſpare one of his ſiue ſonnes from his attendance into Greece (becauſe himſelfe was old, and had none whom he could ſo well truſt as his owne ſonne) Xerxes moſt barbarouſly cauſed the young man, for whom his father ſought exemption, to be fundered into two parts, commanding, that the one halfe of his carkaſſe ſhould be layed on the right, and the other halfe on the left hand of the common way by which the Armie marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea ſide. The one was a paſſage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Athos, making the ſame (with the halfe Iſland or Headland, whereon it ſtood) to be an entire Iſland, fundering thereby from the Continent of Thrace ſiue Cities, beſides the Mountaine and the Cherſoneuſus or Necke of Land it ſelfe: a worke of more oftentation than of vſe, and yet an enterpriſe of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent hauing but twelve furlongs (which make about a mile and halfe) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough only for two Gallies to paſſe in front. The Cities ſo ſeuered from the maine, were Tyon, Olaſphyſus, Aerethoon, Thyſus, and Cleona.

He alſo gaue order, that a Bridge vpon Boats ſhould be made ouer the Helleſpont 50 betwene Abidus and Sestos, the Sea there hauing a myle of breadth, wanting an eight part; which after the finiſhing, was by a Tempeſt torne aſunder and diſſeuered: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than diſcouraged, commanded thoſe to be ſlaine that were maſters of the worke, and cauſed fixe hundred threeſcore and fourtee fourtee Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge, which by the art and induſtrie of the Phanicians was ſo well anchored to reſiſt both windes blowing into and from the Euxine Sea, as the ſame being well boorded and rayed, the whole Armie of ſeuentee hundred thouſand foot, and foureſcore thouſand Horſe, with all the Moyles and Carriages, paſt ouer it into Europe in ſeuē daies and ſeuē nights, without intermiſſion. This tranſportation of Armies did Cæſar afterward vſe. And Caligula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finiſhed, and the Armie brought neere to the Sea ſide, Xerxes tooke 10 a view of all his Troupes aſſembled in the Plaines of Abidus, being carried vp and ſeated on a place ouer-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adioyning: and after he had gloried in his owne happineſſe, to behold and command ſo many Nations, and ſo powerfull an Armie and Fleet, he ſuddenly (notwithſtanding) 15 burſt out into teares, moued with this contemplation, That in one hundred yeares there ſhould not any one ſuruiue of that marvellous multitude: the cauſe of which ſudden change of paſſion when he vttered to Artabanus his vncle, Artabanus ſpoke to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the diſſolution of this great Troupe within that number of yeares by the King remembred, is, That the life it ſelfe which we enioy is yet more miſerable than the end thereof: for in 20 thoſe few dayes giuen vs in the world, there is no man among all theſe, nor elſewhere, that ouer found himſelfe ſo accompanied with happineſſe, but that he oftentimes pleaſed himſelfe better with the deſire and hope of death than of liuing; the incident calamities, diſeaſes, and ſorrows whereto mankind is ſubiect, being ſo many and ineuitable, that the ſhortest life doth oftentimes appeare vnto vs ouerlong; to auoid all which, there is neither refuge nor reſt but in deſired death alone.

With this melancholie diſcourſe Xerxes being not much pleaſed, prayed Artabanus not to ouer-caſt thoſe joyes which they had now in purſuit with ſad remembrances. And holding ſtill a doubtful conceit, that Artabanus vtterly condemned the 30 inuafion of Greece, againſt which he had formerly giuen many ſtrong reaſons, deſired him to deale freely with him, Whether he were returned to his firſt reſolution, that the enterpriſe of Greece could not be ſucceſſfull? Or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Viſion, he was confident of good ſucceſſe? Artabanus notwithſtanding that he aſſured himſelfe of the Kings reſolution to goe on, and dared not by any new Arguments to batter the great purpoſe it ſelfe, yet he told the King, That there were two things which marvellouſly affrighted him, and which the King ſhould finde, as he feared, to be moſt aduerſe; to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, becauſe it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of ſo great a Fleet: inſomuch, as if any tempeſt ſhould ariſe, all 40 the Continent of Greece could hardly receiue them, nor all the Hauens thereof afford them any ſaſetie: and therefore when ſuch ſhelter ſhall be wanting vnto them, he prayed him to vnderſtand, that in ſuch a caſe of extremite men are left to the will and diſpoſition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and diſpoſition of men. The Land, beſides other incommodities, will be found by ſo much the more an enemy, by how much the vnſatiate deſire of man to obtaine more and more thereof, doth lead him forward: for were there no man found to giue reſiſtance, yet the want of meanes to feed ſuch an Armie, and the Famine, which cannot be prevented, will without any other violence offered diſinable and conſume it. By theſe Arguments Artabanus hoped to haue diuerted Xerxes, not daring per chance 50 to vtter what indeed he moſt feared; to wit, the overthrow of the Armie it ſelfe both by Sea and Land, which ſooner followed. Theſe Cautions were exceeding weightie, if Xerxes his obſtinacie had not miſperſed them. For to inuade by Sea vpon a perillous Coaſt, being neither in poſſeſſion of any Port, nor ſuccoured by any partie, may better fit a Prince preſuming on his fortune, than enriched with vnderstanding. Such was the enterprife of Philip the second vpon England in the year 1588, who had belike neuer heard of this Counsell of Atabam to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point, it was very likely, that Xerxes his Armie, which could not haue lesse in it than two millions of Soules, besides his beafts for Seruice and Carriage, should after a few dayes suffer famine, and vſing Machiueli words, Maurice ſays conſeſſes, die without a knife. For it was impoſſible for Greece, being a ragged, ſtrait, and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food (beſides what ſerued themſelues) for twenty hundred thouſand ſtrangers, whom they neuer meant to entertaine but with the ſharpened points of their weapons, deſtroying withall whatſoeuer they could not well incloke and defend. Nay, if we may beleue Herodotus, the Armie of Xerxes, being reviewed at Thermopyla, conſiſted of five millions, two hundred eighty three thouſand two hundred twenty men, beſides Landreſſes, Harlots, and Horſes, and was therefore likely to endure a ſpeedie famine.

The effect of Xerxes his anſwere was, That it was impoſſible to prouide for all things; and that whoſoeuer ſhould enterprife any great matter, if he gaue the hearing to all that could be objected of accidentall inconueniences, hee ſhould neuer purſue the ſame farther than the diſpute and conſultation: which if his predeceſſors, the Perſian Kings, had done, they had neuer growne to that greatneſſe, or poſſeſſed ſo many Kingdomes and Nations as they now did, and therefore concluded, That great enterpriſes were neuer vndertaken without great perils. Which reſolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any neceſſitie had enforſt him to that warre. But ſeeing the many Nations newly conquered, which hee already commanded, were more than could be conſtrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull proſperitie of the Perſians endured, and that Greece was ſeparated by the Sea from the reſt of Xerxes Dominions (of whoſe reſolution his father Darius had made a deere experience) the fruit of this warre was anſwerable to the plantation, and the ſucceſſe and end agreeable to the weak counſell whercon it was grounded. Furthermore, thoſe millions of men which hee tranſported, and yet in his owne judgement not ſufficient (for he gathered in marching on, all the ſtrength of Thrac and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to feare the Greekes by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and reſolution, whome he conducted. For it is wiſely ſaid of thoſe vncountable multitudes: Non vires habent ſed pondus, & impedimenta potius ſunt quam auxilium; They are great in bulke, but weak in force, and rather a luggage than an aid.

Beſides, as it was impoſſible to marſhall ſuch a world of men in one Armie, ſo the diuers Nations, ſpeaking diuers Languages, bred the ſame conſuſion among the Perſian Commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to worke. Whereas if Xerxes had of his five millions compounded tenne Armies of fifty thouſand choſen ſouldiers in each, and ſent them yearly into Greece well victualled and furniſhed, he had either preuailed by the ſword, or forſt them to forſake their territorie, or brought them in obedience by neceſſitie and famine, which cannot be reſiſted. But while Xerxes reſolved to cut downe the banks of Greece, and to let in a ſea of men vpon them, he was deceived both in his owne hopes, and in their hearts whome he employed, and beaten by the Greekes, both by Land and Sea; yea, he himſelfe, conducted by his feare, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Armie was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintered in Theſſalie, and led by Mardonius, who perſuaded the Enterpriſe, was in the Summer following utterly defeated, and himſelfe ſlaine.

§. III.

Of the fights at Thermopyla and Artemiſium.

Fier ſuch time as Xerxes had tranſported his Armie over the Helleſpont, and landed in Thrace, (leaving the deſcription of his paſſage a-long that Coaſt and how the Riuer of Liffus was drunke drie by his multitudes, and the Lake neere to Piſſyrus by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will ſpeake of the encounters he had, and the ſhamefull and incredible ouerthrowes which he received: As firſt at Thermopyla, a narrow paſſage of halfe an acre of ground, lying betweene the Mountaines which diuide Theſſalie from Greece, where ſometime the Phocians had rayſed a wall with gates, which was then for the moſt part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedemonians, aſſiſted with one thouſand Tegeate and Manincans, one thouſand Arcadians, and other Peloponneſians, to the number of three thouſand one hundred in the whole, beſides one thouſand Phocians, foure hundred Thebans, ſeuene hundred Theſſians, and all the forces (ſuch as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the paſſage two whole dayes together againſt that huge Armie of the Perſians. The valour of the Greekes appeared ſo excellent in this defence, that in the firſt dayes fight Xerxes is ſaid to haue three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the deſtruction of his Armie by one handfull of thoſe men, whom not long before he had utterly deſpiſed: and when the ſecond dayes attempt vpon the Greekes had proued vaine, hee was altogether ignorant how to proceede further, and ſo might haue continued, had not a run-agate Graecian taught him a ſecret way, by which part of his Armie might aſcend the ledge of Mountaines, and ſet vpon the backs of thoſe who kept the Straits. But when the moſt valiant of the Perſian Armie had almoſt incloſed the ſmall forces of the Greekes, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedemonians, with his three hundred, and ſeuene hundred Theſſians, which were all that abode by him, reſuſe to quit the place which they had vndertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not onely reſiſt that world of men which charged them on all ſides; but iſſuing out of their ſtrength, made ſo great a ſlaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquiſhers, though all of them were ſlaine vpon the place. Xerxes hauing loſt in this laſt fight, together with twenty thouſand other Souldiers and Captaines, two of his owne brethren, began to doubt what inconuenience might befall him by the vertue of ſuch as had not bene preſent at theſe battailes, with whome he knew that he ſhortly was to deale. Eſpecially of the Spartans he ſtood in great feare, whoſe manhood had appeared ſingular in this tryall, which cauſed him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring into the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, That when one thought to haue terrified him by ſaying, That the flight of the Perſian Arrowes was ſo thicke as would hide the Sunne; he anſwered thus: It is very good newes, for then ſhall we fight in the coole ſhade.

Such notable reſolution hauing as freely bene expreſſed in deedes, as it was uttered in words, cauſed the Perſian to ſtand in great doubt, when he heard that the Citie of Sparta could arme well-nigh eight thouſand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedemonians, though inferior to thoſe, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counſell of Demaratus, a baniſhed King of the Spartans, who had alwayes well aduiſed and inſtructed him in the things of Greece, what courſe was fitteſt to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces would aſſemble together to defend the Iſthmus, that ſtraight necke of ground which joyneth Peloponneſus to the Continent. For which cauſe he aduiſed, That three hundred ſhippes well manned ſhould be ſent vnto the Coaſt of Laconia, to ſpoyle the Countrey, and to hold the Lacedemonians and their neighbours buried at home, whilst Xerxes at his leisure having subdued the rest, might afterward bring his whole power upon them, who remaining destitute of succour would be too weak alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Leemarus further advised, that the said fleet of three hundred ships should seile upon the land then called Cythera, now Crige, which lying neere to the Coast of Leconia, might serve as a fit place of Recreasement upon all occasions either of their owne defence or endamaging the enemy: whereby that ancient speech of Chilen the Lacedemonian should be verified, that it were better for his Countrey-men to haue that Ile drowned in the Sea than stand so inconueniently as for them it did. What effect this counsell might haue taken had it been followed it is not easie to guess. But a contrarie opinion of Achemenes brother to King Xerxes was preferred as the safer. For the Persian fleet had bin sorely vexed with a grievous tempest, which continued three whole daies together, wherein were lost vpon the coast of Magnesia foure hundred ships of warre, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foretold, that if any such calamitie should ouertake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to giue them succour. Therefore Achemenes perswaded his brother not to disperse his fleet; for if (said he) after the losse of foure hundred shippes wee shall find away other three hundred to seeke adventures, then will the Greekes be strong enough by Sea to encounter the rest of the Nauie, which holding altogether is inuincible. To this counsell Xerxes yielded, hoping that his Land-armie and fleet should each of them stand the other in good stead, whilst both held one course and lay not farre asunder. But herein he was farre deceived; for about the same time that his armie had felt the valour of the Greekes by Land, his Nauie likewise made a sorrowfull proofe of their skill and courage at Sea. The Grecian fleet lay at that time at Artemisium in the straits of Euboea, where the Persians thinking to incompaile them, sent two hundred saile about the land to fall upon them behinde, vying a like stratagem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas in a caue not vnlike, but with farre different successe. For that narrow channell of the Sea which diuideth Euboea from the maine was in the same sort held by a Nauie of two hundred threescore and eleuen saile against the huge Persian Armada, as the straits of Thermopylae had formerly bene maintained by Leonidas, till he was so circumvented as this Nauie might haue been, but was not. The departure of those two hundred shippes that were sent about the land, and the cause of their voyage, was too well knowne in the Persian fleet, and soone enough disclosed to the Greekes, who setting saile by night met them with a counter-surprise, taking and sinking thirtie vessels, inforcing the rest to take the Sea, where being ouertaken with foule weather they were driuen vpon the rocks and all cast away. Contrariwise the Nauie of the Greekes was increased by the arriuall of fiftie three Athenian ships, and one Leonian which came to their partie in the last fight. As these new forces encouraged the one side: so the feare of Xerxes his displeasure stirred vp the other to redeme their losse with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their vnfortunate policie, they resolu'd in plaine fight to repaire their honour, and casting themselves into the forme of a Crescent, thought so to inclose the Greekes, who readily did present them battell at Artemisium.

The fight indured from noone till night, and ended with equall losse to both parts. For though more of the Persians shippes were sunke and taken, yet the lesse losse fell altogether as heauie vpon the Greekish fleet, which being small could worke better it. Herein onely the Barbarians may seeme to haue had the worse, that they forsooke the place of fight, leaving the wracke and spoiles to the enemy, who nevertheless were faine to abandon presently euen the passage which they had vnderaken to defend, both for that many of their ships were sorely cruell in the battell, and especially because they had receiued aduertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylae. Before they waied anchors, Themistocles generall of the Athenians engraued vpon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they they should reuolt vnto the Greekes or stand neutrall; which persuasion he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

§. IIII.

The attempt of Xerxes vpon APOLLO's temple: and his taking of Athens.

10 When Xerxes had passed the straits of Thermopylae he wasted the Countrey of the Phocians and the regions adioining: as for the inhabitants they chose rather to flie, and referre themselves to a day of battaile, than to adventure their liues into his hands, vpon hope of sauing their wealth by making proffer vnto him of their seruice. Part of his armie he sent to spoile the Temple of Delphi, which was exceeding rich by means of many offerings that had there been made by diuers Kings and great personages; Of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inuentorie than of the goods left in his owne Palace. To make relation of a great astonishment that fell vpon the companies which arriued at the Temple to haue sacked it, and of two Rocks that breaking from the mount Parnassus ouerwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peradventure somewhat superfluous. Yet Herodotus, who liued not long after, saith, That the broken Rocks remained euen to his memorie in the Temple of Minerva, whither they rowled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing he beleued that Apollo was a God, he should not haue dared to entertaine a couetous desire of enriching himselfe by committing sacrilege vpon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licence to chastise his impietie, in such manner as is reported, was granted vnto the Diuell, by that Holie one, who saith, Will a man spoile his Gods? and elsewhere, Haue any nation changed their Gods, which yet are no Gods? Go to the Iles of Kittim, and behold, and send to Kedar and take diligent heed, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impietie of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Persians alleaged the burning of Cybele Temple by the Athenians, when they set fire on the Citie of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground and cause of the wait which they made in burnings of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterprise against Delphi, this Vizzor of holie and zealous reuenge falling off, discovered the face of couetousnesse so much the more ouglie, by how much the more them selues had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kind by mere mischance.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did may be exprest briefly thus. He came to Athens, which finding forsaken he took, & burnt the Cittadell and temple: which was there-40 in. The Cittadell indeed was defended a while by some of more courage than wisdom, who literally interpreting Apollo's Oracle, that Athens should bee safe in woodden walls, had fortified that place with boords and Palissades: too weak to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might haue yielded it vpon tolerable conditions, had they not vainely relied vpon the propheticie: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the interpreter, applying rather the wordes to the present neede, than fashioning the businesse to wordes.

p. V.

How THEMISTOCLES the Athenian drew the Greekes to fight at Salamis.

THe Athenians had, before the coming of Xerxes, removed their wives and children into Trazene, Ægina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses, and lands, as their freedom, and the common libertie of Greece. Neuertheless this great zeale, which the Athenians did shew for the generall good of their Countrey, was ill requited by the other Greekes, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for them at Salamis, whilst they removed the wives and children out of their Citie. But when the Citie of Athens was taken, it was presently resolved vpon, that they should forsake the Ile of Salamis, and with draw the fleet to Isthmus: which neck of land they did purpose to fortifie against the Persians, and so to defend Peloponnesus by Land, and Sea, leaving the rest of Greece, as indefensible, to the furie of the enemy. So should the Ilands of Salamis and Ægina have beene abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestowed as in places of securitie) have beene given ouer into mercilesse bondage. Against this resolution Themistocles, Admirall of the Athenian fleet, very strongly made opposition; but in vaine. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with feare of loosing their owne, which they would not hazard, that no persuasions could obtaine of them, to regard the estate of their distressed friends; and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made vnto them, to allure them to abide the enemy at Salamis. As first in priuate vnto Eurybiades the Lacedemonian, Admirall of the whole fleet; That the selfe same feare which made them forsake those coasts of Greece, vpon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the first) cause them also to dissiue the fleet, and euery one of the Confederates to with draw himselfe to the defence of his owne Citie and estate; Then to the Councell of Warre which Eurybiades vpon this motion did call together (forbearing to obiekt what want of courage might worke in them hereafter) he shewed that the fight at Isthmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, hauing the fewer ships, to determine the matter in the straights; and that, besides the safeguard of Ægina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding, where they then were, sufficiently defend Isthmus, which the Barbarians should not so much as once looke vpon, if the Greekes obtained victorie by Sea: which they could not so well hope for else where, as in that present place which gaue them so good advantage. All this would not serue to retaine the Peloponnesians, of whom one vnworthy of memorie, vpbraided Themistocles with the losse of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for suffering one to speake in the Councell, that had no Countrey of his owne to inhabite. A base and shamefull obiection it was, to lay as a reproch that losse, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignitie did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a reply so sharpe, as auailed more than all his former persuasions. Here told them all plainly, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer Citie, than any Nation of Greece could boast of, hauing well-near two hundred good ships of Warre, the better part of the Grecian fleet, with which it was easie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the world, and settle themselves in a more secure habitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremitie had refused to stand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a Towne in Italie belonging of old to the State of Athens, of which Towne he said an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in processe of time should build it a new, and there (quoth hee) will we plant our selues, leaving vnto you a sorrowfull remembrance of my words, and and of your owne vnthankfulnesse. The Peloponnesians hearing thus much, beganne to enter into better consideration of the Athenians, whose affaires depended not, as they well perceiued, vpon so weake termes, that they should be driuen to crouch to others; but rather were such, as might enforce the rest to yeeld to them, and condescend euen to the vttermost of their owne demands.

For the Athenians, when they first embraced that Heroicall resolution of leauing their grounds and houses to fire and ruine, if necessitie should enforce them so farre, for the perseruatiō of their libertie; did imploy the most of their priuate wealth, and all the common treasure, in building a great Nauie. By these means they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no such calamitie should befall them by land, as might not well be counterpoised by great advantages at Sea: Knowing well, that a strong fleet would either procure victorie at home, or a secure passage to any other Countrey. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships they did somewhat amend their Nauie. Whereby it came to passe, that, had they beene vanquished, they could not have expected any other fortune than either present death, or perpetual slauey; neither could they hope to be victorious without the assistance of the Athenians, whose forces by Sea did equall all theirs together; the whole consisting of no more than three hundred and fourescore bottomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their owne condition, which would haue stood vpon desperate points, if the fleet of Athens had forsaken them; were soone perswaded, by the greater feare of such a bad euent, to forget the losse, which they had conceiued of the Persians; and laying aside their insolent brauerie, they yeelded to that most profitable counsaile of abiding at Salamis.

p. VI.

How the Persians consulted about giuing battaile: and how THEMISTOCLES by policie held the Greekes to their resolution; with the victorie at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

IN the meane season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were conuenient to offer battaile to the Greekes, or no. Therewith the Captaines giuing such aduise as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soone agreed vpon the fight; but Artemisia Queene of Halicarnassus, who followed Xerxes to this warre in person, was of contrarie opinion. Her counsaile was, that the King himselfe directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to passe that the Greek Nauie, (vnable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of prouision) should presently be dissiue, and euery one seeking to perserue his owne Citie and goods, they should, being diuided, proue vnable to resist him, who had wonne so farre vpon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to giue battaile; so on the other side the danger will be more (saide shee) which we shall vnder-goe, than any neederequireth vs to aduerture vpon; and the losse, in case it fall vpon vs, greater than the profit of the victorie which we desire. For if we compell the enemies to flee, it is no more than they would haue done, wee sitting still: but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put vs to the worst, the iourney to Peloponnesus is vtterly dasht, and many that now declare for vs, will soone reuolt vnto the Greekes. Marodonius, whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the fleet, related vnto his Master the common consent of the other Captaines, and withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her aduise, yet resolute vpon following the more generall, but farre worse counsaile of the rest; which would questionlesse haue beene the same which Artemisia gaue, had not feare and flatterie made all the Captaines vtter that as out of their owne indgement, which they they thought most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indecide that Xerxes had entertained a vaine persuasion of much good, that his owne presence vpon the shore to behold the conflict, would worke among the Souldiers. Therefore he incamped vpon the Sea-side, pitching his owne Tent on the mount Agaleus which is opposite vnto the Ile of Salamis, whence at eale he might safely view all which might happen in that action, hauing Scribe about him to write downe the acts and behaviour of euery Capitaine. The neare approach of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence, which their Countreimen shewed in fortifying the Siphnus, and of a Persian Armie marching a-pace thither, did now againe so terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no intreatie, nor contedation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it more needesse to fight for a Countrey already lost, when they rather should endeavour to saue that which remained unconquered; propounding chiefly to themselves what miserie would befall them, if loosing the victorie, they should be driuen into Salamis, there to bee shut vp, and besieged round in a poore desolate land.

Hereupon they resolved forth-with to let saile for Siphnus: which had presently beene done, if the wisdome of Themistocles had not prevented it. For he perceiving what a violent feare had stopp'd up their eares against all good counsaile, did practise another course, and forth-with labour to prevent the execution of this vnwholsome decree; not suffering the very howe of performance to find him busie in wrangling alteration. As soone as the Councell brake vp, hee dispatched secretly a trustie Gentleman to the Persian Capitaines, informing them truly of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Naue about the Island, which encompassing the Greekes might prevent their escape; giuing them withall a false hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than beleueed these good newes, well knowing that the victorie was their owne assured, if the Athenian fleet ioynd with them; which they might easily hope, considering what abilitie their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Capitaines with rich rewards, and the People with restitution of their Citie, and Territories. By these meanes it fell out, that when the Greekes very early in the morning were about to waigh Anchor, they found themselves inclosed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all night, sending many of their ships about the Ile of Salamis, to charge the enemy in reare, and landing many of their men in the Ile of Pistates, which lieth ouer against Salamis, to saue such of their owne, and kill such of the Gracian partie, as by any misfortune should be cast vpon the shore. Thus did more needesse enforce the Greekes to undertake the battaile in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victorie, stemming the foremost of their enemies, and chaling the rest, who falling foule one vpon another, could neither conveniently fight nor flee. I doe not finde any particular occurrences in this great battaile to be much remarkable. Sure it is that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisome taske of writing downe many disasters that befell the Persian fleet, which ill acquitted it selfe that day, doing no one peece of seruice worthie the presence of their King, or the registering of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might well seeme to haue wrought out that victorie with equall courage, were it not that the principall honour of that day was ascribed to those of Aegina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flie towards Phalerus, where the Land-Armie of Xerxes lay, the ships of Aegina hauing possessed the straights did sinke or take them, whilst the Athenians did valiantly giue charge vpon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

of things following after the battaile of Salamis: and of the flight of XERXES.

FTER this victorie, the Greekes intending, by way of scrutinie, to determine which of the Capitaines had best merited of them, in all this great seruice; euery Capitaine, being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write downe his owne name, but in the second place, as best desiruing next vnto himselfe, almost euery Suffrage did concurre vpon Themistocles. This priuate affection yielded vnto vertue, as soone as her owne turne was serued. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamitie, beganne to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in such fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper, might easily discern his faint heart, through his painted looks. Especially Mardonius, Author of the warre, began to cast a warie eye vpon his Master, fearing least his counsaile should bee rewarded according to the event. Wherefore purposing rather to adventure his life in pursuit of the victorie, than to cast it away by vndergoing his Princes indignation; he aduised the King to leaue vnto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces he promised to reduce all Greece vnder the subiection of the Persian Scepter. Here-withall he forgot not to sooth Xerxes with many faire wordes; telling him, that the cowardise of those Aegyptians, Phenicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like metall, nothing better than slaves, who had for ill behaued themselves in the late Sea-seruice, did not concerne his honour, who had alwaies beene victorious, and had already subdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athenis selfe, against which the Warre was principally intended. These wordes found very good acceptance in the Kings eare, who presently becooke himselfe to his journey homewards, making the more halt, for that he vnderstood, how the Greekes had a purpose to saile to Heliopont, and there to breake downe his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greekes had no such intent, but rather wished his hasty departure, knowing that he would leaue his Armie not so strong, as it should haue beene, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybiades giue counsaile that by no meanes they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, least needesse should enforce the Persians to take courage, and rather to fight like men, than die like beasts. Wherefore Themistocles did, vnder pretence of friendship, send a false aduertisement to this timorous Prince, aduising him to conuay himselfe into Asia with all speede, before his bridge were disolued: which counsaile Xerxes tooke very kindly, and hastily followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were so that he found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torne in sundry tempests, and he thereby driuen to imbarke himselfe in some obscure vessell, it is not greatly materiall, though the Greekes did most willingly imbrace the later of these reports. Howsoever it were, this flight of his did well ease the Countrey; that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which as Locusts, had before ouerwhelmed it.

§. VIII.

The negotiations betweene MARDONIUS and the Athenians, as also betwene the Athenians and Lacedemonians; after the flight of XERXES.

ARDONIUS with his three hundred thousand had with-drawne himselfe into Thessalie, whence he sent Alexander, the sonne of Amynas, King of Macedon, as Embassadour to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses receued, and of extending their Territories as farre as their owne desires; allowing them to retaine their their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that Warre.

The Athenians had now reentred their Citie, but not as yet brought back their wiues and children, for as much as they well perceived that the place could not be secure, till the Armie of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedemonians, vnderstanding what faire conditions this Embassadour would propound, were perplexed with very great feare, least hee should finde good and readie acceptance. Hercupon they likewise very speedily dispatched their Embassadours for Athens, who arriuing before the Macedonian had audience, vsed the best of their perswasion to retaine the Athenians firme. They alleaged that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had only threatened the subuersion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselves in defence of that Citie, were drawne into the quarrell, wherein the Athenians without much crueltie in iustice could not leaue them. Wee know, said they, that yee haue indured great calamities, loosing the fruit of the grounds, and being driuen to forsake the Towne, the houses whereof bee ruined, and vnfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, we vndertake to maintaine as our owne, your wiues and children amongst vs, as long as the warre shall continue, hoping that yee, who haue alwaies procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into slauierie and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their wordes and othes are of no assurance. It was needlesse to vse many arguments to the Athenians, who gaue answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadours; That whilst the Sunne continued his course they would be Enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither gold nor any riches, with which he might seeke to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wiues and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustaine themselves, only desiring the Lacedemonians, that with all speede they would cause their Armie to march, for as much as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long sit still in Thessalie, hauing once receiued such a peremptorie answer. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to invade Attica, they found themselves nothing decciued. For hee, as soone as Alexander had returned their obinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith leade his Armie towards them, and their Citie: they hauing now the second time quitted it, and conueyed themselves into places of more securitie abroad in the Countrey, where they expected the arriuall of their Confederates.

From Athens he sent his Agent vnto them with instructions, not only to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his partie. His hope was that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses so often, would bee desirous to perswade them from fire, and to haue those which were already laid wast, reedified at the Kings charges; Or if this affection tooke no place with them, but that needes they would relie vpon their old Confederates, whose succours did very slowly aduance forwards, yet perhaps the Leaders might bee wonne with great rewards, to draw them to his purpose; all which projects if they should faile, the destruction of Athens would be a good meane to please his Master King Xerxes, who must thereby needes vnderstand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their owne Countrey. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lyidas, or (as Demosthenes calls him) Cyrillus, aduised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propound them to the people; all the Senators, and as many as abiding without the Counsaile-house heard what he had said, immediately set vpon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were feare or money, that had moued him to utter such a vile sentence. Yea the women of Athens in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counsaile, and bad end, assembling together, did enter his house there, and put his wife and children to the like execution. All

All this brauerie notwithstanding, when they perceived the slacknesse of the Peloponnesians in giuing them aide, they were faine to betake themselves to Salamis againe, the old place of their securitie. Remaining there, and seeing little forwardnesse in those whom it most concerned to assist them, they sent very seuerie messiges to Sparta, complaining of their slacknesse, and threatening withall, to take such course as might stand best with their owne good, seeing that the common estate of all was so little regarded. These messengers were at the first entertained with dilatorie answers, which euery day grew colder, when as the Peloponnesian Wall, builded at thwart the Isthmus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedemonians waxed careless and dull, so the Athenians hotly pressed them to a quick resolution, giuing them plainly to vnderstand, that if they should hold on in those dilatorie courses, it would not be long ere the Citie of Athens tooke a new course, that should little please them. All this while the Persian fleet lay vpon the coast of Asia, not daring to draw nearer vnto Greece, as being now too weake at Sea. Likewise the Greekish Nauie contained it selfe within the Harbours vpon Europe; both to doe seruice where neede should require at home; and withall to shunne the danger which might haue betfallen any part of it, that being distracted from the rest had aduentured ouer farre. So mutuall feare preferred in quiet the Islands lying in the midst of the Aegean Seas. But it was well and seasonably obserued by a Counsaillor of Sparta, that the wall vpon Isthmus would serue to little purpose for the defence of Peloponnesus, if once the Athenians gaue eare to Mardonius: considering that many dores would be opened into that Demie-land, as soone as the Enemy should by winning the friendship of Athens, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Lacedemonians vpon this admonition, making better perfall of their owne dangers, were very careful to giue satisfaction to the Athenian Embassadours, who not brooking their delaies, were vpon point of taking leave, yea as it seemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore dispatching away five thousand Spartans in the euening, vnder conduct of Pausanias; they gaue audience the next day to the Embassadours, whose complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readinesse; deeply swearing that the Armie of Sparta was already farre vpon the journey; and giuing them leaue to take vp other five thousand Lacedemonians, out of the Region adjoining, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though distastful such want of grauitie, in a matter so important, were neuertheless contented with the final conclusion; and leuying the number appointed of Lacedemonian Souldiers, made what hast they could to incamp in Attica. The other Greeks were nothing slack in sending forth Companies, whose neare approach caused Mardonius to forsake Attica as a rough Countrey, and therefore of much disaduantage to Horle, wherein consisted the best of his power. Before his departure he burnt the Citie of Athens, beating downe the walls of it, and ruining all that had formerly escaped the furie of Warre.

The great battaile of Plataea.

It were too long a rehearseall to shew all that happened in many skirmishes betwene the Greekes and him, in the Countrey of Beotia, which Mardonius had chosen to bee the seat of that Warre. Much time was spent before the quarrell was decided by triall of one maine battaile; for both parties did stand vpon their guard, each expecting when the other should assaile them.

The Armie of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him chosen out of Xerxes his Armie; to whom were adjoynded the forces of Thebes, Macedonie, Thessalie, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persian, furnished furnished his Campe with fiftie thousand men. Against these the Lacedaemonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leuied an Armie of one hundred and ten thousand, of which fortie thousand were waightly armed, the rest were only assistants to these fortie thousand, being armed more lightly, as rather to make excursions and gae chafe, than to sustain any strong charges.

These two Armies hauing euery daies confronted one the other, without performing any memorable peece of seruice; Mardonius, whose victuals beganne to faile, resolued to beginne the fray. The Greekes were promised victorie by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plaine of Ceres and Proserpina, making prayers vnto certaine Gods, Demi-Gods, and Nymphs. But it was hard to finde the certaine place which the Oracle designed. For the plaine of Ceres was indeede in the Territorie of Athen; but there was also an old Temple of Ceres and Proserpina, neare vnto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewise the memorials of those Nymphs, and Demi-Gods, were in the same place, vpon Mount Citharon, and the ground serued well for foot-men against horse; only the Land belonged vnto the Platians, and not vnto the Athenians.

Whilste the Greekes were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtfull Oracle, the Platians, to make all cleare, did firely bestow their Land on that side the Towne vpon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Platians caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, to reedifie their Citie, which was ruined in the Peloponnesian warres.

All things being readie for battaile; the Lacedaemonian Generall thought it most meete, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Aeolians and Perjians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertaine the Thebans and other Greekes which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and hauing beaten them often-times before. This being agreed vpon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedaemonians; which Mardonius vnderstanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Aeolians and Perjians had seene heauie proofe, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the bravest Souldiers of Greece) hee did also change the order of his battaile, and opposit himselfe to Pausanias. All the Greekes might well perceiue how the Enemie did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Perjians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greekes at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into consultation of retiring; because they could not without much losse to themselves, and none to the enemie, lie neare to that Fountaine which did serue all the Camp. Hauing therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Armie being sent away before day-light: Mardonius perceived their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him seemed to proceede out of meeke cowardise) he charged them in reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valor, That the Lacedaemonians being ouer-taken by the Enemies horse, and ouerwhelmed with great flights of Arrowes, did quietly sit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victorie were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slaine, and some of especial marke lost, before any signe of good successe appeared in the entrailes.

But as soone as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superstition of that Age and Countrey accounted fortunate; hee gaue the Signall of battaile: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did sit vpon the ground, as was their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage receiued the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging vpon them without any feare of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greek Armie that was in march, being reuoked by Pausanias, came in apace to succour the Lacedaemonians: only that part of the Armie which which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive vnto the place of the great battaile, because the Thebans, and other Greekes confederated with the Perjians, gaue them check by the way. Neurtherlesse, the Spartans with other their Assistants, did so well acquaint themselves, that the Perjians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slaine in the field; the rest fledde into the Campe, which they had fortified with wooden walls, and there defended themselves with such courage as desperate necessitie enforced them vnto, holding out the longer, because the Lacedaemonians were not acquainted with the manner of assaulting Fortresses, and Walls. In the meane season the Athenians, hauing found strong opposition of the Thebans and Thessalians, did with much labour and courage obtaine victorie, which hauing not long pursued, they came to helpe the Lacedaemonians, whom they found wearily bulied in assaulting the Campe, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themselves vnder-tooke it, and in short space forced a passage through the Wall, at which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greekes entred, with such furie, and iust desire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand they are said not to haue left three thousand alive; excepting those who fled away with Artabazus, when the Perjian Armie first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especiall cause of it was the foolish retreat, or rather flight into the Campe. For though it were so, that the place was well fortified, and the number of those who call themselves into it, greater than of the Assailants; yet they being of seuerall Nations and Languages, and hauing lost their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was vnpossible that they in such a terror and astonishment should make good that peece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemie Countrey, against an Armie of men, farre more valiant than themselves, and inflamed with present victorie. Therefore the same wall which for a few houres had preserved their liues, by holding out the Enemie, did now impale them, and leaue them to the slaughtering furie of vnpitefull Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Thessalie, and other Countreies in his way, That hee was sent by Mardonius vpon some peece of seruice: For hee well knew, that had they vnderstood any thing of that great discomfure, all places would haue bene hostile vnto him, and sought with his ruine to purchase fauour of the vanquishers. Therefore making so large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behinde and lost, hee came to Byzantium, whence hee shipped his men ouer into Asia. Such was the end of the vaine-glorious expedition, vnder-taken by Xerxes against the Greekes, vpon hope of honour, and great Conquest, though sorting otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-seene, and rather worse, for as much as it beganne the quarrell, which neuer ended, before the ruine of the Perjian Empire was effected, by that Nation of the Greekes despised and sought to haue bene brought into slaerie. Hereby it may seeme, that the vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God himselfe, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subuersion of the Perjian Monarchie by the Greekes, who, thus prouoked, entred into greater consideration of their owne strength, and the weaknesse of their Enemies.

The battaile of Mycale, with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and examples of the like.

THe same day on which the battaile was fought at Platea, there was an other battaile fought at Mycale, a Promontorie, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian fleet rode. Leutyches the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirall of the Greeke Naue, at the request of some Ilanders and Ionians did faile into thole parts, to deliuer the Samians, and procure the Ionians to revolt from the Persians. Xerxes himselfe at this time lay at Sardis, a Citie in Lydia, not farre from the Sea-side, hauing left threefoorthousand vnder the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionia and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artyntes and Ithramitres, Admiralls of the Persian fleet, vnderstood that the Greekes bent their course towards them; they did forth-with draw their ships a ground, fortifying with Palisades and otherwise, as much ground as did seeme needfull for the encamping of all their Land and Sea-forces. Leutyches at his arriual, perceiuing that they meant to keepe within their strength, and refusing to force them out of it, rowed with his Gallie clofe aboard the shore, and called vpon the Ionians (who more for feare than good will were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greeke tongue to remember libertie, and vse the faire occasion which they now had to recouer it. Here in he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Eubaea; trusting that either these persuasions would preuaile; or if the Persians did happen to vnderstand them, that it would breede some ielousie in them, causing them to fight in feare of their owne Companions. It neede not seeme strange, that this very same stratageme, which little or nothing auailed Themistocles, did now very happily succede. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficultie, to perswade thole Inhabitants of Asia to revolt; who now, in his declining estate, gaue a willing eare to the sweet sound of libertie. The Persians likewise, who in their former brauerie, little regarded and lesse feared any treason, to be contriued by their Subiects, were now so warie, that from the Samians, which were amongst them, they tooke away their armes; the Milesians, whom they did suspect, but would not seeme to mistrust, they placed farre from them, as it were for defence of the straight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know thole places. But these devices little auailed them. For the Samians perceiuing that they were held as Traitors, tooke courage in the heat of the fight, and laying hold vpon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Camp; which example the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to haue found some that durst beginne. It is said that while the Greekes were yet in march towards the Enemies campe, a rumour suddenly ranne in the Armie that Mardonius was overthrowne in Greece, which (though perhaps it was giuen out by the Captaines to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battaile of Platea was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the euening of the same day.

The like report, of that great battaile, wherein Paulus Emilius ouerthrew Perseus the last King of Macedonia, was brought to Rome in foure daies, as Luce with others doe record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kinde. As that of the battaile by the Riuier Sagra in Italie, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the battaile against the Turquinians and the Latines, presently noised at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victorie obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebel to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Armie with gifts and promises, promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himselfe Emperour; which newes much troubling the Citie of Rome, with feare of a dangerous Warre; it was suddainly reported that Antonius was slaine, and his Armie defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the Gods, and shew all manner of publique joy, as in such cases was accustomd. But when better inquirie was made, and the Author of these tidings could not bee found; the Emperour Domitian brooke himselfe to his journey against the Rebell; and being with his Armie in march, hee receiued aduertisement by Poile, of the Victorie obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembering the rumour noised before in Rome, of the selfe same victorie, hee found that the report and victorie were borne vpon one day, though twentie thousand furlongs (which make about fife and twentie hundred miles) a-funder. It is truly said of Plutarch, that this last example giues credit vnto many the like. And indeede it were very strange, if among so many rumours, begotten by forgerie or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination, there should not bee found (as happens in dreames among many thousand vaine and fruitles) a few precisely true. Howbeit wee may finde, that God himselfe doth sometimes vse to terrifie those who presume vpon their owne strength, by these light meanes of tumultuous noises; as hee raised the siege of Samaria, by causing a sound of Horfes and Chariots to ashaite the Aramitres; and as hee threatened Senacherib, saying: Behold, I will send a blast vpon him, and hee shall heare a noise, and returne to his owne Land. Wherefore it may well haue beene true, that God was pleased by such a meane as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heauie hearts, being in great feare, least their owne aduenture should by no means fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their Countrie of Greece, which was readie to bee subdued by Mardonius, whilst they went wandring to seeke out enemies a-farre-off, vpon the coast of Asia. But the fame of the battaile fought at Platea being noised among them; every man desired that his owne valour in the present fight, might bee some helpe to worke out the full deliuerance of Greece. In this alacritie of spirit, they diuided themselves into two Battailions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plaine, directly towards the enemies campe; the Lacedaemonians conducted the other, by the Mountains and straight passages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did first set vpon the Campe (ere the Lacedaemonians could arriue on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, did so forcibly assault it, that they brake way through the Palisades and Gabions, and made themselves Masters of the place, slaying all that could not saue themselves by flight. In this fight the Samians did good seruice, as is formerly mentioned.

But the Milesians, who vpon the like ielousie, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the passages, did now (as if they had beene set of purpose to keepe them from running away) put as many to the sword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except a very few, that fled through by-patches. The Lacedaemonians that day did little seruice, for the businesse was dispatched ere they came in: Only they broke such Companies as retired in whole troupes; making them flie disperfed in very much disorder, whereby the Milesians were enabled to doe the greater execution vpon them. This was the last fight of that huge Armie leaied against Greece, which was now vtterly broken, and had no meane left to make offensive Warre.

p. XI.

Of the barbarous qualitie of XERXES: with a transition from the Persian affaires, to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthe of regard.

XERXES lay at Sardis, not farre from the place of this battaile; but little minde had hee to reuenge either this or other his great losses, being wholly giuen ouer to the loue of his Brothers Wife: with whom when hee could not preuaile by intreatie, nor would obtaine his desire by force, because hee respected much his Brother her husband, he thought it best to make a match betwene his owne Sonne Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that means to finde occasion of such familiaritie, as might worke out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chastitie of the Mother did still reject him, or the beautie of her Daughter allure him; hee soone after fell in loue with his owne Sonnes wife, being a vitious Prince, and asillable to gouerne himselfe in peace, as to guide his Armie in Warre. This young Ladie hauing once desired the King to giue her the Garment which hee then wore, being wrought by his owne Wife; caused the Queene thereby to perceiue her husbands conuersation with her, which shee imputed not so much to the beautie of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon shee conceiued extreme hatred. Therefore at a Royall feast, wherein the custome was that the King should grant euery request, shee craued that the Wife of Masistes, her husbands Brother, the young Ladies Mother, might bee giuen into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either haue reformed the abuse of such a custome, or haue deluded the importunate crueltie of his Wife, by threatening her selfe with the like, to whatsoeuer shee should inflict vpon the innocent Ladie, granted the request; and sending for his brother perswaded him to put away the Wife which hee had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seemes, that hee vnderstood how villainously that poore Ladie should bee intreated, whom hee knew to bee virtuous, and whom himselfe had loued. Masistes refused to put her away; allaging his owne loue, her deserting, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reasons important to moue him to keepe her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reuiled him; saying, That hee now should neither keepe the Wife which hee had, nor haue his Daughter whom hee had promised vnto him. Masistes was much grieved with these wordes. but much more, when returning home, hee found his Wife most butcherly mangled by the Queene Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips, Eares, and Tongue to bee cut off, and her Breasts in like manner, which were cast vnto Dogs. Masistes enraged with this vilanie, tooke his way with his children, and some Friends, towards Bactria, of which Prouince hee was Gouernour, intending to rebell and auenge himselfe. But Xerxes vnderstanding his purpose, caused an Armie to bee leauied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Companie to the sword. Such was the tyrannicall condition of the Persian Gouernement; and such are generally the effects of Luxurie, when it is ioyned with absolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his ouer-throwne, and lying vpon the ground, said, That hee doubted, whether, in regard of his vertue, hee should againe erect it, or, for the mischief done by him to Greece, should let it lie.

But

But surely whatsoeuer his other good qualities were, he was foolish, and was a coward, and consequently mercilesse.

Therefore wee may firmly beleuee, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great; vpon which the foundation of the Persian Empire was so surely laid, that all the wickednesse and vanities of Xerxes, and other worst Princes, could not ouerthrow it, vnill it was broken by a vertue almost equall to that which did establish it. In warres against the Aegyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had bene, very good; but against the generall estate of Greece, neither hee, nor any of his posteritie, did euer make offensive warre, but receiued many losses in Asia, to which the last at Mycale serued but as an introduction; reaching the Greekes, and especially the Athenians, that the Persian was no better Souldier at his owne doores, than in a forraine Countrey: whereof good triall was made forth-with, and much better proofe as soone as the affaires of Athenes were quietly settled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the Historie of Greece, taking in the matters of Persia, as also the estate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Persian estate continued in her greatnesse, many Ages following, in such wise that the knowne parts of the World had no other Kingdome, representing the Majestie of a great Empire.

But this greatnesse depended only vpon the riches and power that had formerly bene acquired, yielding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessive Luxurie, where-with both it, and all, or the most of Empires that euer were, haue bene enuironed, made vnweldie, and (as it were) fattened for the hungrie swords of poore and hardie Enemies. Hereby it came to passe, that Xerxes and his Successors were faine to defend their Crownes with money and base Policies; very sel-dome or neuer (vnlesse it were with great aduantage) daring to adventure the triall of plaine battaile with that little Nation of Greece, which would soone haue ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not priuate malice and ielousie vrged euery
Citie to enuie the height of her Neighbours walls, and thereby diuerted the swords of the Greekes into their owne bowells, which after the departure of Xerxes beganne very well, and might better haue continued, to hew out the way of conquest on the side of Asia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Persian Warre to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

§. I.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

AFTER that the Medes and Persians had received their last blow, and were utterly beaten at Mycale: Leotychides, who then commanded the Grecian Armie, leaving the pursuit of the warre to the Athenians, assisted by the revolted Ionians, returned with the Lacedemonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta, and other places, out of which they had beene leued. The Athenians in the meane while besieged Sestos, a Citie on the strait of the Hellespont, betweene which and Abydos, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats: where the inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greekes, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Hellespont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and hauing left their wives and children, since the invasion of Attica, and the abandoning of Athens in diuers Islands, and at Troezen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their owne places.

And though the most part of all their houses in Athens were burnt and broken downe, and the walls of the Citie ouer-turned, yet they resolved first on their common defence, and to fortifie their Citie, before they cared to couer themselves, their wives and children, with any priuate buildings: Whereof the Lacedemonians being aduertised, and miliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their owne Citie of Sparta was vnwall'd, as also because the Athenians were growne more powerfull by Sea, than either themselves, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them; not acknowledging any priuate milike or jealousie, but pretending, that if the Persians should returne to invade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than heretofore, the same would serue to receiue their enemies, and to be made a Spoil for the Warre, as Thebes had lately beene. To this the Athenians promised to giue them satisfaction by their owne Embassadors very speedily. But being resolved to goe on with their workes by the aduise of Themistocles, they held the Lacedemonians in hope of the contrary, till they had rayled their walls to that height, as they cared not for their milikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gaine time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedemon, giuing him for excuse, that he could not deliuer the Athenians resolutions, till the arriuall of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedemonians expectation being conuerted into jealousie (for by the arriuall of diuers persons out of Attica, they were told for certaine, That the walls of Athens were speedily growne vp beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to beleue reports and vaine rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their own trustie Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolve themselves, and determine mine accordingly. Which request being graunted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his owne, by whom hee aduised the Athenians, first to entertaine the Lacedemonians with some such discourse as might retaine them a few dayes, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himselfe and the other Athenian Embassadors, then at Sparta, had their libertie also to returne. Which done, and being also assured by his associates and Aristides, that Athens was alreadye defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedemonians know, That it was true that the walls of Athens were now rayled to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their Citie; praying the Lacedemonians to beleue, That whensoever it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such, as right well vnderstood what appertained to a Commonweale and their owne safetie, without direction and aduise from any other: That they had in the warre of Xerxes abandoned their Citie, and committed themselves to the wooden walls of their shippes, from the resolution of their owne counsels and courage, and not thereto taught or persuaded by others: and finally, in all that perillous warre against the Persians they found their owne iudgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferior, or lesse fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Commonweale among the Greekes: And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Iudges of their owne affaires, and thought it good reason, that either all the Cities confedered within Greece should be left open, or else that the walls of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedemonians finding the time vsuit for quarrell, dissembled their milike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the diuision, and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and receiue backe from them their owne Embassadors.

The walls of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pyreus, by which they might vnder couert imbarke themselves vpon all occasions.

§. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatness, and prosperous warres made by that State vpon the Persians.

THE Athenians hauing settled things in good order at home, prepared thirtie Gallies for the pursuit of the warre against the Persians, to which the Lacedemonians added other twentie; and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set saile for Cyprus, vnder the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedemonian; whereafter their landing hauing possesed themselves of many principall places, they imbarke the Armie againe, and tooke land in Thrace, recouering from the Persians by force the Citie Byzantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behauing himselfe more like a Tyrant than a Captaine, especially towards the Ionians lately revolted from Xerxes, was called backe by the Councell of Lacedemon, and not onely accused of many insolent behauiours, but of intelligence with the Medes, and Treason against his Countrey. In his stead they employed Dacotus, who either gaue the same cause of offence; or else the Athenians, who affected the first commandement in that warre, practised the fouldiors to complaine; though indeed the wise and vertuous behauior of Aristides, Generall of the Athenian forces, a man of rare and incomparable sinceritie, had beene able to make a good Commander seeme ill in comparison of himselfe; and therefore was much more auailable in rendering those detected, whose vices afforded little matter of excuse. Howsoever it were, the Lacedemonians being no lesse wearie of the warre, than the Athenians were eager to pursue it, the one obtained their ease and the other the execution and honor which they desired: for all the Greekes (those of Peloponnesus excepted) willingly subjected themselves to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of

of their greatnesse in that present age, and of their ruine in the next succeeding. For the charge of the warre being now committed vnto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities, they appointed Receiuers and Treasurers, and began to leuie money, according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, and for the recovering of those places on Europe side, in Asia the lesse, and the Islands, from the Persians. This tribute (the first that was euer payed by the Greekes) amounted to foure hundred and threescore Talents; which was rayfed easily by the honest care of that iust man Aristides, to whose discretion all the confederates referred themselves, and no one man found occasion to complaine of him. But as the vertue of Aristides, and other worthy Citizens, brought vnto the Athenians great commoditie; so the desire which they conceived of encreasing their commoditie, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the generall loue, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their Citie to the defence of her treasure, which with her in the next age perished. For it was not long ere these foure hundred and threescore Talents were rayfed to six hundred, nor long, after that, ere their covetous Tyrannie had conducted their followers into slaues, and extorted from them yearly threene hundred Talents. The Isle of Lesos was at the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these summes were layd vp; and where, at the generall assemblee, the Capitaines of those forces, sent by the confederates, were for forme sake called to consultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger by sea than al Greece besides, had lockt vp the common treasure in an Island, vnder their owne protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The generall Commandeur in this Warre was Cimon, the sonne of Miltiades, who first tooke Eion, vpon the Riuer Strimon; then the Isle of Scaros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they mastered the Carisij, and brought into seruitude the Acaxij, contrarie to the forme of the confederacie: So did they other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they styled of their contribution, or disobeyed their commandements; taking vpon them and vsurping a kind of soveraigne authoritie ouer the rest: which they exercised the more assuredly, because they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be resisted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, wearie of the warre in their owne persons, and giuen vp altogether to their ease, made choise rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of warre, or in shippes; leauing the prouision of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weake in all their sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Warres; the other greatly strengthened their Naue and their experiences, being alwayes armed and employed in honourable Seruices, at the cost of those, who hauing lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-money, leuied vpon these their confederates, employed so well by the Athenians at the first (as ill proceedings are often founded vpon good beginnings) that no great cause of repining was giuen. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admirall scouring the Asiaticke Seas, tooke in the Citie of Phaselis; which hauing formerly pretended neutralitie, and refused to relieue, or any way assit the Greekes, were enforced to pay tenne Talents for a fine, and so to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearly contribution.

From thence he set saile for the Riuer Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Persian Fleet rode, being of sixe hundred saile, or (according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fiftie, and hauing a great Land-Armie, encamped vpon the shoore, all which forces hauing bene prouided for aduancing the Kings affaires in Greece, were vtterly defeated in one day, and two hundred shippes taken by the Athenians, the rest being broken to pieces, or sunke, ere euer they had sworne in the Greekish Seas. Cimon hauing in one day obtained two great victories, the one by the Sea, and the other by Land, was very soone presented with a third.

third. For fourescore saile of Phenicians (who were the best of all Sea-men, vnder the Persian command) thinking to haue joyned themselves with the Fleet before destroyed, arriued vpon the same Coast, ignorant of what had passed, and fearing nothing lesse than what ensued. Vpon the first notice of their approach Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at a head-Land, called Hydra, did so amaze them, that they only fought to runne themselves on ground; by which meane preserving few of their men, they lost all their shippes. These losses did so breake the courage of the Persian, that, omitting all hope of preuailing vpon Greece, he condescended to whatsoeuer Articles it pleased the Athenians to propound, granting liberties vnto all the Greekes inhabiting Asia; and further couenancing, That none of his shippes of Warre should saile to the Westward of the Isles, called Cyanea and Chelidonia.

This was the most honourable peace that euer the Greekes made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any warre that redounded to the profit or glorie of the whole Nation, till such times as, vnder Alexander, they ouerthrew the Empire of Persia; in which Warre few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great command, but serued altogether vnder the Macedonians.

§. III.

The death of XERXES by the treason of ARTABANVS.

BESIDES these losses, which could not easily haue bene repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time such, as gaue iust cause to the Persian of seeking peace vpon any termes not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the vnckle of Xerxes, perceiuing, that the King his maister did easily take small occasions to shed the blood of such, as in kindred or place were neere vnto him, began to repose lesse hope of safetie in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Souerainetie, by destroying a Prince that was so hated for his crueltye, and despised for his cowardise and misfortunes. Hauing conceived this Treason, he found meanes to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in such close manner, that (as if he himselfe had bene innocent) he accused Darius the sonne of Xerxes, and caused him to suffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickednesse he got the Kingdome, and held it seuen moneths; or whether intending the like euill to Artabanus the sonne of Xerxes, he was by him preuented and surprisid, it were hard to affirme any certaintie. But all Writers agree vpon this, That taken he was, and with his whole familie put to death by extreame torments, according to the sentence, whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verie.

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

The banishment of THEMISTOCLES: His flight to ARTAXERXES newly reigning in Persia; and his death.

ARTAXERXES being established in his Kingdome, and hauing so compounded with the Athenians, as the present necessitie of his affaires required, began to conceiue new hopes of better fortune against the Greekes, than he or his predecessors had euer hitherto found. For the people of Athens, when the Persians were chased out of Greece, did so highly value their owne merites in that seruice, that they not onely thought it fit for themselves to become the Commanders ouer many Townes and Ilands of the Greekes, but, euen within their owne wals, they would admit none other forme of Government than merely Democraticall. Herein they were so insolent, that no integritie nor good desert was able to preferue the estate of any such as had borne great office, longer than, by flattering the rascall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deedes to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatnesse vpon popularitie, yet now presuming vpon his good seruices done to the State, hee thought that with great reason they might graunt him the libertie to cheeke their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearsing the benefits which they had receiued from him, that they layed vpon him the punishment of Ostracisme, whereby he was banished for tenne yeares, as a man ouer-burthen some to the Commonwealt.

Before the time of his returne was halfe expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedaemonians, who charged him of consulting with Pausanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece vnto Xerxes. Hereupon Themistocles finding no place of securitie against the malice of two such mightie Cities, was driuen, after many troublesome flights, and dangerous remouings, to aduerture himselfe into Persia; where he found Artaxerxes newly seated, and was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceiued of aduancing his affaires by the counsell and assistance of Themistocles, proued altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in fauour of Inarus the Lybian, (who infected Egypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Armie in Egypt, and scowring those Easterne Seas, to the great hinderance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can vnderstand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King send his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had giuen, of assuring the Persian estate against the Greekes.

But whether Themistocles perceiued much vnlikelienesse of good successe, in leading a great Armie of dauidly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in fauour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the loue of his Countrey would not permit him to seeke honour by the ruine of it: sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to vndertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict betwene thankfulness to his well-deseruing Prince, and natural affection to his owne ill-deseruing people, by finishing his life with a cup of poyson.

§. V.

§. V.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Egypt.

THEN was Artaxerxes driuen to vse the seruice of his owne Captaines in the Egyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, that a iust cause is a good defence against a strong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred sayle strong was sent forth vnder Cimon, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintain, the Persian being vtterly broken at Sea, and thereby vnable to relieue the Iland. Now although it were so, that a peace had bene concluded, which was likely to haue bene kept sincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proofe of the Grecian valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any shippes of Warre (without which the Greekes could receiue no harme from him) whereof if any one should be found sayling towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole estate; yet all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waite of an enemy too farre ouer-marching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, lest the league which in his owne worser fortunes hee had made with them, he would breake in theirs; and therefore sought to get such assurance into their hands, as might vtterly disable him from attempting aught against them; or whether the increase of their reuenues and power, by adding that rich and great Island to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profite; they thought it the wisest way, to take whilst they might, whatsoever they were able to get and hold, and he vnable to defend.

The Ile of Cyprus lying in the bottome of the straights betwene Cilicia, Syria and Egypt, is very fitly seated for any Prince of State, that being mightie at Sea, doth either seeke to enrich himselfe by trade with those Countreys, or to inselt one or more of them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already deuoured, in conceit, this Iland, was on the sodaine well-nigh choaked with a greater morsell, to snatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might easily haue swallowed and digested. For Inarus King of the Lybians confining Egypt, hauing found how greatly the Countrey was exhaulted by the late warres, and how weakly defended by very slender Persian garisons, conceived rightly, that if such small forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the sodaine of his owne Gardes, or leue out of the ordinarie Garrisons, were by him defeated, the naturalls of the Countrey, not long since oppressed by Cambyses, and after a reuolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soone breake faith with him who had no other title to that kingdome than a good sword. Further, he perswaded himselfe that the people, vnable to defend themselves against the Persian without his assistance; would easily be drawne to accept him, the author of their deliuerance for king. Neither did this hope deceiue him. For hauing taken and cruelly slaine Achamenes the Viceroy, diuers Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and proclaiming him king, shewed the most of their endeuour for prosecution of the warre. But hee considering his owne weaknesse, and that the meanes of the Egyptians his adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceiued well, that to resist the power of Artaxerxes, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price soeuer he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian Fleet, and knowing well the vertue of the souldiers therein embarked; he inuited the Commanders to share with him the kingdome of Egypt as a farre greater reward of their aduerture, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their estate. Whether hee or they (if things had wholly sorted according to their expectation) would haue bene contented with an equall share, and not not have fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a divination vnnecessarie. Hee was possided of the peoples love, they were of most power. But the issue of those affaires was such as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally. Yet had the beginnings of their enterprise very good and hopefull successe: For they entered the Land as farre as to Memphis, the principall Citie; and of the Citie it selfe they tooke two parts: to the third part, which was called the White wall, they layd such hard siege, that neither those forces of the Perians, which then were in Egypt, were strong enough to remoue them; neither could Artaxerxes well devise what meanes to vse for the recouerie of that which was lost, or for the preferation of the remainder. The best of his hope was by setting the Lacedemonians vpon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to looke home-wards to their owne defence. This was the first time that the Perian sought to procure assistance of the Greekes one against the other, by stirring them vp with gold to the entertainment of priuate quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpose he sent Ctesibius to Sparta with much Treasure; who, after great expence, finding that the Lacedemonians were nothing forward in employing their whole force against the Athenians, whome in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithstanding the absence of their Arme in Egypt; he thought it his wisest way to employ the rest of his money and meane to their reliefe, who had now the space of sixe yeares defended his mailers right in Egypt. Therefore he hastily dispatched another of his name, the sonne of Zopyrus, who arriving in Egypt, was first encountered by the reuolued people; over whome he obtained a victorie, which made him mailer of the Countrey, whilst the Athenians lay builed about Memphis the great Citie. It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a strange ayre, and want of supplie, had much enfeebled the Athenians: sure it is, that when Alcibiades, having reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it selfe, whether his former successe had amended the courage of the Perians, or want of necessaries made the Athenians inferior to themselves, he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so neere, as they were foor to fortifie themselves in the Isle of Prosopites, where Alcibiades, after eightent moneths siege, turning away one part of the River by diuers Trenches, assaulted the Athenian without impediment of waters, tooke their Gallies, and put all to the sword, save a few that saved themselves by flight into Lybia; the same entertainment had fiftie other Gallies which they sent to the succour of the first two hundred. For those Athenians having heard nothing that their Fleet and Arme was consumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendesum, and fell vnawares among the Phanician Gallies and the Perian Arme; so as the Perians recovered all Egypt, but that part belied by Amirius, and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians sixe yeares warre in Egypt, and the reward of their vanitie and indiscretion to vndertake many enterprises at once.

§. VI.

Of other warres made by the Athenians for the most part with good successe, about the same time.

Notwithstanding these overthrowes in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their home-warres waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedemonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten neere vnto Italia by the Corinthians and Epidaurians, so they obtained two great victories soone after; the one over the Peloponnesians, neere vnto Cerophalia; the other over the Eginets, neere vnto Egina; where they sunke and carried away threecore and ten Gallies of their Enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the Iuddaine, and besieged Aegina, from whence they could not be moued, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to diuert them, invaded Aegina; where, after a great fight, with equall losse, the Corinthians, when they returned againe to set vp their Trophies, as Victors in the former battaile, were vterly broken and slaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons, and Atagarians, to their great losse and dishonour.

Again, as the Athenians were discomfited neare to Tanagra by the Lacedemonians, who returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians, (at which time the Thebaisian horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them) so about threecore daies after, the Athenians entred Bacotia vnder the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation, they wanne Phocis on the gulfe Oetis, and euened the walls of Tanagra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Aegina to render vpon most base conditions; as to beate downe the walls of their Citie, and to giue them hostages for Tribute; the siege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts else where. Besides these victories they sackt and spoiled many places vpon the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedemonians; wanne vpon the Corinthians, and ouerthrew the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These were the vndertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of those five yeares that a part of their forces made warre in Egypt. In the end whereof they attempted Thebes, perswaded thereunto by Orestes, but were resisted by the King Pharalus, who had chased Orestes out of his Dominions. They also landed in Sicyonia, and had victorie over those that resisted, after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for five yeares, and sent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ships, but they were againe allured by Amirius one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marish and Wooddie parts of Egypt from the Perians, to whom they sent sixtie of their ships. The rest of their Arme sailing in their enterprise of Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coasted the Iland, encountered a fleet of the Phoenicians and Cilicians, over both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece; as also those returned safe which were sent into Egypt.

Of ARTAXERXES LONGIMANVS, that he was ARASHVEROSH the husband of Queene HESTER.

These Egyptian troubles being ended, the raigne of Artaxerxes continued peaceable, whereof the length is by some restrained into twentie yeares, but the more and better Authors giue him fortie, some allow vnto him foure and fortie. He was a Prince of much humanitie, and noted for many examples of gentleness. His fauour was exceeding great to the Iewes, as appeareth by the Histories of Esdraus and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To proue that this was the King who gaue countenance and aide to that great worke of building the Temple, it were a needlesse trauaile; considering that all the late Diuines haue taken very much paine, to shew that those two Prophets were licenced by him, and succoured in that building, in such sort as appeares in their writings.

This was likewise that King Abasuerus who married Hester. Whereof if it beneedfull to giue proofe, it may suffice; That Abasuerus liued in Susa, reigning from India to Ethiopia; and therefore must haue been a Perian; That hee liued in peace, as appeares by the circumstances of the Historie, and vied the counsaile of the suen

Princes,

Princes, the authoritie of which Princes beganne vnder Darius, the sonne of Hystaspes, wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyses.

The continuall Warres which exercised King Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, together with the certaintie of his marriages with sundrie wiues, from none of whom he was diuorced, but left his first wife Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, alive in great honour, these being mother to Xerxes the succeeding King; doe manifestly proue that Hester was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Iew, That at the persequition of Mardocheus, Isaiah the high Priest the sonne of Isaiah, caused the feast of Purim to be instituted in memorie of that deliuerance. Now the time of Isaiah was in the raigne of Artaxerxes, at the comming of Ezra, and Nehemiah: Isaiah his father dying about the end of Darius.

The same continuance of warres, with other his furious and tragickall louses, wherewith Xerxes did consume such little time as hee had free from warre, are enough to proue, that the storie of Hester pertained not vnto the time of Xerxes, who liued but one and twentie yeares, whereas the two & thirtieth of Abasern: or Artasphus is expressed by Nehemiah. Again it is well knowne, that Xerxes in the seventh yeare of his raigne (wherein this marriage must haue bene celebrated) came not neare to Susa. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to proue that none of them could be Abasern, it is enough to say, that Mardocheus hauing been carried from Hierusalem captiue, with Isachana, by Nebuchadnezzar, was vnlike to 10 haue liued vnto their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he liued in Susa, reigned from Indus to Aethiopia, liued in peace, was contemporarie with Isaiah the high Priest: and further hee had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Egyptians in that seventh yeare of his raigne; which good fortune might well giue occasion to such a Roiall feast, as is described in the beginning of the booke of Hester. This is the summe of the arguments, brought to proue the age of Hesters storie by the learned and diligent Krentzenius, who addes the authorities of Iosephus, affirming the same and of Philo, giuing to Mardocheus eightene yeares more than Susa the Patriarch liued, namely one hundred fourecore and eightene yeares in all, which expire in the sixe and thirtieth yeare of this Artaxerxes, if wee suppose him to haue bene carried away captiue, being a Boy of ten yeares old. 30

§. VII.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponnesian Warre.

BVt it is fit that we now returne to the affaires of the Greekes, who from this time forward, more vehemently prosecuting their ciuill warres, suffered the Perians for many ages to rest in peace: this Egyptian expedition being come to nought. Soone after this the Lacedemonians vnderooke the warre called, Sacred, recovered the Temple and Ile of Delphos, and deliuered both to the Inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the same, and gaue it in charge to the Phocians. In the meane while the banished Boeotians reentred their owne Land, and mastered two of their owne Townes possessed by the Athenians, which they soone recovered againe from them; but in their returne towards Athens the Boeotians, Euboeans, and Locreans, (Nations opprest by the Athenians) set vpon them with such resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all slaine or taken, whereby the Boeotians recovered their former libertie, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Islanders of Euboea tooke such courage vpon this, that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to conquer, he was aduerted that the Megarians (who first left the Lacedemonians, and submitted themselves to Athens) being now wearie of their yoke, had slaine the Athenian Garrisons, and ioyned themselves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, and 50

Epidaurians. These newes hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speed; but ere he could recouer Attica, the Peloponnesians, led by Plisfomas, the sonne of Pausanias, had invaded it, pillaged, and burnt many parts thereof; after whose returne Pericles went on with his first intent and recovered Euboea. Finally, the Athenians beganne to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yielded to deliuer vp all the places which they held in the Countrie of Peloponnesus: and this truce was made for thirtie yeares. After sixe of these yeares were expired, the Athenians (fauouring the Atleians against the Saminians) invaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the citizens were forced to yield themselves vpon most lamentable conditions; Namely, to deliuer vp all their ships, to breake downe their owne walls, to pay the charge of the warre, and to restore whatsoever had bene taken by themselves, or by their practise, from the Athenians. In the neck of which followed that long and cruell Peloponnesian Warre; wherof I haue gathered this Briefe following: the same contention taking beginning fiftie yeares after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no Citie thereof, which either in the beginning of this warre, or in the continuance of it, was not drawne into the quarrell: I hold it convenient now at the first to shew briefly the estate of the Countrie at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athens and Sparta, vpon which all the rest had most dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian Warre.

§. I.

Vpon what termes the two principall Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, stood, at the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

GREECE was neuer vniued vnder the gouernment of any one Prince or Estate, vntill Philip of Macedonia, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Vnion and League against the Perians, whereof they were Captaines, than into any absolute subiection. For euery Estate held their owne, and were gouerned by Lawes farre different, and by their owne Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yeeld obedience no otherwise than as to such, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Perian warre (deemed the General quarrell of Greece) and tooke the profit and honor of the victorie, to their owne vse and increase of greatnesse. But the Kings which afterwards reigned in Macedonia, did so farre enlarge their authoritie, that all Greece was by them brought vnder such obedience, as differed little from seruitude; very few excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with armes, and sometimes with gifts, preferue their libertie; of whom the Lacedemonians and Athenians were chiefe: which two people defrued best the plague of tyrannie, hauing first giuen occasion thereunto, by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Countrie by perpetuall Warre. For vntill these two Cities of Athens and Sparta distracted 50

all

all Greece, drawing every State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gaue beginning to the Peloponnesian war (the effects whereof in true estimation called not before the time that Philip had ouer-masted all, forasmuch as euery conclusion of one warre afforded henceforth matter to some new distraction of the whole Countrey) the warres, commenced betwene one Citie of Greece and another, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controuersies were soone decided, either by the authority of the Amphictiones, who were the generall Councell of Greece; or by the power of the Lacedaemonians, whose aide was commonly held as good as the assurance of victorie.

Gouernment, when the Peloponnesian warre beganne. Their education was only to practise feates of Armes; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poore, and cared not much for wealth; euery one had an equall portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintaine him in such manner of life as they vsed. For brauerie they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinarie meales being in common Halls, where all sate alike. They vsed money of yron, whereof they could not be couctous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they liued Scotian-like, saue that they vsed no other occupation than Warre, placing all their felicitie in the glorie of 20 their valour. Hereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrarie to this. For they fought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they vsed mercenary Souldiers in their warres, and exacted great tribute of their Subjects, which were for the most part Islanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in forme of policie, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference betwene these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, suddaine in their conclusions, and as easie in the execution; The Lacedaemonians very slow in their deliberations, full of grauitie, but very resolute, and such as would in cold blood performe what the Athenians did vsually in flagrant. Whereby it came to passe that the Lacedaemonians had all the Estates of Greece depending vpon them, as on men firme and assured, that fought honour and not riches, whereas the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them perforce, being held in flight as the Subjection. But the Signorie of the Athenians was nothing large, until such time as the Persian Warre had inuaded Greece, pretending only a quarrell to Athen. For then the Citizens perceiuing well, that the Townes of Athen could not be defended against his great Armie of fenteene hundred thousand men, besewed all their wealth vpon a Naue, and (assisted by the other Greeks) ouerthrow the fleet of 40
Xerxes, whose Land forces were soone after discomfited by them, and the Greekes, who all serued vnder conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mightie in fleet, reduced all the Ilands of the Greekish Seas vnder their obedience; imposing vpon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of warre against the Persians; though indeede they imploied their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Ilands, and haue Townes, of their owne Countreymen, as stood out against them. All which was easily suitered by the Lacedaemonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in expeditions to bee made farre from home. But afterwards perceiuing the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much ielousie, and were very apt to quarrell with them; but much more willing to breed contention betwene them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebians would haue oppressed the Platons, when they of Plata repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aide, than this aduise, That they should seek helpe at Athen. Hereby it was 50 thought,

was thought, that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious Warre, with their Neighbours of Thebes. But it proued otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did only serue to encrease their honour and puissance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Athen entred into Warre.

N Euertheless many Estates of Greece were very ill affected to Athen, because that Citie grew very insolent vpon suddaine prosperitie, and maintayning the weaker Townes against the stronger, in-croched apace vpon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much intraged, because the people of the Iland Corcyra, their Colonie which had rebelled against them, and giuen them a great ouerthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their fleet by adioyning that of Corcyra vnto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that reuenge which else they would haue 20 taken. Now how soeuer it were so, that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed vpon among the Greekes, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much ado) they concluded to redresse by warre the iniuries done to their Allies.

First therefore seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certaine offences committed against the Gods; whereto hauing for answer, That they themselves should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta, they beganne to deale plainly, and required that the people of some Townes, oppressed by the Estate of Athen, should be set at libertie; and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the 30
Athenians, should be reuerfed. This last point they so earnestly pressed, that if they might obtaine it they promised to abstain from their purpose of making Warre.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by seeming to haue obtained somewhat, they might preserve their reputation without entering into a warre, which threatened them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to vnder-goe.

But the Athenians would yeeld to nothing; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice, how farre they were from feare of any other Citie. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needfull to the 40
Warre; wherein the Lacedaemonians were Superiour, both in number and qualitie, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece; and hauing the generall fauour, as men that pretended to set at libertie such as were oppressed; but the Athenians did as farre exceede them in all prouisions, of Money, Shipping, Engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held; and afterward found of greater vse in such neede, than the willing readinesse of friends, who soone grow wearie, and are not easily assembled.

§. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

THe first and second year's expedition was very grievous to the Citie of Athenes. For the Fields were wasted, the Trees cut downe; the Countre people driuen to flie, with their Wiues, Children, and Cattel, into the Towne; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the Citie, such as before they had neither felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the reuolt of the Athenians, in the Ile of Lesbos, and the siege of Platae their confederated Citie, which they durst not adventure to raise, besides some small ouerthrowes receiued. The Lacedaemonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countre of Attica, and therein abide, vntill victuals beganne to faile, waiting and destroying all things round about: The Governours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their Enemies; but vsed to send a fleet into Peloponnesus, which waited as fast all the Seacoast of their Enemies, whilst they were making warre in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wanne the Towne of Platae, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mightie by Sea, did subdue Mylae, which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings, in that Warre, the Lacedaemonians beganne to perceiue how vnfit they were to deale with such enemies. For after that Attica was thoroughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equall to such harme as they themselves might, and did receiue. Their Confederates beganne to set forward very slowly in their expeditions into Attica; perceiuing well that Athenes was plentifully relieued with all necessaries, which came by Sea from the Ilands that were subiect vnto that estate; and therefore these invaders tooke small pleasure in beholding the walls of that nightie Citie, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a patterne of the calamities, with which their owne Territorie was the whilst afflicted. Wherefore they beganne to set their care to build a strong Nauie, wherein they had little good successe, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skillfull in Sea-fights, that a few Vessells of theirs durst undertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

§. IIII.

Of the great losse which the Spartans receiued at Pylus.

AMong other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea; they receiued at Pylus a very fore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A fleet of Athenian ships bound for Corcyra, waiting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, was by contrarie windes detained at Pylus, which is a ragged Promontorie, loying to the maine, by a straight necke of Land. Before it there lies a small barren land of lesse than two miles compasse, and within that a creeke, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being borne off by the head-Land and Ile. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified, as well as in hast they might; and what was wanting in their artificiall fortification, was supplied by the natural strength and site of the place. By holding this peece of ground, and haue, they reasonably expected many aduantages against their enemies. For the Countre adioyning was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient time had held very strong and cruell warre with Sparta; and though quite subdued they were held in straight subiection, yet was not the old hatred so extinguished, that by the neare neighbourhood and assistance of the Athenians, it might not bee reuied. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedaemonians, and as many of their bond-slaves as could escape from them, would repaire to Pylus, and from thence make daily excursions into Laconia, which was not farre off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this haue, in lying almost in the mid-way betwene them and Corcyra, make them able to sur-round all Peloponnesus; and wait it at their pleasure. The newes of these doings at Pylus, drew the Peloponnesians thither in all hast out of Attica, which they had entered a few daies before with their whole Armie; but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Nauie, to recouer this peece, which how bad a neighbour it might prove in time, they well foresaw, little fearing the grievous losse at hand, which they there in few daies receiued. For when they in vaine made a generall assault on all sides, both by Sea and Land; finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence: they occupied the haue, placing four hundred and twentie choise men all of them, Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell, that leades into the Port; but so narrow, that only two ships in front could enter betwene the Ile and Pylus; likewise but fewen or eight ships could enter at once by the further channell, betwene the Iland and the Main. Having thus taken order to shut vp this new Towne by Sea, they sent part of their fleet to lurch wood, and other stufie, wherewith to fortifie round about, and block vp the peece on all sides. But in the meane season, the Athenian fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entering the haue, did breake and linke manie of their Enemies vessels; tooke fire, and enforced the residue to runne themselves a ground.

Now was the Towne secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as lost. Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the camp (as was their custom in great dangers) to advise what were best for the publike safetie; who when they did perceiue that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Ile, then by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the meane while with the Captaines at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedaemonians should deliuer vp all the ships which were in the coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the Towne, nor the Athenians against the camp: That a certaine quantitie of Bread, Wine, and Fleish, should bee daily carried into the Ile, but that no ships should passe into the Iland secretly: That the Athenians should carrie the Lacedaemonian Embassadors to Athenes, there to treat of peace, and should bring them back, at whose returne the truce should end, which if in the meane time it were broken in any one point, should be held vtterly void in all: That when the truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships, in as good case as they receiued them. The Embassadors coming to Athenes, were in opinion, that as they themselves had begunne the warre, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedaemonians did sue to them for peace, aduising them to make an end of warre, whilst with such reputation they might. But they found all contrarie to their expectation: For in stead of concluding vpon euentures, or desiring of meeke recompence for losse sustained; the Athenians demanded certaine Cities to bee restored to them, which had bene taken from them by the Lacedaemonians long before this warre beganne, refusing likewise to continue the treatie of peace, vnlesse the Spartans which were in the Ile, were first rendred vnto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassadors returned without effect, at which time the truce being ended; it was desired of the Athenian Captaines that they should, according to their couenant, restore the ships, which had bene put into their hands. Whereto answere was made, that the condition of the truce was, That if any one article were broken, all should bee held void; now, (said the Athenians) yee haue assaulted our Garrisons; and and ther-by are we acquitted of our promise to restore the ships. This and the like frivolous allegations which they made, were but mere shifts; yet profit so farre o-uer-weighted honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Lacedæmonians driven to vse many hard meanes, for conuincance of victualls into the Ile; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athen, where it was decreed, that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slain. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell vpon them; the Lacedæmonians were now so farre from wailing Attica, that they suffered their owne Countrey to be continually ouer-runne, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus; which became the Rendezvous of all that were ill-affected vnto them.

§. V.

How the Lacedæmonians hardly, and to their great disadvantage, obtained a peace, that was not well kept.

Herefore they indoued greatly to obtaine peace; which the Athenians would not hearken vnto. For they were so puffed vp with the continuance of good success, that hauing sent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold vp a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrells; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Ile were taken away, and their hands returned without either gaine or losse, they banished the Capitaines, as if it had bene meerey through their default, that the Ile of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it selfe, no whit inferiour vnto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their ouer-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters receiued, especially in Thrace, where in a battaile which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon, and Brasidas, Generalls of the Athenian and Lacedæmonian forces, were both slaine; which two had most bene aduersaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedæmonians, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Naue which they had receiued at Pylus, were faine to proceede lamely in the warre, against such as, through commoditie of their good fleet, had all advantage that could be found in expedition, were feruently desirous to conclude the businesse, ere Fortune by any new fauour should reuiue the insulence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a consideration of their present estate, that vrged them to bring the treatie of peace to good and speedie effect; but other dangers hanging ouer their heads, and readie to fall on them, which vnlesse they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to auoid. The estate of Argos, which had ancient enmitie with them, was now, after a truce of thirtie yeares well-nigh expired, readie to take the benefit of their present troubles, by ioyning with those who alone found them worke enough. Argos was a rich and strong Citie, which though inferiour to Sparta in valour, yet was not so vnwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedæmonians could euer farre preuaile vpon it, when they had little else to doe. This was a thing that in the beginning of this Warre had not bene regarded. For it was then thought that by wailing the Territories of Athen with sword and fire, the quarrell should easily and in short time have bene ended, whereby not only the Athenians should haue bene brought to good order, but the Corinthians and others, for whose sake the warre was vnder taken, haue bene so firmly knit to the Lacedæmonians, that they should for loue of them haue abandoned the Argives, to their owne fortunes. But now the vanitie of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in readie money, and meanes to raise more, were able to secure themselves by a strong fleet, from any great harme, that the Peloponnesians wanting wherewith to maintaine a Naue, could doe vnto them, yea as Masters of the Sea, to wearie them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither warre nor peace; their daily traualles, and many losses had so wearied and incensed them. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians were glad to vse the occasion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a final peace, which with much a-doe they procured, as seemed equall and ealie; but were indeede impossible to be performed, and therefore all their traualle was little effectuall.

The restitution of prisoners and places taken being agreed vpon; it fell out by lot, that the Lacedæmonians should restore first. These had won more townes vpon the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had wonne, they had not wonne absolutely. For they had restored some Townes to such of their Allies, from whom the State of Athen had taken them; some, and those the most, they had set at libertie (as reason required) which had opened their gates vnto them, as to their friends and deliuerers, and not compelled them to break in a enemies. Now concerning the Townes which were not in their owne hands, but had bene rendered vnto their Confederates, the Spartans found meanes to giue some satisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retain others, which they had gotten in the warre; as for the rest, they promised more than afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to heare of being abandoned, neither would they by any meanes yeeld themselves into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had off-nided by revolting, notwithstanding whatsoever articles were drawn, and concluded, for their securitie, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing those things, which on their part were required; so that restoring only the prisoners which they had, they deferred the rest, vntill such time as they might receiue the full satisfaction, according to the agreement. But before such time as these difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedæmonians entred into a more straight alliance with the Athenians; making a league offensive and defensive with them. Hereunto they were moued by the backwardnesse of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to haue lued for peace at their hands, as soone as things were once compounded betwene Athen and Sparta; did hew themselves plainly vnwilling to giue care to any such motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian succour, they should make sure worke, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound vnto them by well-deserving in the late warre, or found so troublesome, that their enmitie (if perhaps they durst let it appeare) were little worle than friendship. It bred great jealousy in all the Cities of Greece, to perceiue such a conjunction betwene two so powerfull Signories: especially one clause threatening eury one, that was any thing apt to keare, with a secret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of subduing the whole Countrey, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For besides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutuall consent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their owne pleasures. This impression wrought so strongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had borne to the Athenians their professed Enemies, was violently throwne vpon the Lacedæmonians their vnjust friends; whereby it came passe, that they who had lately borne chiefe sway in Greece, might haue bene abandoned to the discretion of their Enemies, as already in effect they were, had the Enemies wisely vsed the advantage.

§. VI.

§. VI.

Of the negotiations, and practices, held betwene many States of Greece, by occasion of the peace that was concluded.

THe admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as vntextible, and able to make way through all impediments, had bene so excessive, that when by some sinister accidents, that Citie was compelled to take and seeke peace, vpon termes not sounding very honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happens usually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was neuer thought that any Lacedemonian would haue endured to lay downe his weapons and yeeld himselfe prisoner, nor that any misfortune could haue bene so great, as should haue drawne that Citie to releue it else otherwise than by force of Armes. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of speciall marke, being ouer-laid by enemies, in the Island before Pylus, had rather cholen to liue in captiuitie, than to die in fight; and that Pylus it selfe, sticking as a thorne in the foot of Laconia, had bred such anguish in that Estate, as vtterly wearying the accustomed spartan resolution, had made it sit downe, and seeke to refresh it selfe by dishonourable ease: then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans beginne to conceiue balaies of those men which were vertuous, though vnfürfortunate; but other lesser Cities joining with these in the same opinion, did cast their eyes vpon the rich and great Citie of Argos, of whose abilitie, to doe much, they conceiued a strong beleife, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which thorough foolish enuie is become almost naturall in the greater part of mankind. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should haue discerned only the vertues; and comparing injuriously our best parts with their worst, are iustly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers which we know to be wanting to our selues.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moued rather by enuie at the greatness of Athenes daily encreasing) the Lacedemonians had entred into the present warre. But these Corinthians did only murmur at the peace alleading as grievances, that sometowens of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans who during the time of warre, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forsake their dependency vpon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discover themselves; feare of reuenge to come working more effectually, than indignation at things already past. The Argives feeling the gale of prosperous Fortune that began to fill their sailes, prepared themselves to take as much of it as they could stand vnder; giuing for that purpose vnto twelve of their citizens, a full and absolute commission to make alliance betwene them and any free cities of Greece (Athenes and Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding euery particular businesse to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all comers; the Mantineans began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponnese following them entred into this new confederacy; some incited by private respects, others thinking it the wisest way to doe as the most did. What inconvenience might arise to them by these courtes, the Lacedemonians easily discerned, and therefore sent Embassadors to stoppe the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischief had bene hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a gravity expressing the opinion which they had conceiued of their present aduantage ouer Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entred yet into the alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gaue audience to the Lacedemonians; the purport of whose Embaslie was this:

this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not forsake the alliance, which they had long since made with Sparta, and that reason did as well binde them to holde themselves contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their ancient confederacy, inasmuch as it had been agreed betwene the Spartans and their associates, that the consent of the greater part, (which had yeelded vnto peace with Athenes) should binde the lesser number to performe what was concluded, if no Diuine impediment withstood them. Herevnto the Corinthians made answer, that the Spartans had first begun to do them open wrong, in concluding the warre wherein they had lost many places, without prouision of restitution; & that the very clause, alleiged by the Embassadors, did acquite them from any necessity of subcribing to the late peace, inasmuch as they had sworn vnto those people whom they perswaded to rebell against Athenes, that they would neuer abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall againe into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in reason and religion to vie all meanes of vpholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an oath was no lesse to be accounted a Diuine impediment, than were pestilence, tempest, or any the like accident, hindering the performance of things vnderaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they said that they would doe as they should finde cause. Hauing dismissed the Embassadors with this answer, they made all haile to ioyne themselves with Argos, and caused other States to do the like; so that Sparta and Athenes were in a manner left to themselves, the Thebans and Megarians being also vpon the point to haue entred into this new confederacie. But as the affections were diuers, which caused this halting confluence of sudden friends to Argos, it so likewise came to passe that the friendship it selfe, such as it was, had much diueritie both of uncertitie and of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Lacedemonians; as the Mantineans and Eleans: these did firmly betake themselves to the Argues, in whom they knew the same affection to be inueterate; others did only hate the peace concluded; and these would rather haue followed the Spartans than the Argues in warre, yet rather the Argues in war than the Lacedemonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like vnto themselves, dealt with them to enter into the societie of the Argues, as they had done: but the diuerse formes of gouernement, vsed in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incur the danger of innovation, by ioyning with such as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This business hauing ill succeeded, the Corinthians beganne to bebinke themselves of their owne danger, who had not so much as any truce with Athenes, and yet were vnprepared for warre. They fought therefore to come to some temporarie agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment, with one Citie that shewed against them more stomach than force; but gaue them to vnderstand that they might be safe enough from them, if they would claime the benefit of that alliance, which Athenes had lately made, with Sparta and her dependants; yet finally they granted vnto these Corinthians (which were loath to acknowledge themselves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they desired, but into private confederacie they would not admit them, it being an article of the league betwene them and the Spartans, That the one should not make peace nor warre without the other.

Herein, as in many other passages, may clearly be seene the great aduantage which absolute Lords haue as well in peace as in warre, our such as are serued by voluntaries. We shall hardly finde any one Signorie, that hath bene so constantly followed as Sparta was, by so many States, and some of them little inferior to it selfe, being all as free: whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsion meanes gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselves as Tyrants.

But

But in performance of conditions agreed vpon, the Athenians were able to make their wordes good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacie, and giuing vp such places as were agreed vpon: of which the Lacedemonians could doe neither the one nor the other. For such Townes as their old Allies had gotten by their meanes in the late warre, could not bee restored without their consent, which had them in present possession, and particularly the Towne of Panact, which the Thebans held, could by no meanes be obtained from them by the Lacedemonians (who earnestly desired it, that by restitution thereof vnto the Athenians, as earnestly demanding it, themselves might recouer Pylus, vnlesse they would agree to make a priuate alliance with Thebes, which thereupon they were faine to doe, though knowing it to be contrarie to the last agreement betweene them and *Athen*s.

The Lacedemonians hauing broken one article of the league made betweene them & the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselves to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not giue vp the Towne of Panact, till first they had vtterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was sought to haue beene executed by the Lacedemonian Embassadors, who comming to *Athen*s (whether they had sent home all prisoners that had beene detained at Thebes), hoped with gentle wordes to salue the matter; saying, That from henceforth no enemie to *Athen*s should nestle in Panact, for it was destroyed. But these Embassadors had not to deale with tame fooles. For the Athenians told them in plaine termes, That of three principall conditions agreed vpon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but vsd such base collusion as stood not with their honour: hauing made priuate alliance with the Thebans; hauing destroyed a Towne that they should haue restored; and not hauing forced their dependants by warre, to make good the covenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deedes to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time, both in *Athen*s and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that yeare, in Sparta; and Alcibiades a powerfull young Gentleman in *Athen*s. But the Ephori, though desiring to renew the warre, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to bee rendred to them by covenant, especially Pylus that had so forcibly troubled them. Alcibiades whose Nobilitie, riches, and fauour, with the people, made him desire warre, as the meanes, whereby himselfe might procure some honourable employment, vsd all meanes to set the quarrell on foot, whilst the Athenians had yet both aduantage enough, as not hauing rendred ought first their prisoners, and pretence enough to vse that aduantage of breaking the peace, by reason that the Lacedemonians (though indecidentally against their wills) had broken all covenants with them. Now the State of *Athen*s had fully determined to restore Pylus, and to performe nothing that the Lacedemonians should, and might require, vntill they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all articles whereunto they were bound, even to the vtmost point. This was enough to make them sweate, who hauing already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the deliuerie of their Citizens, which were prisoners. But Alcibiades willing a speedie beginning of open warre, sent priuily to the Argues, and gaue them to vnderstand how fitly the time serued for them to associate themselves with *Athen*s, which was enough to giue them securitie against all Enemies.

The Argues vpon the first confluence of many Estates vnto their societie, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should haue had the conduct of all Greece against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as hauing ill vsed it, and thereby leauing their old enemies in case of much contempt and disability. But these suddaine apprehensions of vaine joy, were suddainly changed into as vaine feare; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately bene conceiued of Argos. For when the Thebans had refused their alliance; when the Cerinthians thians had sought securitie from *Athen*s; and when a false rumour was noised abroad, that *Athen*s, Thebes, and Sparta, were come to a full agreement vpon all points of difference; then beganne the Argues to iect tall their creits, and sue for peace vnto the Lacedemonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their grauitie, and were not ouer-hastie to acceptir. At this time, and in this perturbation, the message of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argues, which were not now consulting how to become the chiefe of all others, but how to saue themselves. Wherefore they sent away presently to *Athen*s, their owne Embassadors, accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a league offensive, and defensive, between their Estates and the Athenians.

Of this businesse the Lacedemonians knew not what to thinke: for well they saw, that such a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to prevent it; but to keepe the loue of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already done, than stood with their honour, or profit; others held it the wisest way, hauing done so much, not to stick vpon a little more, but rather by giuing full satisfaction to retaine the friendship of that State, which was more to bee valued than all the rest of Greece. This resolution preuailling, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the peace, who comming to *Athen*s with full commission to make an end of all controuersies, did earnestly labour in the Council-house, to make the truth of things appeare, saying, that their Confederacie with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recouerie of Panact: concerning which Towne, or any other businesse, that it much grieved the Lacedemonians, to see things fall out in such wise as might giue to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done which in reason might be required for making matters euen betweene them; to which purpose they shewed that themselves had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Pylus might bee restored vnto them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argues might be called a-side. Favourable audience was giuen to this proposition, the rather because they which promised amends, had power to make their wordes good. But all this faire likelihood of good agreement was dasht on the suddaine, by the practise of Alcibiades, who, secretly dealing with the Lacedemonian Embassadors, perswaded them well of his friendship towards their Citie, and aduised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be knowne to the Communitie of *Athen*s, least the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptorie, and yeeld to nothing, vnlesse they could draw them to vncreasonable conditions. The Embassadors beleued him, and fashioned their talk in the assembly of the people, as hee had aduised them. Here vpon the same Alcibiades taking presently the aduantage, which their double dealing afforded, inuighed openly against them, as men of no sinceritie, that were come to *Athen*s for none other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthening themselves with friends, meaning to draw the Argues and their Adherents to their owne alliance, as (contrarie to their oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of *Athen*s, whom a pleasing errand would hardly haue satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedemonians, (whose honest meanings had so ill bene seconded with good performance) were now so incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadors, and the strong perswasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the league with Argos. Yet for the present so farre did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, preuaile with them, that the businesse was put off, till he himselfe with other Embassadors might fetch a better answer from Sparta.

It may seeme a great wonder, how so poore a trick of Alcibiades was able to carrie a matter of such importance, when the Spartan Embassadors might haue cast the load vpon his owne shoulders, by discouraging the truth.

But the grauitie which was usually found in the Lacedemonians, hindered them (perhaps) from playing their game handsomely against nimble wits; and they might well haue been thought vntruly men, had they protested themselves such as would say and vs-ay for their most advantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a fower message to deliver at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedemonians should take the paines to rebuild Paniste, and should immediately renounce their alliance made with the Thebans; letting them vnderstand that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacie with the Argues, and their Adherents. The Epheus at Sparta had no minde to forsake the Thebans, assured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was sufered to breake out what way it could, which to mitigate they would doe no more, than only (at the request of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not seeme to haue effected nothing) sweare a new to keepe the articles of the league betwene them and Athens. Immediately therefore vpon returne of the Embassadors, a new league was made betwene the Athenians, Argues, Mantineans, and Eleans, with very ample prouision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedemonians were passed over with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacie did bend it self chiefly against them, as in short while after was proued by effect.

At this time the Lacedemonians were in ill case, who hauing restored all that they could vnto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselves recovered nothing of their owne (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they shoud. But that which did most of all disabie them, was the losse of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late warre by misfortunes, than in fundrie passages betwene them and the Athenians: to procure and keepe whole Amicitie, they had left fundrie of their old friends to shift for themselves. Contrariwise the Athenians, by the treatie of peace, had recovered the most of that which they lost in warre; all their gettings they had retained; and were strengthened by the access of new Confederates.

§. VII.

How the peace betwene Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

It was not long ere the Argues and their fellows had found businesse, wherewith to let the Athenians on worke, and make vse of this conjunction. For presuming vpon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So many acts of hostilitie were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did not (as principals) infect each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aide of their severall friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Boeotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other people of Greece, beganne a new to range themselves vnder the Lacedemonians, and follow their ensignes. One victorie which the Lacedemonians obtained by their meere valour in a set battaile, neare to Mantineia, against the Argues side, helped well to reape their decayed reputation, though otherwise it yielded them no great profit. The ciuill disension arising shortly after within Argos it selfe, betwene the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almost throwne downe the whole frame of the new combination. For the chiefe Citizens getting the vpper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded so farre as to renounce the amitie of the Athenians in expresse wordes, and forced the Mantineans to the like. But in short space of time the multitude preuailling, reuerted all this, and hauing chased away their ambitious Nobilitie, applied themselves to the Athenians as closely as before.

Beside these vprores in Peloponnesus, many assaies were made to raise vp troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewise in Alaccion, to the Athenians, whose forces and readinesse for execution, preuented some things, reuenged other, and requited all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrell, and the Lacedemonians growing wearie, they beganne to be quiet, retaining still that enmitie in their hearts, which they had sufficiently discouered in effects, though not so yet breking out into termes of open warre.

§. VIII.

The Athenians sending two fleets to sacke Siracuse, are put to flight and utterly discomfited.

Vring this intermission of open warre, the Athenians re-intertrained their hopes of subduing Sicily, whether they sent a fleet so mightie as was heretofore by Greece in any Age before or after.

This fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all necessities to so great an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the tactics in Athens, whence Alcibiades Author of that wing, and one of the Generalls of their fleet, was driuen to banish himselfe, for feare of such iudgement, as else he was like to haue vnder-gone, among the incens'd people; partly by the inuasion which the Lacedemonians made vpon Attica, whilst the forces of that State were so farre from home. Hereunto was added the aide of the King of Peris, who supplied the Peloponnesians with money.

Neither was the successe of things in Sicilie such, as without helpe from Athens, could giue any likelihood of a good end in that warre. For although in the beginning the enterprize had so well succeeded, that they besieged Siracuse, the chiefe Citie of the Island, and one of the fairest Townes which the Greekes inhabited, obtaining the better in fundrie battailes by Land and Sea; yet when the Towne was beleagued with strong aide from Peloponnesus, it came to passe that the Athenians were put to the worke on all sides, in such wise that their fleet was shut vp into the haue of Siracuse, and could not issue out.

As the Athenian affaires went very ill in Sicily, so did they at home stand vpon hard termes, for that the Lacedemonians, who had beene formerly accustomed to make wearisome yearly iournies into Attica, which hauing piled and foraged, they returned home; did now by counsell of Alcibiades, who seeking reuenge vpon his owne Citizens was fled vnto them, fortifie the Towne of Lecadie, which was neare to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily excursions to harrie all the Countrey round about, and sometimes giue alarme vnto the Citie it selfe.

In these extremities, the peruerse obdinate of the Athenians was very strange; who leauing at their backs, and at their owne doores, an enemy little lesse mightie than themselves, did yet send forth another fleet into Sicily, to inuade a people no lesse puissant, which neuer had offended them.

It often happens that prosperous euent makes foolish counsaile seeme wiser than it was, which came to passe many times among the Athenians, whose vaine conceits Pallas was said to turne vnto the best. But where vnfound aduise finding had prooffe, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can iustly be blamed for a miserable issue. This second fleet of the Athenians, which better might haue serued to conuey home the former, that was defelated; after some attempts made to snall purpose against the Siracusians, was finally (together with the other part of the Naue, which was there before) quite vanquished, and bard vp into the haue of Siracuse.

case, whereby the campe of the Athenians, utterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for iuaccour or departure, was driven to briake vp and flie away by Land, in which flight they were ouer-taken, routed, and quite ouerthrowne in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischiefe well deservedly fell vpon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophocles and Pheaeus Generalls, formerly sent into that Ile, pretending that they had taken money for making peace in Sed, whereas indeede there was no meanes or possibilitie to haue made waerie. Her by it came to passe, that Nicias, who had the chiefe command in this vnhappie enterprise, did rather chooe to hazard the ruine of his Countrey by the losse of that Armie, wherein consisted little lesse than all the power of Athen; than to aduenture his owne estate, his life, and his honour, vpon the tongues of thamelesse accusers, and the sentence of Iudges before his triall resolved to condemne him, by retiring from Saxa, when wisdom and necessitie required it. For (said he) they shall giue sentence vpon vs, who know not the reason of our doings, nor will giue eare to any that would speake in our behalfe, but altogether hearken to suspitions and vaine rumours that shall be brought against vs, yea these our Seales, in whose name we are so desirous to retorne in safety, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man to doe what reason wilth, not what opinion expecteth, and to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed confidence, rather than by the malicious report and censure of others) yet it may be excused; since he had before his eyes the iniustice of his peoples; and had well understood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked iust, as being like a precedent and patterne, whereby oppression beginning vpon one, is extended as a warrantable vpon all. Therefore his feare of wrongfull condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily haue ouer-mastered; but when afterwards the Armie, hauing no other expectation of safetye than the faint hope of a secret flight, he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moone, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to haue the campe brake vntill ten and twentie daies were past. His timorousefne was euen as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not haue thought that the power of the Hea, and the course of Nature, would be as vnjust as his Athenians, or might pretend lesse euill to the flourishing, than to such as did their best. Neither doe I thinke that any Astrologer can allege this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armes destruction, otherwise than as the folie of men did, by application, turne it to their owne confusion. Had C. Cæsius the Roman, he, who slew Iulius Cæsar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, he retrying the broken remainder of Cæsius his Armie deicid, the Parthian Archers was aduised, vpon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sunne were past the signe of Scorpio; he made answer, that he stood not in such feare of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So aduenturing rather to abide the frowning of the Hea, than the nearer danger of Enemies vpon eard, hee made such a safe and honourable retreat, as did both shew his nobler resolution, and giue a faire example to that good rule,

Thus wee see that God, who ordinarily workes by a concatenation of meanes, deprives the Governours of vnderstanding, when hee intends euill to the multitude; and that the wickednesse of vnjust men is the readie meane to weaken the vertue of those who might haue done them good.

of the troubles where into the State of Athen fell, after the great losse of the Fleet, and Armie, in Sicilia.

The losse of this Armie was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accounted a very little lesse calamitie to that State, than was the subuersion of the walls, when the Citie about seuen yeares after was taken by Lysander. For now beganne the Subjects of the Athenian State to rebell, of whom, some they reduced vnder their obedience; others held out; some for feare of greater inconvenience were set at libertie, promising only to be their good friends, as formerly they had beene their Subjects; others hauing a kind of libertie offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect libertie by force. Among these troubles it fell out very vnseasonably, that the principall men of Athen being wearied with the peoples insolencie, tooke vpon them to change the forme of that Estate, and bring the gouernement into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Capitaines which were abroad, they caused them to set vp the forme of an Aristocratie in the Townes of their Confederates; and in the meane time, some that were most likely to withstand this inuolution, being slain at Athen, the Commonaltie were so dismayd that none durst speake against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not, but euery man was afraid of his Neighbour, least he should be a member of the league. In this generall feare the Majestic of Athen was vsurped by foure hundred men, who obseruing in shew the ancient forme of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded vnto the people, and concluded vpon by the greater part of voices; but the thinges propounded were only such as were first allowed in priuate among themselves; neither had the Commonaltie any other libertie, than only to approue and giue consent, for whoeuer presumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquirie made of the murder. By these meanes were many decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new Authoritie, which neuertheless indured not long. For the Fleet and Armie which then was at the Ile of Samos, did altogether detest these dealings of the foure hundred vsurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they reuoked Alcibiades out of banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised vnto the Lacedæmonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, made vnprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first bene very well entertained in Sparta, whilst his seruice done to that State was not growne to be the object of enuie. But when it appeared that in common faile and good performance he so farre excelled all the Lacedæmonians, that all their good success was ascribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principall Citizens wearie of his vertue; especially Agis one of their Kings, whose wife had so far yielded her selfe to the loue of this Athenian, that among her inward friends there could not forbear to call her yong child by his name. Hereupon order was taken that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discouering the Spartan treacherie, conceiued himselfe vnto Tissaphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beautie, sweet conuersation, and sound wit, that he soone became the Master of that barbarous Vice-roys affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings treasures and forces in those parts. Then beganne he to aduise Tissaphernes, not so farre forth to assist the Lacedæmonians, that they should quite ouerthrow the State of Athen; but rather to help the weaker side, and let them one consume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsaile hee made way to other praistises, wherein by strength of his reputation (as the only fauourite of so great a Potentate) hee plaied his owne game, procuring his restitution. At length his banishment being repealed by the Armie, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the foure hundred) hee laboured greatly to reconcile the Souldiers to the Gouvernors; or at least to diuert their heat another way, and turne it vpon the common Enemie. Some of the foure hundred approued his motion, as being wearie of the tyrannic whereof they were partakers, partly because they law it could not long endure, and partly for that themselves being lesse regarded by the rest of their companions, than lood with their good liking, sought to acquit themselves of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtaine peace of the Lacedaemonians, desiring chiefly to maintaine both their owne authority, and the greatness of their Citie, if they might, but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preferre their owne power, or libertie at least, than the good Estate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made sundrie ouertures of peace to the Lacedaemonians, desiring to compound in as good termes as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to bee trusted than the wauering multitude; especially considering that the Citie of Sparta was gouerned by an Aristerate, to which forme they had now reduced Atheni. All these passages betweene the foure hundred (or the most and chiefe of them) and the Lacedaemonians, were kept as secret as might be. For the Citie of Atheni, hoping without any great cause, to repaire their losses, was not inclined to make compolition; from which vpon iustler ground the enemie was much more auerse, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not vnknewne abroad) might yeeld some faire opportunitie to the destruction of it selfe, which in effect (though not then presently) came to passe. And vpon this hope King Agis did sometimes bring his forces from Decelea to Atheni, where doing no good, hee receiued some small losses. Likewise the Naue of Teloponnesus made shew of attempting the Citie, but seeing no likelihood of successe, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better Fortune of the Athenians might more lightly haue bene regarded, than in this their decayed estate. Yet it seemes, without any disparagement to their wisdom, they should rather haue forborne to present vnto the Citie, or to the Countreies neare adioyning any tennour of the warre. For the dissention within the walls might soone haue done more hurt than could be receiued from the Fleet or Armie without, which indeede gaue occasion to fit the Citizens at vnitie, though it lasted not very long. The foure hundred, by means of these troubles, were faine to resigne their authoritie, which they could not now hold, when the people hauing taken armes to repell forraine enemies, would not lay them downe, till they had freed themselves from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of gouernement a full restitution of the foueraigne command vnto the people, or whole body of the Citie, but only to fise thousand; which companie the foure hundred (when their authoritie beganne) had pretended to take vnto them as assistants: herein seeming to doe little wrong or none to the Commonaltie, who seldome assembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeede into the hands of so many, it was soone agreed that Alcibiades and his Companions should bee recalled from exile, and that the Armie at Samos should bee requested to vndertake the gouernement: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers desire.

His establisment of things in the Citie, was accompanied with some good successe in the warres. For the Lacedaemonians were about the same time ouerthrowne at Sea, in a great battaile, by the Athenian fleet which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards joyning such forces as he could raise, obtained many victories. Before the Towne of Abydos, his arrinall with eightene ships gaue the honour of a great battaile to the Athenians; hee ouerthrew and vterly destroyed the fleet of the Lacedaemonians, commanded by Mindarus, tooke the Townes of Cyzicus and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ranfome their Citie, and fortified Chrysopolis. Hecupion letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians, intercepting, found to containe the disreille of the Armie in these few wordes: Alcis lost; MINDARVS is slaine; the Souldiers want victuals; we know not what to doe.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades ouerthrew the Lacedaemonians in fight by Land at Chalcedon, tooke Selymbria, besieged and wanne Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which euen in those daies was a goodly, rich, and very strong Citie. Hecupion returned home with very great welcome, and was made high Admirall of all the Naue.

But this his honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and hee driuen to banish himselfe againe; only because his Lieutenant, contrary to the expresse command of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the fleet.

The second banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmefull than the first; and the losse which thereupon they receiued, was (though more heauie to them, yet) lesse to be pittied of others, than that which ensued vpon his former exile. For whereas at the first, he had fought reuenge vpon his owne Citie; now, as inured to aduersitie, he rather pittied their furie, who in time of such danger had cast out him that should haue repaired their weak estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamitie of his people, to comfort himselfe after iniurie receiued. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alcibiades, arrived at the fleet, hee presented battaile to Lyfander the Lacedaemonian Admirall, who was not so confident vpon his former victory, as to vndertake Alcibiades himselfe, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former losse of fifteene) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had bene vnder his Lieutenant. But when the decree of the people was published in the Naue, then did Alcibiades withdraw himselfe to a Towne vpon Hellefpont, called Bisanthe, where hee had built a Castle.

¶ XI.

The battaile at Arginusæ, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captaines by the people.

After this time the Athenians, receiving many losses and discomfitures, were driuen to fle into the Hauen of Abydene, where they were straightly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege necessitie inforced them to man all their Vessells, and to put the vttermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battaile. This battaile was fought at Arginusæ, where Callistratus, Admirall of the Lacedæmonians, looting the honour of the day, professed his owne reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well have bene expected, that the ten Captaines, who joyntly had command in chiefe over the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies service, and so happy a victorie, have received great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise they were forth with called home, and accused, as if they wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunke, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessells to take them vp, they might have saved them from being drowned. Hereto the Captaines readily made a very iust answer; That they pursuing the victorie, had left part of the fleet, vnder sufficient men, to save those that were wrackt; which if they were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse availed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who said, That he himselfe escaping in a meale-tubbe, had bene intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to desire of the people reuenge of their deaths vpon the Captaines. It was very strange that, vpon such an accusation maintained with slender euidence, men that had well deserved of their Countrey should bee overthrowne. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst absolve them, save only Socrates the wife and vertuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgement was not regarded. Sixe of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much ado rescued by other vessells in the forme: but the Captaines which were absent escaped; for when the force of the people was over-past, this judgement was reuersed, and the accusers called into question for hauing deceived and peruerced the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infame of iniustice; but the diuine justice was not a sleepe, nor would be so deluded.

§. XII.

The battaile at Ægos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian Warre.

THe Peloponnesian fleet vnder Lysander, the yeare next following, hauing scoured the Ægean Seas, entred Hellepont, where (landing Souldiers) it besieged and tooke the Towne of Lampfacus. Herupon all the Naue of Athens, being an hundred and fourescore saile, made thither in haste, but finding Lampfacus taken before their coming, they put in at Seius, where hauing refreshed themselves, they sailed to the Riuer called, Ægos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Gaster-brooke, or the Riuer of the Gates; being on the Continent, opposit to Lampfacus: and there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lysander, who rode at Lampfacus in the harbour. The next day after their arrivall they presented fight vnto the Peloponnesians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned againe to Ægos-Potamos, and thus they continued five daies, brauing euery day the Enemye, and returning to their owne harbour when it drew towards evening.

The Castle of Alcibiades was not farre from the Naue, and his power in those places was such as might haue greatly auailed his Countymen, if they could haue made vse of it. For he had waged Mercenaries, and making warre in his owne name vpon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much reputation among them. He perceiving the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired vnto them, and shewed what great inconuenience might grow, if they did not soone foresee and preuent it. For they lay in a roade subject to euery weather, neither neare enough to any Towne where they might furnish themselves with necessaries, nor so farre off as had become more expedient. Seius was the next Market-Towne; thither both Souldiers and Mariners resorted, flocking away from the Naue euery day, as soone as they were returned from brauing the Enemye. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to leaue Seius, which was not farre off, or at the least to consider better how neare their enemye was, whose feare proceeded rather from obedience to his Generall, than from any cowardise. This admonition was so farre despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his owne matters, and to remember that his authority was out of date. Had it not bene for these opprobrious wordes, hee could (as hee told his familiars) haue compelled the Lacedæmonians, either to fight vpon vnequall termes, or utterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that hee might so haue done, by transporting the light armed Thracians to his Confederates, and others his Followers ouer the Straights, who assailing the Peloponnesians by Land, would either haue compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leaue their ships to the mercie of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsaile no better than hath bene rehearsed, hee left them to their fortune, which how euill it would bee hee did prognosticate.

Lysander all this while defending himselfe by the aduantage of his Haven, was not carelesse in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was to send forth some of his swiftest Vessells after them, who observing their doings, related vnto him what they had sene. Therefore vnderstanding in what carelesse fashion they romed vp and downe the Countrey, hee kept all his men a-board after their departure, and the fift day gaue especial charge to his Scouts, That when they perceived the Athenians disembarking, as their custome was, and walking towards Seius, they should forthwith returne, and hang vp a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lysander being in a readinesse, made all speede that length of Oares could giue, to Ægos-Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies a-board their ships, not many neare them, and all in great confusion vpon the newes of his approach.

In so much that the greatest industrie which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that losse imported, gaue over Athens as desperate, and made a long flight vnto the Ile of Cyprus, all the rest were taken, and Inch of the Souldiers as came in to the rescue cut in peeces. Thus was the Warre which had lasted seuen and twentie yeares, with variable success, concluded in one houre, and the glorie of Athens in such wise eclipsed, that their neuer after was shone againe in her perfect light.

Immediately vpon this victorie, Lysander, hauing taken in such Townes as readily did yeeld vpon the first fame of his exploit, set saile for Athens, and ioyning his forces with those of Agas and Paulanias, Kings of Sparta, summoned the Citie, which finding too stubborne to yeeld, and too strong to bee wonne on the suddaine, hee put forth againe to Sea, and rather by terrour than violence, compelling all the Islands, and such Townes of the Ionians, as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselves to Sparta, hee did thereby cut off all prouision of victuals, and other necessaries, from the Citie, and enforced the people by meere famine to yeeld to these conditions. That the long walls, leading from the Towne to the Port, should be throwne downe; That all Cities subiect to their Estate, should bee set at libertie; That the Athenians should bee Masters only of their owne Territories, and the fields adjoining to their Towne; And that they should keepe no more than twelue ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same, whom the Lacedæmonians did, and follow the Lacedæmonians as Leaders in the Warres.

These

These articles being agreed upon, the walls were throwne downe with great rejoycing of those who had borne displeasure to Athenians; and not without some consultation of destroyng the Citie, and laying waite the Land about it. Which aduise, although it was not entertained, yet were thirtie Countours, or rather cruell Tyrants, appointed ouer the people, who recompensed their former insolencie and iniustice ouer their Captaines, by oppressing them with all base and intolerable flauerie.

The only small hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repaire what their owne folly had ruined. But the thirtie Tyrants perceiving this, aduertised the Lacedaemonians thereof, who continued, and (as now domineering in euery quarter) soon effected his suddaine death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian Warre. After which the Lacedaemonians abusing their reputation, and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew venodious to all Greeces, and by Combination of manie Cities against them, were disposessed of their high authoritie, euen in that very Age, in which they had subdued Athenians. The greatest foile that they tooke was of the Thebans, led by Eponemus, vnder whom Philip of Macedon, Father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the Citie of Sparta (besides other great losses received) was sundrie times in danger of being taken. But these haughtie attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the severall Estates and Signories of Greece, were growne so jealous one of anothers greatnesse, that the Lacedaemonians, Athenians, Argues, and Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselves with the weaker partie, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one Citie could extend the limits of her iurisdiction so farre as might make her terrible to her Neighbours. And thus all parts of the Countrey remained rather evenly balanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had bene dependants, and followers, yea almost meere Vassalls to the Estates of Athenians and Spartans) found meanes, by making vse of their factions, to bring them all into seruitude, from which they neuer could be free, till the Romaines presenting them with a shew of libertie, did themselves indeede become their Masters.

CHAP. IX.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponnesian Warre, or shortly following it.

§. I.

How the affaires of Persia stood in these times.

URING the times of this Peloponnesian Warre, and those other lesse expeditions forgoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, hauing peaceably enjoyed a long raigne ouer the Persians, lett it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Basard, whom the Greek Historians (lightly passing ouer Xerxes, the second, and Sogdianus as Vipers, and for their short raigne little to be regarded) place next vnto him, or to Xerxes the second, who, and his brother Sogdianus after him (seeming to haue bene the sonnes of Hesper) held the Kingdome but one yere betweene them, the younger succeeding his elder brother. It is not my purpose (as I haue said before) to pursue the Historie of the Persians from henceforth, by rehearsal of all the particulars, otherwise then as they shall be incident to the affaires of Greece. It may therefore suffice to say, That Xerxes the second, being a virtuous Prince, did perill after a month or two, if not by surfeit, then by treacherie of his as riotous brother Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he slew vnjustly Bagoratus a principall Eunuch, and would haue done as much to his brother Darius the Basard, had not lree foreseene it, and by raising a stronger Armie than this hated King Sogdianus could leaue, seized at once vpon the King and Kingdome. Darius hauing slaine his brother, held the Empire nineteene yeres. Amartyas of Suis an Egyptian rebelled against him, and hauing partly slaine, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garrisons, allied himselfe so firmly with the Greekes, that by their aide he maintained the Kingdome, and deliuered it ouer to his posteritie, who (notwithstanding the furie of their ciuill Warres) maintained it against the Persian, all the daies of this Darius, and of his sonne Artaxerxes Alacmon. Likewise Amorges, a subject of his owne and of the Roiall blood, being Lieutenant of Caris, rebelled against him; confederating himselfe with the Athenians. But the great calamitie, before spoken of, which fell vpon the Athenians in Sicill, hauing put new life into the Spartans, and giuen courage to the flanders and others, subject to the State of Athenians, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage: It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedaemonians being destitute of monney, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Naue, without which it was impossible to aduance the warre against the State of Athenians, that remained powerfull by Sea, were driuen to craue his assistance, which he granted vnto them, first vpon what conditions best pleased himselfe, though afterwards the articles of the league betweene him and them were set downe in more precise termes, wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make warre joyntly vpon the Athenians, and vpon all that should rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Asia, which had formerly bene his, or his Predecessours, should returne to his obedience. By this Treatie, and the warre ensuing fining (of which I have already spoken) he recovered all that his Grand-father and Father had lost in Ara. Likewise by assistance of the Lacedemonians he got Amorgos a-lie into his hands, who was taken in the Citie of Isus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to succour him. Neuertheless Aegypt still held out against him; the cause whereof cannot bee the employment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece, for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with gold, which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, and his naturall enemies, what the valour of his owne Subjects was insufficient to performe. Darius had in marriage Parysatis his owne sister, who bare vnto him (besides other children) Artaxerxes called Athenion, that is to say, the Mindfull, or the Remembrer, who succeeded him in the Kingdome; and Cyrus the yonger, a Prince of singular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that ever Persia bred after Cyrus the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leave vnto his elder sonne Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did cast a jealousie vpon the doings of yong Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, tooke more vpon him than belitted a Subject: for which cause his father sent for him, with intent to haue taken some very sharpe course with him, had not his owne death preuented the coming of his yonger sonne, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the warre betweene these bretheren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, wee shall haue occasion to speake somewhat in more conuenient place.

§. II.

How the thirtie Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

I Hold it in this place most conuenient to shew the proceedings of the Greekes, after the subuersion of the walls of Athen, which gaue end to that warre called the Peloponnesian warre, but could not free the vnhappie Countrie of Greece from ciuill broiles. The thirtie Gouer-nours, commonly called the thirtie Tyrants of Athen, were chosen at the first by the people to compile a bodie of their Law, and make a collection of such ancient Statutes, as were meetest to be put in practise: the condition of the Citie standing as it did in that so sodaine alteration. To this charge was annexed the supreme authoritie, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessity of the times did so require it, wherein the Law being vncertaine, it was lit that such men should giue iudgement in particular causes, to whose iudgement the Lawes themselves, by which the Citie was to bee ordered, were become subiect. But these thirtie hauing so great power in their hands, were more carefull to hold it, than to deserue it by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them in trult.

Therefore apprehending such troublesome fellowes, as were odious to the citie, though not punishable therefore by law, they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approued, who considered their lewd conditions, but did not withall betinke themselves, how easie a thing it would bee vnto these thirtie men, to take away the liues of Innocents, by calling them perturbors of the peace, or what else they listed, when condemnation without due triall and proofe had bene once well allowed. Hauing thus plausibly entred into a wicked course of gouernement, they thought it best to fortifie themselves with a sure guard, ere they brake out into those disorders, which they must needs commit for the establishing of their authoritie. Wherefore dispatching two of their owne companie to Sparta, they informed the Lacedemonians, that it was the full intent of the thirtie, to keepe the Citie free from all rebellious motions, to which purpose it behoued them to cut off such as were seditious; and therefore desired the Lacedemonians to send them them a Garrison, which they promised at their owne cost to maintaine. This motion was well approued, and a guard sent, the Captaine of which was so well entertained by the thirtie, that none of their misdeedes could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants beganne to take heart, and looking no more after base and detested persons, invaded the principall men of the Citie, lending armed men from House to House, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely, or able, to make any head against this wicked forme of gouernement: whereby there was such effusion of blood, as to Theramenes (one of the thirtie) seemed very horrible, and vnable to escape vengeance. His dislike of their proceedings being openly discovered, caused his fellowes to betinke themselves, and provide for their owne securitie, and his destruction, least he should make himselfe a Captaine of the ademoniated (which were almost the whole Citie) and redeme his owne peace with their ruine. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens, whom they thought meetest, and gaue vnto them some part of publike authoritie, the rest they disarmed; and hauing thus increased their owne strength, and weakened their opposites, they beganne a-breth to shed the blood, not only of their priuate enemies, but of such whose moncy, or goods, might enrich them, and enable them for the payment of their guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that euery one of them should name one man vpon whose goods he should seize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes vttered his detestation of so wicked intent, then did Critias, who of all the thirtie was most tyrannicall, accuse him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one maine priuiledge of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirtie, but haue the accustomed triall) he tooke vpon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenes, and so reduced him vnder the triall and sentence of that order. It was well allaged by Theramenes, that his name was not more easie to be blotted out of the Catalogue, than any other mans, vpon which consideration hee aduised them all to conuie no otherwise of his case, than as of their owne, who were liable to the same forme of proceeding: but (euery man choosing rather to preserve his owne life by silence, than presently to draw vpon himselfe the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would neuer come neare him) the Tyrants interpreting silence as consent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drinke poison.

§. III.

The conspiracie against the thirtie Tyrants, and their deposition.

AFTER the death of Theramenes, the thirtie beganne to vse such outrage, as excelled their former villanies. For hauing three thousand (as they thought) firme vnto them, they robbed all others without feare or shame, despoiling them of lands and goods, and causing them to flie into banishment, for safeguard of their liues. This flight of the Citizens procured their libertie, and the generall good of the Citie. For the banished Citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into consultation, and resolved to hazard their liues in setting free the Citie of Athen. The very thought of such a practise had been treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seuentie men, or thereabout, were the first vnder-takers, who with their Captaine Thrasylus tooke Phyle, a place of strength in the Territorie of Athen. No sooner did the thirtie heare of their exploit, than secke meanes to prevent further danger; assembling the three thousand, and their Lacedemonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyle, but were with some losse of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assault, they intended to besiege it; which purpose came to nought by meanes of snow that fell, and other stormie

weather, against which they had not made prouision. Retiring therefore to the Citie, which at oue all they were to make good, they left the most of their guard, and two companies of Horle, to weare out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying siege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thrasylbulus were encreased from leuentie to seuen hundred, which aduentured to giue charge vpon those guards, of whom they cut off aboue an hundred & twentie. These small, but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piræus, the suburbe of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their coming, the thirtie had refused to fortifie the Towne of Eleusine, to their owne vse, whereinto they might make an eutie retrait, and saue themselves from any suddaine perill. It may well seeme strange, that whereas their barbarous manner of gouernement had brought them into such danger, they were so farr from seeking to obtaine mens good will, that contrariwise, to assure themselves of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could beare armes into their hands by a traine, and wickedly (though vnder forme of iustice) murdered them all. But, Sceleribus tutum per scelera est iter, the mischief which they had alreadie done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparant likelihood of safetie, than by extending their crueltie vnto all, seeing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Thrasylbulus and his fellows, who as yet were termed conspirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thousand armed againe by the Tyrants, and brought to assault it; but in this enterprise Thrasylbulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom although there were slaine to the number of leuentie, only yet the victorie seemed the greater, because Critias, & one other of the thirtie, perished in that fight. The death of Critias, and the stout defence of Piræus, together with some exhortations vsed by Thrasylbulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect that the thirtie were depofed. Neuerthelesse there were so many of the three thousand, who hauing communicated with the thirtie in their misdeedes, feared to be called to a sharpe account, that no peace, nor quiet forme of gouernement could bee established. For Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who crauing aid against Thrasylbulus, and his followers, had fauourable audience, and a power sent to their assistance, both by Land and Sea, vnder the conduct of Lyfander, and his Brother; whom Pausanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Armie of the Cities confederate with the Lacedæmonians. And here appeared first the jealousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Boeotians, and Corinthians, who in the late warres had bene the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alleging that it stood not with their oathes, to make warre against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league: but fearing, indeede, least the Lacedæmonians should annexe the Territorie of Athens to their owne Demaines. It is not to bee doubted that Pausanias tooketh this answer in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to crosse the proceedings of Lyfander, whom he enuied. Therefore hauing in some small skirmishes against them of Thrasylbulus his partie, made a shew of warre, he finally wrought such means that all things were compounded quietly: the thirtie men, and such others, as were like to giue cause of tumult, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannical faction, hauing with-drawne themselves to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some inuouation, whereupon the whole Citie rising against them, tooke their Captaines, as they were coming to Parlie, and slew them: which done, to auoide further inconuenience a law was made that all injuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, and carefully obserued, the Citie returned to her former quietnesse.

CHAP. X.

Of the expedition of CYRVS the yonger.

§. I.

The grounds of CYRVS his attempt against his brother.

THE matters of Greece now standing vpon such termes, that no one Estate durst oppose it selfe against that of Lacedæmon; yong Cyrus, brother to Artaxerxes, King of Persia, hauing in his fathers life time very carefully profecuted the warre against Athens, did send his messengers to Sparta, requesting that their loue might appeare no lesse to him, than that which he had shewed towards them in their dangerous warre against the Athenians. To this request, being generally, the Lacedæmonians gaue a futable answer, commanding their Admirall to performe vnto Cyrus all seruice that hee should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discovered himselfe, and the Lacedæmonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the Kingdome of Persia should haue been the recompence of his deserts, or that he perishing in battaile, as after he did, the subuersion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew vnto the Greekes the waies, which vnder the Macedonian Enignes, the victorious foot-steps of their posteritie should measure; and opening vnto them the riches, and with all the weaknesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that conquest, which he refused to an other generation; than to giue into their hands that mightie Kingdome, whose houre was not yet come. The loue which Parysatis the Queene Mother of Persia bare vnto Cyrus her yonger sonne, being seconded by the carnest fauour of the people, and readie desires of many principall men, had moued this yong Prince, in his fathers old age to aspire after the succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath beneene shewed) whose meaning was to curbe this ambitious youth; hee found his elder brother Artaxerxes established so surely by the old Kings fauour, that it were not safe to attempt any meanes of displanting him, by whose disfauour himselfe might easily loose the place of a Viceroy, which he held in Asia the lesse, and hardly be able to maintaine his owne life. The nearest neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardise, treacherie, craft, and all vices which accustomably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, vying by the way all shewes of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might well bee thought that Queene Parysatis had obtained the inheritance of that mightie Empire. And it was very true that Parysatis had vsed the best of her endeuour to that purpose, alleging that (which in former ages had bene much auailable to Xerxes, in the like disceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was borne whilst his father was a priuate man, but Cyrus, when he was a crowned King. All which not sufficing, when the most that could bee obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adioyning: then did this Tissaphernes discouer his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treason intended against his person. Vpon this accusation, whether true or false, very easily believed, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreatie of his Mother very hardly deliuered, and sent back into his owne Prouince.

§. II.

The preparations of Cyrus, and his first entrie into the Warre.

THe forme of gouernement which the Persian Lieutenants vsed in their feuerall Prouinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made Warre and Peace, as they thought it meete, not only for the Kings behoofe, but for their owne reputation; vsually indeede with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their owne heads were held only at the Kings pleasure, which caused them to frame all their doings, to his will, whatsoever it were, or they could conjecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being settled in Lydia, began to consider with himselfe, the interest that he had in the Kingdome; the small assurance of his brothers loue, held only by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the meanes which he had by loue of his owne people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedemonians, whom he had bound vpon him, to obtaine the Crowne for himselfe. Neither was it expedient that he should long sit idle, as waiting till occasion should present it selfe: but rather enterprise somewhat which yet his Mother liued, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than only questionable. Hereupon he first beganne to quarrell with Tissaphernes, and seized vpon many Townes of his jurisdiction, annexing them to his owne Prouince; which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that hee was of condition somewhat timple) being truly paid by Cyrus the accustomed Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his brothers hot spirit exercised in priuate quarrells. But Tissaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, and cowardise despised, although he durst not adventure to take armes against Cyrus, yet perceiving that the Milesians were about to giue vp themselves into the hands of that yong Prince, as many other Townes of the Ionijs had done, thought by terrour to preserve his reputation, and keepe the Towne in his owne handes. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing faire occasion to take armes, which was no small part of his desire. In leuying Souldiers he vsed great policie; for heooke not only the men of his owne Prouince, or of the Countries adioyning, whose liues were readie at his will, but secretly he furnished some Grecian Captaines with money, who being very good men of warre, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessalie, others scowhere in Greece; but all of them readie to crosse the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had few instructions to prolong their feuerall warres, that the Souldiers might be held in continuall exercise, and readie in armes vpon the sodaine. Cyrus hauing sent a power of men to besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greekes, who very readily came ouer to his assistance, being thirteenth thousand very firme Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Armie, and that which he had leuied before, he could very easily haue forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of Asia the lesse: but his purpose was not so to looke time in small matters, that was to be employed in the accomplishment of higher designs. Pretending therefore that the Phisiens, a people of Asia the lesse, not subiect to the Persian, had invaded his Territories, he raised the siege of Miletus, and with all speed marched Eastward, leauing Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leisure to reioyce that Cyrus had left him to himselfe, when he considered that so great an Armie, and so strong, was neuer leuied against the Routers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of five hundred horse, hee posted away to carrie tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

§. III.

How Cyrus took his journey into the higher Asia, and came vp close to his Brother.

THe tumult which his coming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queene Statira, against Parysatis, the Queene-Mother, whom shee called the Author and occasioner of the warre. But whilst the King in great feare was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger halted vpon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, hauing his numbers much increased, by the repaire of his Countreymen, though most strengthened by the access of seuen hundred Greekes, and of other four hundred of the same Nation, who revolted vnto him from the King. How terrible the Greekes were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Miltir, which (to please the Queene of Cilicia, who had brought him aide) hee made in Phrygia, where the Greekes by his direction making offer of a charge vpon the reit of his Armie, which contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Campe (not perceiving that this was but a brauerie) fled a-maine, the victuallers and baggagers forsaking their cabins, and running all away for very feare. This was to Cyrus a joyfull spectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the same temper, and the more vnlike to make resistance, because they were prest to the warre against their will and dispositions, whereas his Armie was drawne long by meere affection and good will. Neuertheless he found it a very hard matter to perswade the Greekes to passe the Riuer of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had troden, wearied them with conceit of the tedious returne. Therefore hee was driuen, being yet in Cilicia, to seeke excuses, telling them that Abrocomus one of the Kings principall Captaines, and his owne great enemy, lay by the Riuer, against whom he requested them to assist him. By such daies, and excessive promise of reward, he brought them to Euphrates, where some of the Greekes considering, that who so passed the Riuer first, should haue the most thanks, and might safely returne if the rest should refuse to follow them, they entered the Foords, whereby were all finally perswaded to doe as some had begunne, and being allured by great hopes, they resolved to seeke out Artaxerxes, where soeuer he was to be found. The King in the meane time hauing raised an Armie of nine hundred thousand men, was not so confident vpon this huge multitude, as to adventure them in triall of a plaine battaile. Abrocomus, who with three hundred thousand men had vnder-taken to make good the Straights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a strong wall, and other defences of nature, and art, which made the place to seeme impregnable, had quitted the passage, and retired himselfe toward the Kings forces, not daring to looke Cyrus in the face, who despairing to find any way by Land, had procured the Lacedemonian flete, by the benefit whereof to haue transported his Armie. I doe not finde that this cowardise of Abrocomus, or of his Souldiers, who arrived not at the Campe till fise daies were past after the battaile, receiued either punishment, or disgrace, for they, toward whom hee with-drew himselfe, were all made of the same metall.

Therefore Artaxerxes was vpon the point of retiring to the vttermost bounds of his Kingdome, vntill by Zeribazus, one of his Captaines, he was perswaded not to abandon so many goodly Prouinces to the Enemy, who would thereby haue gathered addition of strength, and (which in the sharpe disputation of Title to a Kingdome is most auailable) would haue growne superior in reputation. By such aduice the King resolved vpon meeting with his brother, who now beganne to be secure, being fully perfwaded that Artaxerxes would neuer dare to abide him in the field. For the King hauing callt vp a Trench of almost fortie miles in length, about thirtie foot broad, and eightene foot deepe, intended there to haue encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing so fast as to be farre distant from his enemies.

§. IIII.

The battaile betweene CYRUS and ARTAXERXES.

THe Armie of Cyrus hauing ouercome many difficulties of euill waies, and scarcity of victuals, was much encouraged by perceiving this great feare of Artaxerxes, and being past this trench, marched carelesly in great disorder, hauing belowed their Armes in Carres, and vpon Bealts of carriage; when on the sodaine one of their Vaunt-curriers, brought newes of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselues, and had ranged their battailes in good order vpon the side of the Riuer Euphrates, where they waited for the coming of their enemies, whom they saw not till it was after-noon. But when they saw the cloud of dust raised by the feet of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceived by their neare approach how well they were marshalled, coming on very orderly, in silence, whereas it had bene expected, that rushing violently with lowd clamours, they should haue spent all their force vpon the first brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were so vnequall in distent, being all embattailed in one bodie and square, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Persian manner) in the midst of his owne, did not with the corner and vtmost point thereof, reach to the halfe breadth of Artaxerxes his battaile, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greekes beginne to distrust their owne manhood, which was not accustomed to make prooue of it selfe, vpon such excessive oddes. It was almost incredible, that so great an Armie should bee so easily chased. Neuertheless, it quickly appeared, that these Persians, hauing learned (contrarie to their custome) to giue charge vpon their enemies with silence; had not learned (for it was contrarie to their nature) to receiue a strong charge with courage. Vpon the very first offer of on-set, made by the Greekes, all that beaulty rabble of cowards fled amaine, without abiding the stroke, or staying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hookes and sithes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twentie) did small hurt that day, because the drivers of them leaping downe, fled away on foot. This base demeanour of his enemies gaue so much confidence to Cyrus, and his Followers, that such as were about him forth with adored him as King. And certainly, the Title had bene assured vnto him that day, had not he fought how to declare himselfe worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiving that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him void, was about to encompass the Greekes, and to set vpon them in the reare, he aduanced with six hundred Horse, and gaue so valiant a charge vpon a Squadron of six thousand which lay before the King, that hee brake it, slaying the Captaine thereof, Artages, with his owne hands, and putting all the rest to flight. Hereupon his whole companie of six hundred, very few excepted, beganne to follow the chase, leauing Cyrus too ill attended, who perceiving where the King stood in troupe, vncertaine whether to fight, or leaue the field, could not containe himselfe, but said; I see the man, and presently with a small handfull of men about him ranne vpon his brother, whom he strake through the Curace, and wounded in the brest. Hauing giuen this stroke, which was his last, he receiued immediately the fatal blow, which gaue period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded vnder the eye with a dart, throwne by a base fellow, wherewith alotted, hee fell dead from his horse, or so hurt, that it was vnpossible to haue recovered him, though all which were with him, did their best for his safetie; not caring afterwards for their owne liues, when once they perceived that Cyrus their Master was slaine. Artaxerxes cauled the head and right hand of his brother to bee forthwith stricken off, and shewed to his people, who now pursuing them fled apace, calling vpon the name of Cyrus, and desiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troups, and vterly dismayed such Persian Capitaines, as were now, euen in their owne eies, no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Campe of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned, from whence Artaxerxes, making all speede, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greekes, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There he met with Tissaphernes, who hauing made way through the battaile of the Greekes, was readie now to ioine with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the newes, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his brothers death, bene sufficient to counteruaile all disasters receiued; the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greekes would haue yielded little comfort. For Tissaphernes had not slaine any one man of the Greekes, but contrariwise, when he gaue vpon them, they opening their battaile, draue him with great slaughter through them, in such wise that hee rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the Squadron of the Greekes. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greekes, as Masters of the field, gaue chase to all that came in their light; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greekes, intending to set vpon them in reare. But these good Souldiers perceiving the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seeke honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being pursued vnto a certaine Village, that lay vnder a Hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a braerie, than with purpose to attempt vpon these bold-fellows any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had secured his estate, whom hee would seeme to haue slaine with his owne hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to giue reputation to his valour; and this reputation he thought that he might now preferre well enough, by shewing a manly looke, halfe a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore hee aduanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displayed on the top of a Speare. This ensigne might haue encouraged his people, had not some of the Greekes elpied it, who not meaning that he should abide so neare them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discouering their approach, fled vpon the spur; so that none remained in the place of battaile, save only the Greekes, who had lost that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondered that they heard no newes of Cyrus, but thinking that hee was pursuing the Armie, they thought it was fittest for them, hauing that day done enough, to returne to their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings coming had giuen them no leisure to Dine.

§. V.

The hard estate of the Greekes after the fight; and how ARTAXERXES in vaine sought to haue made them yield vnto him.

Twas now about the setting of the Sunne, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Campe spoiled, little, or nothing being left, that might serue for foode: so that wanting victuals to satisfie their hunger, they refreshed their wearie bodies with sleepe. In the meane season Artaxerxes returning to his Camp, which he entred by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived perciued that the baseness of his people, and weakenesse of his Empire, was now plainly discovered to the Greekes; which gaue him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shameful demeanor of his Armie, should liue to carrie tidings home, it would not be long, ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signorie. Wherefore hee resolved, to trie all means, whereby hee might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carrie tidings of that which hee had seene: to which purpose hee sent them a braue message the next morning. Charging them to deliuer vp their Armes, and come to his Gate, to awaite there vpon his Mercie. It seemes that he was in good hope to haue found their high courages broken, vpon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceiued in that thought. For the Greekes being aduertised that morning from Artaus, a principall Commander vnder Cyrus, that his Master being slaine, he had retired himselfe to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from them, whence intending to returne into Ionia, his meaning was to dislodge the next day; awaiting for them so long if they would joyne with him, but resolving to stay no longer: they sent answer back to Artaus, that hauing beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Artaus himselfe in the Kings Throne, if he would joyne with them, and pursue the victorie. Before they receiued any reply to this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Campe, whose errand seemed to the Captaines very insolent: One told them that it was not for the Vanquishers to yeeld their Weapons; another, that hee would die ere hee yeelded to such a motion; a third asked, whether the King, as hauing the victorie, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in way of friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesie hee meant to requite their kindnesse. To this question Phalimus a Grecian, waiting vpon Tissaphernes, answered; That the King hauing slaine Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdom, in the middelt whereof hee held them fast enclosed with great Riues, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold vp their throats, for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These wordes, to them, who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalimus, that hauing nothing left, but their Armes and Valour, whilst they kept their Armes, their Valour would be seruicable, but should they yeeld them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remaine their owne. Hereat Phalimus laughed, saying; This young man did seeme a Philosopher, and made a pretie speech; but that his deepe speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Armes, and his Valour, to preuaile against the great King. It seemes that Phalimus being a Courtier, and imployed in a business of importance, thought himselfe too profound a Statesman, to be cheeke in his Embassage by a bookish discouerser. But his wisdom here failed him. For whatsoeuer hee himselfe was (of whom no more is knowen than that he brought an vnholiest message to his owne Countreimen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons and Liues, to the mercilesse Babonins) this young Scholler by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were surprisid by treacherie of the Persians, being a priuate Gentleman, and hauing neuer seene the warres before, vnder-tooke the conduct of the Armie, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalimus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithful to the King, as they had bene to Cyrus, offering their cruce in Egypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might haue vse of them. But the finall answer was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the King good as Friends, nor defend themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalimus deliuered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilst they abode where they then were, denouncing Warre if they stirred thence; Whereunto hee required their answer. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (saith Phalimus) must I understand stand you? as choosing peace if we stay, otherwise warre, said Clearchus. But whether warre or peace? quoth this politike Embassadour. To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose.) Let our doings tell you; and so dismissed him, no wiser than he came. All that day the Greekes were faine to feede vpon their Horses, Asles, and other Beasts, which they rosted with arrowes, darts, and wooden targets, throwne away by the Enemies.

§. VI.

How the Greekes beganne to returne home-wards.

At night they tooke their way towards Artaus, to whom they came at mid-night, being forsaken by foure hundred foot, and fortie horse, all Thracians, who fled ouer to the King, by whom how they were contented, I doe not finde. Like enough it is that they were cut in peeces, for had they been kindly vsed, it may well be thought that some of them should haue accompanied Tissaphernes, and serued as Stales to draw in the rest. Artaus being of too bale a temper, and birth, to thinke vpon seeking the Kingdome for himselfe, with such assistance as might haue giuen it vnto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make couenant with them for mutuall assistance vnto the last: Whereunto both parts hauing sworn, hee aduised them to take another way home ward, which should bee somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to releuee them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, hauing made a wearisome march, and tired the Souldiers, they found the Kings Armie which had coasted them, lodged in certaine Villages, where they purposed themselves to haue encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because hee would not seeme by declining them to shew feare, or weakenesse. That the Kings men were contented to remoue, and giue place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former behauiour; Nor strange, that the Gracians being wearie and hungrie, and lying among enemies in an vnknowne Countreie, should be very fcarefull: but it is almost past beleefe, that the noise which was heard of these poore men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition enforced them to doe, should make the Persians sicke out of their Campe, and so affright the great King, that in stead of demanding their Armes, he should crace peace of them. The next day very early, came Messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free access for Embassadours, to enreat of peace. Were it not that such particulars doe best open the quality of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to runne ouer the general passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkable, that when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for battaile, because the Greekes (as he said) wanting wherewith to dine, could not endure to heare of true till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes dissembling the indignitie, was contented sweetly to swallow downe this pill, sending them guides who conducted them to a place where was plentie of victuals to releuee them.

§. VII.

B. VII.

How TISSAPHERNES under colour of peace betrayed all the Captaines of the Greekes.

Hereto the Greekes, relying vpon their owne vertue, had rather aduanced their affaires, than brought themselves into any straits, or termes of disaduantage. But now came vnto them the subtle Fox Tissaphernes, who circumventing the chiefe Commanders by fine feight, did mischicuously entrap them, to the extreme danger of the Armie. He told them, that his Prouince, lying neare vnto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their diuerſe might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countymen at home, would not bee vnthankfull for such a benefit. Herewithall hee forgot not to rehearse the great seruice that he had done to his Master, being the first that aduertised him of Cyrus his intent, and hauing not only brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battaile shewed his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backs: that hee, together with the King, did enter their Campe, and gaue chafe to the Barbarians that stood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth hee) did I alleage to the King, entreating that he would giue me leave to conduct you safe into Greece, in which suite I haue good hope to speede, if you will send a milde answer to him, who hath willed me to aske you, for what cause yee haue borne Armes against him. The Captaines hearing this, were contented to giue gentle words, which Tissaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly as he said) that peace should be granted: the conditions whereof were; That they should passe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for what they tooke, and committing no spoile: yea that it should be lawfull for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to afford them an open Market. Hereunto both parties hauing sworne, the League was concluded, and Tissaphernes returning to the King to take leave, and end all business, came vnto them againe after twentie daies, and then they set forward. This interim of twentie daies, which Tissaphernes did spend at the Court, ministred great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breed doubt; the Brethren, and Kindred of Arians, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Souldiers, did worke him and them so with assurance of pardon, and other allurements, that hee daily grew more strange to the Greekes, than formerly he had bene. This caused many to aduise Clearchus, rather to passe forward as well as he might, than to relie vpon couenants, and sit still whilst the King laid snares to entrap them. But he on the contrarie perswaded them, to rest contented whilst they were well, and not to call themselves againe into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting withall their owne wants, and the Kings meanes, but especially the Oathes mutually giuen and taken, wherewith hee law no reason why the enemies should haue clogged himselfe if he meant mischiefe, hauing power enough to doe them harme by a haire and open Warre.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable Man (if honour may be valued by greatness and place in Court) which caused his Oath to bee the more esteemed; for as much as no enforcement, or base respect, was like to haue drawne it from him. But his fallhood was such, both in substance and in successe, as may fitly expound that saying, which proceedeth from the fountaine of Truth, I hate a rich man a year. A lie may finde excuse when it grows out of feare: for that passion hath his originall from weaknesse. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of vntruth, the fallhood is most abhominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, aduancing his owne strength against the diuine Iustice, doth commit that sinne with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable table effects, and is followed with sure vengeance. It was not long ere Tissaphernes found meanes to destroy all the Captaines, whom hee subtilly got into his power by a traine; making the Generall Clearchus himselfe the meane to draw in all the rest. The businesse was contriued thus: Hauing trauailed some daies together, in such wise, that the Persians did not encampe with the Greekes, who were very iaculous of the great familiaritie, appearing betweene Tissaphernes, and Arius; Clearchus thought it conuenient to roote out of Tissaphernes his braines all causes of distrust, whereof many had growne in that short time. To which purpose obtaining priuate conference with him, hee rehearsed the oath of Confederacie, which had paſt betwene them, shewing how religiously he meant to keepe it, and repeating the benefits, which the Greekes did receiue by the helpe of Tissaphernes, and hee promised that their loue should appeare to him not vnfruitfull, if he would make vse of their seruice against the Assyrians or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infect his Prouince, or against the Egyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cause he desired him, that whereas all diuine and humane respects had linked them together, he would not giue place to any close accusation or suspicion, whereby might grow sadaine inconuenience to either of them, vpon no iull ground. The faithlesse Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministred faire occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him wisely considered, wishing him further to call to minde how many waies hee could haue vsed to bring them to confusion, without perill to himselfe, especially by burning the Countrie, through which they were to passe, whereby they must needs haue perished by meere famine. For which cause hee said that it had bene great folly, to seke by perjurie, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his handes; But the truth was, that his owne loue to them had moued him to worke their faticke, not only for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himselfe, and the King, by their assistance; but for that he might by their friendship, hope to obtaine what Cyrus had willed. Finally, hee invited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that hee promised to bring all the Captaines with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by secret information sought to raise dissention betweene them. Clearchus himselfe being thus deceived, with great importunitie drew all the chiefe Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders, to repaire with him to the campe of Tissaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers, as it had bene to some common Faire. But being there arrived, Clearchus with other the five principall Coronels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, wherethey had not waited long ere a signe was giuen, vpon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slaine. Forthwith certaine bands of Persian Horse-men scoured the field, killing as many Greekes as they met, and riding vp to the very Campe of the Gracians, who wondered much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one, elcaping sorely wounded, informed them of all that had bene done. Hereupon the Greekes tooke Armes in hast, thinking that the enemy would forthwith haue assailed their Campe. Anon they might perceiue the Embassadors of Tissaphernes, among whom were his owne brother, and Arius, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principall men in the Armie, saying, That they brought a message from the King, which Arius deliuered to this effect. That Clearchus hauing broken his faith, and the league made, was justly rewarded with death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the five Coronels, for detecting his treacherie, were highly honoured; and finally, that the King required them to surrender their Armes, which were due to him, as hauing belonged vnto his seruant Cyrus. When some alteration had followed vpon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadors, that if Clearchus had in such sort offended, it was well that he was in such sort punished: but he willed them to send backe

Antion and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greekes might be aduised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadors knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, and the other foure were sent to Ataxerxes, by whose commandement their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amiss to preuent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousness of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward received. He saw his Province walled by the Greekes against whom receiving from his Master conuenient aide of men and money, hee did so ill manage his affaires, that neither subtiltie, nor perjurie (to which he failed not to haue recourse) auailing him; finally, the King was jealous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, who tooke it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treacherie, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the seruice which he could not doe, he was thought vpon private ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flee from the stroke, all the world being shut against him. But now let vs returne to the prosperitie, wherein hee triumphed without great cause, hauing betrayed brauer men than himselfe, and intending to bring the like mischiefe vpon the whole Armie.

§. VIII.

How Xenophon heartened the Greekes, and in despite of Tissaphernes went off safely.

Great was the heaviness of the Souldiers, being now destitute of Leaders, and no lesse their feare of the euill hanging ouer their heads, which they knew not how to auoide. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deepe sadness of the whole Armie to be such, as hindered them from taking any course of preuenting the danger at hand, beganne to aduise the vnder-Officers of Proxenus's companies, whose familiar friend he had bene, to betinke themselves of some meane, whereby their safetie might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: setting before their eyes whatsoever might serue to giue them hope, and aboue all perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercie of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take vpon him the charge of that Regiment; and so together with him, the same night calling vp such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succede in the places of those who were slaine, or taken. This being done, and order set downe for disburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the losse of Tissaphernes's assistance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheape than he had bene wont to sell them; To which purpose they intended to take vp their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentifull Villages, and so to proceede, marching towards the heads of those great Riuer, which lay in their way, and to passe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made vpon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, seruing all on foot, were not able to requite for the harme which they received by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greekes could reach. For this cause did Xenophon provide slings, wherewith he ouer-reached the enemy; and finding some Horses fit for seruice, that were imploied among the carriages he set men vpon them; training likewise his Archers, to shoote compassse, who had bene accustomed to the point blank. By these meanes did hee beare off the Persians who assailed him; and sometimes gaue them chase with that band of sifit Horses, which being well backt, with a firme bodie of foemen, and seconded with troups of the light armed-shot and slingers, compelled the enemy to lie a loose. Tissaphernes not daring to come to handie-gripes with these these resolute men, did possesse the tops of Mountaines, and places of aduantage, by which they were to passe. But finally, when their valour made way through all such difficulties, he betooke himselfe to that course, which was indeede the fairest, of burning the Countrie. With great sorrow did the Greekes behould the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some aduised to defend the Countrie, as granted by the enemy himselfe to be theirs; others to make more lires, if so perhaps the Persians might be ashamed to doe that which were the desire of such as made passage in hostile manner; But these were faint comforts. The best counsaile was, That being neare vnto the Carduchi, a people enemy to the Persian, they should enter into their Countrie, passing ouer some high Mountaines which lay betwene them. This course they followed, which could not haue auailed them if Tissaphernes had begunne sooner to cut off their victuals, rather then to seeke to force, or to circumuent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greeke Armie found in passing through the Land of the Carduchi.

Nearing vpon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountered with many difficulties of waies, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselves against the huge Armies of the Persian, were no way inferior to the Greekes in daring, but only in the Art of warre. They were very light of foot, skilfull Archers; and vsed the Sing well; which weapons in that mountainous Countrie, were of much vse against these poore trauellers, afflicting them in leuen daies, which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Betwene the Territorie of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ranne Centrites a great Riuer, vpon which the Greekes refreshed themselves one day, rejoycing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would proue easie. But the next morning they saw certaine troups of Horses, that lay to forbid their passage. These were leaued by the Kings Deputies in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companies hauing taken their way towards Jonis. The Riuer was broad and deepe, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite banks. To increase these dangers the Carduchi following vpon them, lay on the side of a Mountaine, within less than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discouer a Foord, by which the greater number of them passing ouer, did easily chase away the Subjects of the Persian, and then sending backe the most expedite men, gaue succour to the Rear ward, against which the Carduchi being slightly armed, could not on plaine ground make resistance hand to hand. These Carduchi seeme to haue inhabited the Mountaines of Xiphates, which are not farre from the Spring of Tigris; though Ptolomie place them farre more to the East vpon the Riuer of Cyris in Media, wherein hee differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded vpon his owne knowledge, doth best in this case deserve credit. Of the Riuer Centrites (as of many other Riuers, Townes, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a conjecture, which may indure the severitie of a Critick. For Ptolomie, and the whole Nation of Geographers adde small light to this expedition: only of this last, I thinke it the same which falleth into Tigris, not much above Artasgarta springing out of Xiphates, and running by the Towne of Sardens in Gordene, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greekes hauing passed Centrites did arrive.

§. X.

How TERIBAZVS Gouverneur of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greekes with termes of faimed peace, was disappointed and shamefully beaten.

THe Armie finding in Armenia good prouision, marched without any disturbance about fiftie or threecore miles to the head of the River Tigris, and passing ouer them, traualled as farre further without resistance, till they were encountered by Teribazus at the River Tielesas, 10 which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though small, but Ptoleme and others omit it. Teribazus gouerned that Countrey for the Perian, and was in great fauour with Artaserxes, whose Court may seeme to haue bene a Schoole where the Art of fillibood was taught as wisdom. He desired peace of the Greekes, which was made vpon this condition, that they should take what they pleased, but not burne downe the Townes and Villages in their way. As soon as he had made this league, he leauied an Armie, and besetting the straits of certaine Mountaines which they were to passe, hoped w<sup>t</sup> to make such benefit of their securitie, as might giue him the commendations of being no lesse craftily dishonest than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of successe. For a great snow fell, which caused the Greekes 20 to make many fires, and scatter themselves abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandred about seeking reliefe. By the fires he was discouered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was revealed. Hereupon the Greekes, taking this captiue with them for a guide, fought him out, and conning vpon his Campe, did to alight him, that before the whole Armie could arriue there, the shout which was raised by the Vaunt-currors, chased him away. They tooke his Paulitron, wherein (besides many slaues, that were Artificers of voluptuousnesse) very rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Armie went north- 30 ward, and passing Euphrates, not far below the Springs thereof, traualled with much difficultie through deepe snow, being followed alooke by the enemy, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found stragling behinde. The Inhabitants of the Countrey, through which they marched had their wintering houses vnder ground, wherein was found great plentie of victuals, and of cattaille, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Hauing refreshed themselves in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable journey, which had consumed many of them with extreme cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-slaues, and taking away (besides other Horses and Cattaille) some Colts that were bred vp for the great King.

§. XI.

The passage of the Armie to Trabizonde, through the Countreies bordering vpon the River of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

SO without impediment they came to the River Phasis, neare where- 50 vnto the people called Phasiens, Taochi, and Chalybes were feared. These Nations joynt together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountaine, which the Greekes were to passe, made countenance of warre: but some companies being sent by night to seize vpon a place of equall height to that wherein the enemies lay, making good the peece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused the people to flie, every one retreating to the defence of his owne. The first vpon whose Countrey the the Greekes did enter were the Taochi, who conuaying all their prouision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Armie into much want, vntill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of cattaille were taken; the people, to auoide captiuitie, threw themselves head-long downe the rocks, the very women throwing downe first their owne children, and then casting themselves vpon them. Here was taken a great bootie of Cattaille, which serued to feed them, traualing through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountered the Greekes hand to hand, killing as many as they tooke prisoners, and cutting 10 off their heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great griefe of their companions liuing; who were glad, when after seuen daies journey they escaped from those continuall skirmishes, wherewith they had been vexed by these barbarians. Hence traualing through a good corne Countrey, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Sythians, they came to a rich Towne, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adjoining, vsed them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountaine, whence they might discouer the Euxine Sea. From Gomias (which was the name of his Towne) hee led them through the Territorie of his enemies, desiring them to wait it with sword and fire. After fise daies march, they came to a Mountaine called Teches, being (as I thinke) a part of the Mountaines called Atelchus, 20 whence their guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course, and passing friendly through the Region of the Macians, (with whom by means of an interpreter, found among themselves, who borne in that place had bene sold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arriued in the land of Colchis, wherein stands the Citie of * Trabizond, called then Trapezus, a Colonie of the Greekes. The Colchians entertaining them with hostilitie, were requited with the like; for the Armie, hauing now good leisure to repose themselves among their friends the Trapezuntians, did spoile the Countrey thirte daies together, forbearing only the Borderers vpon Trabizonde, at the Citizens request.

§. XII.

How the Armie beganne at Trabizond to prouide a Fleet, wherewith to returne home by Sea: how it came into the Territorie of Sinape, and thence prosecuted the same purpose to effect.

HAving now found an Hauent Towne, the Souldiers were desirous to take shipping, and change their tedious Land-journies into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Chersiphos a Lacedaemonian, one of the principall Commanders, promised by means of Anticibius the Lacedaemonian Admirall, who was his friend, that hee would prouide 40 Vessells to imbarke them. Hauing thus concluded, they likewise tooke order for the staying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to vse them for their navigation. Least all this prouision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Armie, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adjoining to cleare the waies, and make an easie passage for them by Land; whereunto the Souldiers were vterly vnwilling to giue care, being desirous to returne by Sea: but the Countrey fearing what inconuenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them failed directly into Greece, forsaking their 50 Companions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabizonde: the other tooke Merchants and Passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessells were failed to increafe the Fleet. After long abode, when victuals beganne to faile, by reason that all the Land of the Colchians, neare vnto the Campe, was already quite waited, they were faine to imbarke their sick-men, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might be spared, in those few ships which they had already provided. The rest of the Armie tooke their way by Land to Cerjusa, a Greeke Towne, where the fleet likewise arrived. Here the Armie being mustered was found to consist of eight thousand and six hundred men. From hence they passed through the Countie of the Masyasi, who were divided into factions. The stronger partie, despising their friendship, caused them to joyne with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

a Masyasi a Nation of Persians adjacent to b Cerjusa a Port-Towne in the same Region.

c Sinope a Port-Towne in Asiatia, a Colonie of the Myriani.

The next place of their abode was Cerjusa, a Greeke Towne likewise, and a Colonie of the Myriani, as Trapesus and Cerjusa were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, having neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sick-men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Towne by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were like in convenient lodgings, taking into their owne hands the custodie of the Gates. Provision for the Armie they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territorie of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Towne. These newes were welcome to Sinope, whence Embassadors were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, and threatening to joyne with the Paphlagonians, if redresse could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, that mere necessity had enforced the Armie to teach those of Cerjusa good manners in so bad a method: letting them know, that he feared not to deal with them and the Paphlagonians at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonians would be glad to take Sinope itselfe, to which, if cause were given, they would lend assistance. Upon this answer the Embassadors grew better aduised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Towne of Cerjusa to releue the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with shipping, letting them understand how difficult the passage by Land would prove, in regard of the manie and great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which crossed their way. This good counsaile, and the faire promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Armie, which well perceived that the Citie of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sea; provided, that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serue to imbarke every one man of them, then would they not put from the shore.

§. XIII.

Of dissention which arose in the Armie; and how it was imbarked.

It hereto the danger of enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the companie in firme vnities; which now beganne to dissolve, and to thaw, by the neighbouring aire of Greece, warming their heads with priuate respects to their seuerall ends and purposes. Whilst they, who were sent as Agents from the Campe, remained at Sinope; Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunitie of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honorable worke to build a Citie in those parts, which were soone like to proue great and wealthy, in regard both of their owne puilliance, and of the great repaire of the Greekes into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countie, diuining of his successe by the entrails of beastes. The Sooth-sayer, whom he employed, had receiued a great reward of Cyrus, for conjecturing aright, that Astaxes would not give battaile in ten daies: hee therefore, having preferred his money carefully, was desirous to be soone at home, that he might freely enjoy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was diuulged, which was interpreted according to the discretie of mens opinions; some approving the motion, but the greater greater part rejecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclea, being informed of this consultation, were sore afraid, least the powerie of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintaine themselves at home, should giue successe to the project. Which to prevent, they promised to supply the Armie with a sufficient fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Captaines, who thereupon vnder-tooke to rogue the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set saile for Greece. One of these Captaines being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Trezi; an other offered to leade them into Cheronefus. Xenophon who desired only the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and professed openly that hee would haue them to set forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a Traitor that should forsake the Armie, before such time as they were arrived at their Iournies end. Sidarus the Sooth-sayer, who had vttered Xenophons purpose, was hereby staied from our running his fellowes, and druen to abide with his wealth among poore men, longer than stood with his good liking. Also the other Captaines were much troubled and afraid, when they perceived, that ships were prepared sufficient for their Nauigation, but that the money promised to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope and Heraclea, knowing that the Armie was now re-coloured for the voyage, and that Xenophon, whom they feared, had perswaded them to this resolution; thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Naue, which they were in good readinesse to depart, but to keepe the money to themselves. The Captaines therefore who being disappointed by these Townes, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with faire hopes, repented much of their hasty offers, and signifying as much to Xenophon, praied him to make proposition to the Armie, of taking the ships, and sailing to Phasis, where they might seize vpon Lands, and plant themselves in such wiselike should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the business, they began to worke the principall of their owne followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These newes becomming publike, bred a suspicion of Xenophon, as if he had wonne the rest of the Captaines to his purpose, and meant now to carrie the Armie quite on other way from their owne home. Wherefore assembling the Companies, he gaue them satisfaction, and withall complained of some disorders, which he caused them to redresse. A generall inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus; which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadors from Corylas, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who sending presents desired peace of the Greekes: the Embassadors were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to haue beene fought, for that the Greekes having now their Fleet in a readinesse, did soone weigh Anchor, and set saile for Harmene, the Port of Sinope, whether Chersiphilus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admirall Anaxibius, who promised to giue the Armie pay as soone as they came into the parts of Greece.

§. XIII.

Another great dissention and distraction of the Armie. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and reposed by XENOPHON.

The nearer that they approached to Greece, the greater was their desire to make provision for themselves, that they might not returne home empty-handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Armie were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, hee might the more conueniently procure the good of them all, they determined ned to make Xenophon sole Commander of all; in whose favour as well the Captains as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displeace the Lacedæmonians who were jealous of him already (being incensed by that fugitive who forsooke the Armie at Trabizond, flying with one of their two ships) or moved by some tokens appearing to him in the entrailes, that threatned ill successe to his gouernement, procured with vehement contention that this honour was laied vpon Cherisophus a Lacedæmonian. It seemes that Xenophon, considering the vexations incident to the conduct of a voluntarie Armie, wanting pay, did wisely in yielding to such tokens as forbad him to accept it; especially, knowing so well their desire, which was, by right or by wrong to get wealth wherefoeuer it might be found, without all regard of Friend or of Foe. Cherisophus had bene Generall but sixe or seuen daies, when hee was depose, for hauing bene vnwilling to robbe the Towne of Heraclea, which had sent presents to the Campe, and bene very beneficiall vnto them in lending ships for their transportation. Two daies they had failed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great Riuer, which would haue giuen impediment to their journey by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where, consulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea, one feditious man began to put them in minde of seeking to get somewhat for themselves; telling them that all their prouision would be spent in three daies, and that being now come out of the enemies Countrey, victuals, and other necessities, could not bee had without money; for which cause he gaue aduice to send messengers into the Towne of Heraclea, giuing the Citizens to vnderstand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand peeces of money, called Cyzicenes, which summe amounteth to two thousand and five hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the summe raised to ten thousand Cyzicenes at least: which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being Generall, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon: but in vaine, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Least therefore either of these should faile in managing the businesse which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudencie and lesse discretion were sent, who in such wise deliuered their insolent message; that the Citizens taking time to deliberate vpon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Towne, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the walls. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to bee disappointed of their rauenous purpose, they fell to mutinie, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the more part of them Aradians, and Acheians, they forsooke immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their owne number. About foure thousand and five hundred they were, all heavily armed, who electing ten Captaines, sailed vnto the Port of Calpas, which is in the mid-way betwene Heraclea and Bizantium, with purpose to assaile the Bythinians on the suddaine. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and foure hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and fortie horse, which small band had done good seruice already, and could not haue bene spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Gouernour of Bizantium, to meete him at the mouth of the Riuer Calpas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to conueigh him ouer into Greece; for which cause hee tooke his way thither by Land, leauing to Xenophon such shipping as he had, who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed vpon the Confinnes of Heraclea, and Thracia Asiatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land Countrey to the Propont. The Mutinies who had landed at Calpas by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythia, diuided themselves into ten Companies, euery Captaine leading his owne Regiment into some Village, five or six miles from the Sea; in the greater Townes were two Regiments quartered; and so was that part of the countrey surprisid on the suddaine, and sacked all at one time.

The

The place of it enduous was an high peece of ground, where some of them armed, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger; two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaping, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians which escaped at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Countrey, and finding the Greekes loden with bootie, tooke the advantage of their disorder, cutting in peeces those two Regiments: which done they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill whereon they encamped. One great advantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retreat from these Aradians and Acheians: who wanting the assistance of horse, and hauing neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driuen to stand meercly vpon their defence, bearing oile with great danger, and many wounds received, the darts and Arrows of the Barbarians, till finally they were driuen from their watering place, and enforced to craue parlie. Whatfoeuer the articles of composition were, the Thracians yielded to all; but pledges for assurance they would giue none, without which the Greekes well knew, that all promises of such people, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the meane time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Trauailers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Armie, passing along those parts: and receiving by them true information of the desperate case into which the Gallants had foolishly throwne themselves, hee marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides them who gaue him the intelligence. His horse-men he sent before to discouer, and to scoure the waies; the light armed foot-men tooke the hill-top on either hand; all of them setting fire on whatsoeuer they found combustible, whereby the whole Countrey seemed to bee on a light flame; to the great terror of the enemies, who thought that some huge Armie had approached. That night he encamped on a Hill, within five mile of the Aradians, encircling with the number of his fires, which he caused hastily to bee quenched soone after Supper. The enemies perceiuing this, thought certainly that hee would haue come vpon them in the darke, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early the next morning Xenophon coming thither in very good array, to haue giuen battaile, found that his deuce, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but hee maruailed that the Greekes were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquire, that they remoued at break of day, and perceiued by signes that they had taken the way to the Port of Calpas, in which journey hee neuer tooke them. They embaced him, and his, with great joy: Confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that hee should haue come by night, wherein finding themselves deceiued, they were afraid least he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away, to ouertake him, and ioyne with him. So they arrived at the Hauon of Calpas, where it was decreed, That whofoeuer from thencefort made any motion to dilioyne the Armie, should suffer death.

§. XV.

Of diuers peeces of seruice done by XENOPHON, and how the Armie returned into Greece. The occasions of the warre betwene the Lacedæmonians and the Perssians.

THE Hauon of Calpas lay vnder a goodly head-land, that was very strong, and bounding with all kinde of Graine and Fruits, except Oliues. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very conuenient feate for a great Citie. All which commodities, that might haue allured the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to halt away, fearing least Xenophon should finde some device to haue feined himselfe and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to lue at home, neither did they so much for hope of gaine follow Cyrus in that Warre, as in regard of his Honour, and the loue which they bare vnto him: the poorer sort were such as left their Parents, Wives, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now detourous to returne. But whether it were so that Xenophon found aduantage by their owne superstition, to make them flay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signes appearing in the entrailes, did indeede forbid their departure: so long they were inforced to abide in the place till victualls failed, neither would the Captaines leade them forth to forrage the Countrie, vntill the Sacrifices should promise good successe. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joynd to the rest of the Armie, which the greater it was, the more prouision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Coronell into the place of Cherisophus, would needes aduerture to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoile of some Villages that stood neare at hand; in which enterprife he found ill successe, the whole Countrie lying in wait to entrap him, and an Armie of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians, which troupes falling vpon the Greekes that were scattered abroad in seeking bootie, slew fise hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certaine Mountaine thereby. The newes of this ouerthrow comming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Armie to the rescue of those that suruiued, and brought them safe to the Campe; vpon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enimie, together with the present condition of the Armie, so disheartened and vnfurnished of necessities, caused the Greekes to remove their Campe to a place of more strength; which hauing intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to indure traunle, Xenophon with the fittest and best able men went forth, both to burie those which were lately slaine, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their Assailants. In this journey his demeanour was very Honourable. For hauing giuen buriall to the dead, the Enemie was discouered, lying on the tops of the Hills adjoyning, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough, and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leaue at their backs a wood scarce passable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, that hee had rather follow the enimie with halfe the number, than turne his back to them with twice as many, and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Babylonians, hee would not faile with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could safely retire to the campe, yet what should they doe there, wanting victualls to sustaine them in the place, and ships to carrie them away? wherefore hee willed them rather to fight well that day, hauing eaten their dinners, than an other day fasting; and not to regard the vncertaine returne, which might serue to slay Cowards from running away, but to with vnto the Enemie a faire and easie way, by which hee might fle from them. These persuasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Countrie forthwith, removing their Families, and leauing all that could not soderly be conueighed away, to the discretion of the Greekes, who at good leisure gathered the harvest of these bad Neighbours fields. This was the last fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they were not only suffered quietly to enioy the spoile of the Countrie, but when the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colonie on the Port of Calpas, Embassadours were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make make offer of their best assistance. But the Souldiers had no minde to flay. Wherefore entering further into Bythinia, they took a great bootie, which they carried away to Cyzyopolis, a Citie neare vnto Chalcedon, where they sold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly feare, least their long flay in that Countrie might breed in them a desire to vilifie his Prouince, where they might haue found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore hee sent to the Lacedemonian Admirall, entreating him with much influence and large promises to wait them ouer into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condescending, promised to giue the Souldiers pay, as soone as they arrived at Bizantium. So were they carried out of Asia at the intreatie of the Persians, who in the height of his pride had thought them so surely imprisoned with mightie Riuers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to surrender their Armes into his handes, and so to yeeld their lues to his direction. How discourteously they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his injurious dealings, they seized vpon Bizantium, which by Xenophon's persuasion they forbore to sack, I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertaine little to the generall course of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, so did it both discouer the secrets of Asia, and stirre vp the Greekes to thinke vpon greater enterprises, than euer their forefathers had vnderaken. Likewise it was the only remarkable action which the time afforded. For the Roman warres did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Townes of Italia; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedemonians ruling insolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the seedes of the Warre shortly following, which the Lacedemonians made vpon Artaxerxes, were already sowne, before these companies returned out of the high Countries of Asia. For the Townes of Ionia, which had sided with yong Cyrus against Tissaphernes, if not against the great King, prepared to rebell, which they thought safer, than to fall into the handes of Tissaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Prouince, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians besought the Lacedemonians to send them aide, whereby to recouer their liberties; and obtained their request.

For a power was sent ouer, vnder conduct of Thimbro a Spartan, who bestowed his men in such Townes as had already revolted, to secure the Citie and their Fields, but not to make any offensive Warre.

CHAP. XI.

Of the affaires of Greece, whilst they were menaged by the Lacedæmonians.

§. I.

How the Lacedæmonians took courage by example of XENOPHONS Armie, to make Warre vpon ARTAXERXES.

IT seemes that the Lacedæmonians did well perceiue in how ill part Artaxerxes took their fauour thewed vnto his brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open warre against him, thinking it sufficient to take all care that no aduantage might slip, which could serue to strengthen their estate, by finding the Perſian worke beyond the Sea. But when Xenophon Armie had reucaled the basenesse of those effeminate Asiatiques, and rehearsed the many victories which they themselves had gotten, vpon termes of extreme disadvantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of vndertaking vpon this huge vnweldie Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joyn't-forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whercof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon, and further, finding no power that was able to give them resistance, in all that long journey of foure and thirtie thousand two hundred and fiftie furelongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about foure thousand two hundred foure score and one, a very painefull march of one yeare and thre moneths. Neuerthelesse the ciuill distraction wherewith Greece was miserably torne, and especially that hot fire of the Theban Warre, which, kindled with Perſian gold, brake forth sodainly into a great flame, drew back out of Asia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to the defence of their owne estate; leauing it questionable whether Agessius, hauing both the same, and farre greater forces, could haue wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two yeares, which he spent in Asia, his deedes procured more commendation of magnanimitie and faire behauiour, than of stout courage, and great, or profitable atchieuements. For how highly so euer it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other warres, to extoll his vertue; his exploits being only a few incursions into the Countries lying neare the Sea, carrie no proportion to Xenophons owne journey, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retreat of Canon the Briton with fix thousand men from Aquileia, to his owne Countrey, through all the breadth of Italie, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Theodosius, being rather like it than equall. But of Agessius and his warres in Asia and Greece, we shall speake more in due place.

§. II.

§. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the warre in Asia.

HIMERO receiuing Xenophons men, beganne to take in Townes, and to entertaine all such as were willing to reuolt from the Perſian, who were many, and some of them fact, as had bene highly beholding to the King; who seeme to haue had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to liue vnder the gouernment of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate as the King his Master did loue him. The managing of the warre begonne by Himero, was for his oppressions taken out of his handes, and committed to Dercyllides a Spartan, who behaued himselfe as a good man of Warre, and a wise Commander. For whereas the rule of the low-Countries of Asia was diuided betwene Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes fauour the greater, and hauing the chiefe command in those warres against the Greekes; Dercyllides who did beare a priuate hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischeuous nature, and would not be forre to see his Countie throughly beaten, though to the Kings losse) made an appointment with Tissaphernes, and forthwith entred Æolis, which was vnder the iurisdiction of Pharnabazus, and forthwith in few daies, he brought into his owne power.

That Countrey of Æolis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gaue eadie successe to the attempts of Dercyllides. Zenis a Lacedæmonian had been Deputie to Pharnabazus in those parts; after whose death his wife Antia procured his Office, wherein she behaued herselfe so well, that she not only was beloued of the people vnder her gouernment: but enlarged her Territorie, by the conquest of certayne Townes adioyning; and sundrie times gaue assistance to Pharnabazus in his warres against the Myſians and Pisidians. For shee had in pay some Companies of Greekes, whose valour by her good vſage did her great seruice. But somewhat before the arriual of Dercyllides in those parts, a Sonne-in-law of hers, called Alcidas, whom shee trusted and loued much, being blinded with ambition, found meanes to fluster her, and kill her sonne of seuentene yeares old; which done, he seized vpon two of her principall Townes, wherin her treasure lay, hoping to haue bene admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers, that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Gouernour in the place of Antia. His presents were not only rejected by Pharnabazus, but reuenge of his fowle treason threatned; whereby the wicked villaine was driuen into tearmes of almost vtter desperation. In the meane time came Dercyllides, to whom the Townes of Antia, that held against Alcidas, did quickly open their Gates. One only Towne stood out foure daies (against the will of the Citizens, who were couetous of libertie) the Gouernour striving in vaine to haue kept it to the vſe of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities Gergebe and Sepeſis, which the Traitor held, who fearing all men, as being loued of none, sent Embassadors to Dercyllides, desiring leaue to speake with him, and pledges for his securitie: vpon the deliuerie of which hee issued out of Sepeſis, and coming into the Campe, made offer to ioyn with the Greekes vpon such conditions, as might seeme reasonable. But he was plainly told by Dercyllides, that other condition there was none, than to set the Citizens freely at libertie. And presently vpon these wordes they marched toward Sepeſis. When Alcidas perceiued that it was in vaine to strive against the Armie, and the Townes men; who were all of one minde; he quietly went along with Dercyllides, who remaining but a few houres in the Citie did a sacrifice to Minerua, and then leading away the Garrison of Alcidas, he left the Citie free; and departed toward Gergebe. Alcidas did not forsake his Companie, but followed him, earnestly intreating that he might be suffered to re-

taine Gergeithe: but coming to the Gates he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened, for (quoth Dercyllides) I must here likewise doe a sacrifice to Athena. The Traitor, not daring to make denial, cauld his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllides, taking possession of the place, tendred pay to the Garrison, who did not chuse to serue vnder his Ensignes. This done, all the goods of Mania were seized vpon, as belonging to one that had bene subiect to Pharnabazus, who was enemie to the Greekes: and so the murderous wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World hee might finde any place to hide his detested head. Dercyllides, having in eight daies taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease of his Confederates to winter in Bythnia, to which end hee tooke Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of Warre. That Winter, and the Sommer ensuing, the Truce being recontinued held; in which time, besides the walking of Bythnia, the neck of Læd joyning Cheronea to the Maine, was fortified, being foure or five miles in breadth, by which meanes eleuen Townes with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wild Thracians, and made fit and able to victuall the Campe. Likewise the Citie of Marne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with prouision. After this, Dercyllides had command from Sparta, to ouert the warre into Caria, where was the seat of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not vneale to recouer all the Townes of Ionis. Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yearly Office) being appointed to ioyne with him. Though it was manifest that Tissaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessitie, yet was he not in his owne danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus hauing respect to the Kings seruice, came to assist his priuate enemie Tissaphernes, and so passing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Ionis, hoping to finde the Townes ill manned for resistance. As these Persians were delirous to keepe the warre from their owne dores, so was Dercyllides willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoile and danger of the warre, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the Riuer of Meander, and not looking to haue been so soone encountered, marched carelessly through the Countrey: when on the very sodaine the whole Armie of Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus was discovered, consisting of Persians, Carians, and some Mercenary Greekes, who were all marshalled in very good order to present battaile. The odds was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readinesse, as also in advantage of ground: for the Persian had a great multitude of Horse, the Greekes very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plaine. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Ilanders and others, of such places as bordered vpon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselves to present flight; or abiding a while for shame did plainly discouer by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wise. Only Dercyllides with his Peloponnesians regarding their honor, prepared to endure the fight: which must needs haue brought them to destruction, if the counsaile of Pharnabazus had bene followed, who perceiving the opportunitie of so great a victorie, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a coward, seeing that countenance of resistance was made, beganne to consider what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had shewed and thinking that all the Greekes were of the like resolution, held it the wisest way to craue parley; the conclusion of which was, That a truce should be made, to last vntill Tissaphernes might receiue answer from the King, and Dercyllides from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treatie, which were on the one part that all the Greekes in Asia might enjoy their owne libertie and lawes, but contrariwise on the other side, that the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, and leaue the Townes to the Kings pleasure. This Treatie was of none effect; only it serued to free the Greekes from the present danger, and to gaine time vnto Tissaphernes, who desired to auoid the warre by procrastination, which he durst not adventure to finish by triall of a battaile.

How the Lacedæmonians tooke reuenge vpon the Eleans for old displeasure. The discontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, concerned against the State of Sparta.

IN the meane season the Lacedæmonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, beganne to call the Eleans to account for some disgraces receiued by them during the late warres, when leifure was wanting to the requittall of such petite injuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympique games, had set a fine vpon the Citie of Sparta, for non-payment of which, they forbade them to come to the solemnities, and publicly whipt one of them, that was a man of note, for presuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindred Agis King of Sparta, from doing sacrifice to Jupiter; and in all points vied great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no balincelle that could hinder them from taking reuenge: and therefore sent a peremptorie message to the Eleans, commanding them to let at libertie the Cities which they held in subiection. This was the vsuall pretence which they made the ground of all their warres: though little they cared for the libertie of such Townes, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than mere Vassalls of the Lacedæmonians. In their late warres with Athenis, the strong opposition which they found caused this goodly Title of libertie to worke very slowly: but hauing now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gaue present successe to their desires. Two yeares together they sent an Armie into the Countrey of the Eleans: the first yeare an earthquake (held in those times a prodigious signe, and which did alwaies forbid the prosecution of any enterprize in hand) caused them to retire: the second yeare, all the Townes of the Eleans did hastily revolt, and the Citie it selfe was driuen to submision; consenting both to suffer their old subiects freely to enioy their libertie, and to haue her owne walls throwne downe. Only the Presidentship of the Olympian games was left vnto them, which, it was not to be doubted that they would in time comming vse modestly, finding themselves to stand at the mercie of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greekes were assisitant to the Lacedæmonians, excepting the Corinthians and Beotians, whose aide hauing bene of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian Warre, as the force of Sparta it selfe, they could not smother their dislike of their vnequall diuision following the victorie; which gaue to Sparta the command of all Greece, to Thebes, and Corinth, only securitie against Athenis, but such a securitie as was worfe than the danger. For when the equall greatnesse of two mightie Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutral Common-weales to adhere to either, as the condition of their affaires required; but when to reuenge injuries, they had by mortall hatred prosecuted the warre to extremitie, leauing the one Citie naked of power and friends, the other mightily encreased in both, it was then (if not necessarie to obay the greatnesse which themselves had made yet) foolish and dangerous to prouoke it. Neuertheless, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victorie or compulsion made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

B. II. III.

The passage of AGESILAVS into Asia. His warre with TISSAPHERNES.
How TISSAPHERNES was put to death, and the warre diuerted into an other Prouince, through perswasion and gifts of TITHRAUSTES his successor. How carelesse the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

AGESILAVS newly made King of Sparta, was desirous to haue the honour of the victorie, which, not without cause, he expected vnto those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Armie to ioyne with that of Lercylidas, he took his way in great pompe to Aulis in Boeotia, a Haven, lying opposite to the Iland of Euboea, in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the warre against Troy, many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon hee meant also to doe sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Countrey, would not permit, but saying that the performance of such ceremonies in that place, belonged vnto their Officers, they were so vnable to conceale their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw downe his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for Agesilavus to entangle himselfe and his Countrey in any new warre; therefore, waiting better opportunitie of reuenge, he quietly swallowed the contumelie, and followed his maine intendment. Having landed his men at Ephesus, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treatie of peace, wherein Agesilavus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to liberall all the Greeke Townes in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answer to his good liking, if he would in the meane while make truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tissaphernes had sought only to winne time of making prouision for the warre, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes; whilst Agesilavus was busie in seeing the Estates of his Confederate Cities on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from warre was at the coming downe of these forces which Artaxerxes had sent: at what time Agesilavus received a plaine message from Tissaphernes, that either hee must forth-with depart out of Asia, or make good his abode by strong hand. Agesilavus returning word that he was glad to heare that his enemies had by perjurie deferred vengeance from Heauen, prepared to invade them; and sending word to all the Townes which lay betwene him, and Caria, that they should provide victuals, and other necessaries for his Armie, did easily make Tissaphernes beleue, that his intent was to invade that Prouince wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was vnto for Horie, in which part of his forces the Persian had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his horse into the plaine of Maander, hoping thereby to stoppe the passage of a heauie foot-Armie, not suffering them to passe into that Countrey which was fittest for their seruice. But the Greekes left him waiting there in vaine, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they tooke great spoile without resistance, till such time as the Horse-men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish hauing the better of the Greekes, were the occasion that Agesilavus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight only twelue men were lost, yet Agesilavus perceiving by that triall how hard it would be to preuaile, and hold the maiestie of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, rooke all possible care to encrease that part of his forces. By which meanes hauing enabled himselfe, whilst winter lasted, hee entred vpon the Countrey of Tissaphernes, as soone as the season of the year would permit, and not only tooke a great bootie, but finding the Horse-men of Tissaphernes in the plaine of Maander, without assistance of their infanterie, hee gaue them battaile, and had a great victorie, taking their Campe in which hee found great riches. The blame of this losse fell heauie vpon Tissaphernes

Tissaphernes, who either vpon cowardise had absented himselfe from the battaile, or following some other buisnesse, was then at Sardes. For which cause his Master hauing him in distrust, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which hee much desired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greekes, were taken out of the way, he sent into those parts Tithraustes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tissaphernes, and succede him in the gouernement. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heauen, when by perjurie hee could aduance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last through too much overweening of his owne wisdom, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought himselfe most perfect. For supposing, that by his great skill in subtle negotiation hee should one way or other circumuent the Greekes, and make them wearie of Asia; he did not seeke to finish the warre, and, according to his Masters will, bring all things speedily to quiet, but rather to temporise till he might finde some opportunitie of making such end as best might stand with the Kings honour and his owne. Wherein it seemes that he much mistooke his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aduice which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would hee much more gladly haue taken it, if he could haue found such means whereby the danger it selfe might haue bene auoided: as not louing to haue warre whilst by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtaine peace. And this appeared well by the course which Tithraustes tooke at his first possession of the low-Countries. For he sent Embassadors to Agesilavus, in very friendly sort, letting him know, that the man who had bene Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greekes enjoy their owne lawes and libertie, vpon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Armie be forthwith dismissed. The answer to this proposition, was by Agesilavus referred to the Council of Sparta; in the meane season he was content to transcribe the warre into the Prouince of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tithraustes, who bought his departure with thirtie Talents.

This was a strange manner of Warre, both on the offensive and on the defensive part. For Agesilavus hauing entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbear his feuerall Prouinces, at the entreatie of the Lieutenants: and those Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintaine his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed they knew that their heads might easily bee taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any losse that fell on their next Neighbour-Prouinces, which were subiect likewise to the same Crowne of Persia, so long as their owne gouernement could be preserved free from waite and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side I can ascribe to nothing so deuersely, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuchs, Concupines, and Ministers of pleasure, were able by partiall construction to countenance, or disgrace, the actions of such as had the managing of things abroad; and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so vsuall that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Prouinciall Gouernour, according to the benefit or losse, which the Countrey giuen in charge vnto each of them receiued, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as every one was desirous to make his owne Territories yeeld a large increase to the Kings treasure; so no man was careful to assist his borderers, if losse or danger might thereby grow to himselfe and his; but fate still as an idle beholder, when perhaps by joyning their forces it had not bene vncleane to recompence the spoile of one Countrey, by conquering another, or defending a third from farre greater miseries.

§. V.

The Warre and Treatie betwene AGESELAUS and PHARNABAZUS.

AGESELAUS having thus compounded with Tithraustes, entred Phrygia, burning and wasting the Countrey without resistance. Hee tooke the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant draue him out of his Campe. These actions, together with his honourable behaviour, which added much to their lustre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not winne Cities and Places of strength, which might haue encreased his power, and giuen assurance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew vnto him some that were discontented and stood vpon bad termes with the great King, whom hee lost againe as easily, by meanes of some slight iniurie done to them by his vnder-Captaines. Pharnabazus did not enclose himselfe in any Towne for feare of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as neere as he could safely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which hee found not vncauie to doe. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessitie, had bene so great, that when hee (obtaining parley) did set before their eyes his boundtie towards them, and his loue (which had bene such, that besides many other hazards of his person, hee had for the rescue of their fleet, when it was driuen to runne a shore at Abydos, adventured to ride into the Sea as farre as he could finde any ground, and fight on horse-back against the Athenians) together with his faith which had neuer bene violated in word or deede: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwise then by telling him, That hauing warre with his Master, they were enforced, against their will, to offend him. Ageseilus did make a faire offer to him, that if hee would reuolt from the King to them; they would maintaine him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Countrey wherein hee was at that time only Deputie to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make warre against them, he would not faile to doe the best that he could as their enemy; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and hee commanded to obey another, hee would then shift side, and betake himselfe to their alliance. The issue of this parlie was, That the Armie should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor againe returne into it, whilst employment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Ageseilus, and the with-drawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not invaded for want of more necessarie business else here; but because his Countrey would yeeld great bootie; and for the hire of thirtie Talents. By this meanes the Lacedemonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards requited their vnthankfulness with full reuenge.

§. VI.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hired with gold from the Persian.

IN the meane while Tithraustes, perceiuing that Ageseilus meant nothing lesse than to returne into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, tooke a wife course whereby the Citie of Sparta was not only driuen to looke to her owne, and giue ouer her great hopes of subuerting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had bene gotten by many late victories, and saw her Dominion restrained vnto the narrow bounds of her her owne Territorie. He sent into Greece fittie talents of silver, to bee employed in raising warre against the Lacedemonians; which treatise was, by the subtilie practise of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise dispersed, among the principall men of the Thebans, Argines, and Corinthians, that all those Estates hauing formerly borne secret hate to that of Sparta, were now desirous of nothing so much as of open war. And kall this great heate of the incensed multitude should, for want of present exercise, beginne to faine, and vanish away in idle wordes, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedemonians into Armes, that they themselves might seeme Authours of the quarrell. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claime; but the Phocians either hauing the better title, or finding the greater fauour, had it adjudged vnto them, and received yearly money for it. This money the Locrians were either hired or perswaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning so to loose their Rent, made a distresse by strong hand, recouering a great deale more than their owne; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tennants) requited with an inuasion made vpon Phocia, waiting that Countrey in the manner of open warre. Such were the beginnings of professed hostilitie betwene Thebes and Sparta, and the first breaking out of their close enmitie, that had long time, though hardly, been concealed. For when the Phocian Embassadors came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, and requesting succour, they had very fauourable audience, and readie consent to their suite; it being the manner of the Lacedemonians, to deferre the acknowledgment of injuries received, vntill occasion of reuenge were offered, and then to discouer their indignation in cold blood. At this time they had very good opportunitie to worke their owne wills, hauing no other war to disturbe them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia no newes, that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they sent Lysander to raise all the Countreies about Phocia, and with such forces as he could leaue, to attend the coming of Pausanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath bene shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, and being of great reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to reuolt from Thebes. Pausanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians, (who refused to assist him in that enterprize) meaning to ioyne with Lysander, and make a speedie end of the war. The consideration of so great a danger, approaching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to seeke what helpe they could abroad, forasmuch as their owne strength was farre too little to make resistance against such mightie preparations. It was not vnknowne to them, that many followers of the Lacedemonians were otherwise affected in heart than they durst vtter in countenance; but the good willes of such people were little available, considering that the most which could be expected from them was, that they should doe as little hurt as they could by which manner of tergiversation, the Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the safest course to procure the assistance of some Estate that might presently declare it selfe on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, & make their partie strong. To this end they sent Embassadors to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by publike allowance, or done in time of the generall warre, and recompenced with friendship lately shewen in their refusal of assisting Pausanias, when he came in behalfe of the thirtie Tyrants, against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their owne Honours sake, they requested them of aide in the present warre, offering to doe the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former Estate and Dignitie. Thrasybulus and his Friends, who persecuted by the thirtie, had bene well entertained at Thebes, procured now the Citie to make a large requittall of the courttesie which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not only refuse to aide the Lacedemonians in this Warre; but that it should assist the Thebans, and engage it selfe in their cause. Whilst Pausanias lay still, waiting the arrivall of his Confederates; Lysander being desirous to doe somewhat that might advance the buisnesse in hand, came to Haliartus, where, though Pausanias did not meete him, as had beene appointed yet he attempted the Towne, and was slaine in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the rescue. As this vi-ctorie did encourage the Thebans, so the coming of Pausanias with his great Armie did againe amaze them, with presentation of extreme danger; but their spirits were sooner reuiv'd by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late battaile, Pausanias durst not hazard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were slaine, by composition, departed out of their Territorie, for which, either cowardise or indiscretion, he was at his returne to Sparta condemned as a Traitor, and driven to flee into Teges, where hee ended his daies in banishment.

§. VII.

How Agessilaus was called out of Asia to helpe his Countrey. A victorie of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian, assisted by Pharnabazus, over comes the Lacedaemonian fleet; recovers the mastery of the Seas; and rebuilds the walls of Athens.

THis good successe, and the confederacie made with Athens, gave such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Eubaeans, Locrisians, and Acarnians, did iorth with side with them, and raising a strong Armie, determined to give battaile to the Lacedaemonians, as neare as they might, to their owne dores; Considering that the force of Sparta it selfe was not great, but grew more and more by the adunction of their Confe-derates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, sent for Agessilaus, who readily obeyed them, and promising his friends in Asia to returne speedily to their assistance, passed the straights of Hellepont into Europe. In the meane time the Cities of the new league had given battaile to the Lacedaemonians, and the remainder of their Associates, but with ill successe. For when the right-wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argives and Thebans returning from the chace in some disorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedaemonians, who meeting them in good order, wonne from them the Honour which they had gotten by forcing the left wing of the Lacedaemonians, and made the victorie of that day entirely their owne.
The report of this battaile meeting Agessilaus at Amphipolis, were by him sent over into Asia, where it is not likely that they brought much comfort vnto his friend, who had since his departure scene the Spartan fleet beaten, and Lysander the Admi-rall slaine. The same man, whose endeavour had brought the Athenians into order, by advancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedaemonians with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power of Athens grew strong at Sea, when the Citie was depoyled of her old reputation, and scarcely able to maintaine an Armie by Land for her owne defence. Pharnabazus considering how much it imported the King his Master, to have the Greekes diuided into such factions, as might veterly disable them from vndertaking abroade, though it the safest way for himselfe, during these broiles, to take such order, that he should not neede any more, to seeke peace by entreatie and commoration of old benefites, at their hands, who vn-provoked had sold his loue for thirtie Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight ships, who had escaped, when the fleet of Athens was furnished by Lysander at Agos-Potamos; giuing him the command of a great Naue, wherewith he requited the losse received at Agos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedaemonians with the like destruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victorie Conon sailed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberaltie of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victorie, so strong a Naue, and so much gold, as encouraged the Athenians

Athenians to rebuild their walls, and thinke more hopefully vpon recovering the Signorie which they had lost.

§. VIII.

Of sundrie small victories gotten on each part. The Lacedaemonians loose all in Asia; The Athenians recover some part of their old Dominions.

NEuerthelessse the Lacedaemonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for some yeares the honour of their estate, endangered very greatly by this losse at Sea. For Agessilaus obtained the better with his horse-men, from the Thessalians, who were accounted the best riders in Greece: He waited Baotia, and fought a great battaile at Coronea against the Thebans, and their Allies, whom hee ouerthrew; and by his Marshall Gylis forraged the Countrey of Locris: which done, he returned home.

The gaine of these victories was not great, & the reputation of them was, by many losses, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battailes of Coronea vanquish the orebomenians, who stood opposite vnto them, and retired vnbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Agessilaus charged them in their returne from the pursuit. Likewise Gylis was slaine with a great part of his Armie by the Locrians; and some other exploits by the Lacedaemonians performed against the Corinthians, were repaid with equall damage received in the parts adjoining; many Townes being easily taken, and as easily recovered. The varietie of which enter-faits was such, that the Thebans themselves were drawne, by the losse of the Haven of Corinth, to sue for peace, but could not get audience, till such time as the newes came of a great victorie obtained by Iphicrates, General of the Athenian forces at Lechaeum; whereupon the Theban Embassadors being sent for, and willed to doe their message, required only in forme, to haue a safe conduct giuen them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the Warre was made for a while only by incursions, wherein the Athenians, confederates of Sparta, felt most losse, their whole state being endangered by the Acarnians, who held with the contrarie side, vntill Agessilaus repaid these invaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought vpon their owne Lands, which did so afflict the Acarnians that they were driven to sue for peace. But the affaires at Sea were of most consequence, vpon which the successe of all depended. For when the Townes of Asia perceived, that the Lacedaemonians were not only intangled in an hard warre at home, but almost disabled to passe the Seas, hauing lost their fleet at Cnidus; they soone gaue care to Pharnabazus, who promised to allow that they should vie their owne lawes, if they would expell the Spartan Governours. Only the Citie of Abdus did stand firme, wherein Dercyl-lus lay, who did his best to continue all the Townes about Hellepont, in the alliance of the Lacedaemonians; which he could not doe, because the Athenian fleet vnder Thrasylulus tooke in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Ile of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgement of Athens.

§. IX.

The base conditions offered vnto the Persian by the Lacedaemonians. Of sundrie fights and other passages in the warre. The peace of ANTALCIDAS.

ABout this time the Spartans beganne to perceiue, how vnease a thing it would bee, to maintaine the warre against men as good as themselves, assisted with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craued peace of Artaxerxes, most basely offering, not only to renounce the Greekes inhabiting

habiting Asia, and to leaue them to the Kings disposition, but withall to let the Ilanders, and euery Towne in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute libertie, whereby they said that all the principall Estates of their Countrey would be weakened, that no one, nor all of them should be able to stirre against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Countrey being so broken, and rent into many small peeces, could neither haue disquieted the Persian, by an onelike warre, nor haue made any good defence against him, but would haue left it ealie for him in continuance of time, to haue taken the Cities one after another, till hee had made himselfe Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with enuie, that perceiving how the Dominion of the Seas was like to returne to Athens, they chose rather to giue all from themselves and others, and make all a-like weake, than to permit that any of their owne Nation should grow stronger than themselves, who so lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalfe joyined together against the Lacedemonians, did by their seuerall Embassadors oppose themselves vnto it, and for that it was thought fittest for Artaxerxes, rather to weaken the Lacedemonians yet more, than by interpoling himselfe to bring friends and foes on the suddaine to an equalitie. Especially Struthus, whom Artaxerxes did send as his Lieutenant into the low-Countries, did seeke to repay the harme done by Agessilus in those parts: which his intent appearing plaine, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off, Timbro was sent into Asia to make war vpon Scathrus; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the warre, being scattered about, all the Iles and Townes on the firme Land grew almost to the manner of piracie and robbery, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthe of remembrance. Timbro was slaine by Struthus, and in his place Diphridus was sent, who demeaned himselfe more warily. Dercyllides was removed from his charge at Abydos, because hee had not impeached Thrasylulus in his enterprises about Hellepont; Anaximus, who succeeded him, was surprisid and slaine in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasylulus, departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was slaine by the way at Apendus. The Citie of Rhodes had long before joyined with the Lacedemonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Aristocratic, or the Governement of a few the principall Citizens, where as contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Soueraigntie into the handes of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselves, by erecting in the Townes of their Confederates a Governement like vnto their owne: which doing (where more especiall cause did not hinder) caused the Nobilitie to fauour Sparta, and the Commons to incline to Athens. The people of Egina roued vpon the coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Armie in Egina, and besiege their Towne: but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedemonian fleet, the Ilanders beganne a new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships againe, that returned beaten, hauing lost foure of thirteene. The losse of these ships was soone recompensed by a victorie which Chabrias the Athenian Generall had in Egina, where vpon the Ilanders were faine to keepe home, and leaue to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seeme strange that the Citie of Athens, hauing but newly raised her walls; hauing not by any fortunate and important battaile secured her estate from dangers by land; but only depending vpon the assistance of such Confederates, as carried vnto different ends, had often discovered themselves irresolute in the common cause; would send a fleet and an Armie to Cyprus, in defence of Euzgoras, when the maistrie of the Seas was so ill assured, that an Iland lying in the cie of Pisagrus, had abilitie to vex the coast of Attica. But as the ouer-weening of that Citie did cause it usually to embrace more than it could compasse, so the infolencie and shamelesse injustice of the people, had now bred in the chiefe Commanders, a desire to keepe themselves farre out of sight, and to seeke employments at such distance as might secure them from the eies of the enuious, and from publick iudgements, out of which few few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did passe away much part of his time in the Ile of Lesbos; Iphicrates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carrie away into Cyprus a greater force than his Countrey well could haue spared, with which hee returned not when the businesse in Cyprus came to an end, but fought new adventures in Egypt, whereby arose neither thanks to himselfe, nor profit to his Citie, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus carelesse of things at hand, had a notable blow giuen vnto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, euen within their owne Haven. For Teleclitus, a Lacedemonian, being made Gouvernour of Egina, conceived a strong hope of surpriuing the Naue of Athens, as it lay in Pisus; thinking a right that it was a harder matter to encounter with ten ships prepared for the fight, than with twentie lying in harbour, whose Mariners were a sleepe in their Cabbins, and other Vessells in Tauerns. Wherefore hee sailed by night vnto the mouth of the Port, which entering at the breake of day, he found (according to his expectation) molt of the men on shore, & few or none left aboard to make resistance: by which meanes hee tooke many ships laden with marchandizes, many fisher-men, passengers, and other Vessells, also three or foure Gallies, hauing sunke or broken, and made vnersieuable, as many of the rest as the time would suffer. About this time Phanibazus, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters giuen to him in marriage, with whom hee liued about the Court; and many Officers that fauoured the Lacedemonians were placed in the lower Asia; by whose assistance, the fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hellepont, in such wise, that perhaps they should not haue needed the peace, which they themselves procured by Antalcidas, from the great King, the conditions whereof were such as are mentioned before, giuing freedom to all the Cities of Greece, and diuiding the Countrey into as many seuerall States as there were petty Boroughs in it. Thus Artaxerxes hauing bought his owne peace with money, did likewise by his money become arbitrator and decider of Controuersies between the Greekes, disposing of their businesse in such wise as stood best with his owne good. The tenor of Artaxerxes his decree was, That all Asia and Cyprus should be his owne, the Iles of Lesbos, Imbros, and Scios be subiect to Athens; all other Greece Townes, as well the little as the great, bee sit at libertie; and that whoeuer should refuse this peace, vpon them the approuers of it should make warre, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea; the Lacedemonians by rebott of their Confederates, and the necessity of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miseries of the warre, whereof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent vnto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedemonians taking vpon themselves the execution, did not only compell the Aegians to depart out of Corinth (which vnder pretence of defending they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords); and the Thebans to leaue Boeotia free, of which Prouince Thebes had alwaies held the government: the Thebans themselves being also comprehended vnder the name of Boeotians; but caused the Mantineans to throw downe their owne Citie, and to dwell in Villages: alleging that they had formerly beene accustomed so to doe, though purposing indeede to chastise them, as hauing bene ill affected to Sparta in the late war. By these courses the Lacedemonians did hope that all the small Townes in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their warres, as Authors of their libertie; and that the great Cities hauing lost all their dependants, would be vnable to make opposition.

§. X.

The warre which the Lacedæmonians made vpon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treason; and Olynthus by famine.

Hilest these warres, which ended without either victorie or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citie of Olynthus in Thracæ was growne to mightie, that shee did not only command her Neighbour-Townes, but was become terrible to places farre removed, and to Sparta it selfe. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pelis, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians, who following the vsual preence of the Lacedæmonians, to set at libertie the places over which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almost now driuen him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia, being nearest vnto the danger of these incroching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedæmonians with their feare, affirming that this Common of the Olynthians would bee too strong for all Greece, if some continuance of time should giue it reputation, which only it wanted, wherefore they requested assistance, but in such termes as did sound of compulsion; professing that either they must warre vpon Olynthus, or become subject vnto her, and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a halitie leaue of men, two thousand being presently sent away with promise to be seconded by a greater Armie. Whilest these two thousand gaue such beginning to the warre, as agreed with their small number, the bodie of the Armie following them surprised the Cittadell of Thebes, which was betraied into the handes of Phæbidas the Lacedæmonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the slaucerie of their Countrey. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the peace lately made betwene them; which caused the Lacedæmonians to doubt whether this act of Phæbidas were more worthie of reward or of punishment; In conclusion, profit so farre ouer-weighed honestie, that the deede was approved, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, manie driuen into banishment, and the Traitors rewarded with the gouernment of the Citie: by whose authoritie, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to serue the Lacedæmonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This access of power hauing strengthened the Lacedæmonians, caused them to entertaine the greater forces about Olynthus, which (notwithstanding the losse of one great battaile, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it selfe to their obedience.

§. X I.

How the Thebans recovered their libertie, driving out the Lacedæmonian Garrison.

After this Olynthian Warre, which endured almost three yeares, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found meanes to shake off their yoke, and gaue both example and meanes to others to doe the like. One of the banished men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates comming to Athens, that the tyrannie wherewith his Countrey was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those who for feare of it were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was laied betwene these two, that soone found very good successe, being managed thus. Seven of the banished men forooke Athens priuily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next day secretly, they came late in the euening to the Gates like husband-men returned turned from worke, and so passed vndiscovered vnto the house of Charon, whom Phylidas the Scribe had drawne into the conspiracie. The day following, a sollemne kait being then held in the Citie, Phylidas promised the Gouernours, who were insolent and lustfull men, that hee would conueigh vnto them that night the most beautifull Dames of the Towne, with whom they should take their pleasure. Hauing cheared them with such hope, and plentie of good wine, hee told them when the time of performance (which they vrged) came, that hee could not make good his promise, vnlesse they would dismisse their followers; because the Gentlewomen, who attended without in a chamber, would not endure, that any of the seruants should see their faces. Vpon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maides, brought into the place; who taking aduantage of the Gouernours loose behaviour, flew them all vpon the sodaine with Daggers, which they brought hidden vnder their garments. Then presently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where fining themselves to come to the Gouernours vpon business, they got admittance, and slew those which were of the Lacedæmonian faction. By the like device they brake into the prison; slew the Gaolers; and set at libertie such as they thought meete, and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants knowne. The Captaine of the Castle hearing the proclamation, thought the Rebels to bee stronger than indeede they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a practise to discouer such, as would be forward vpon occasion of reuolting. But as soone as day-light revealed the plaine truth, all the people tooke armes and besieged the Castle, sending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aide vnto the Townes adioyning, whence a few broken troupes comming to the rescue, were defeated on the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not only make speede to assist their Countreymen, but procured some Athenians to ioyne with them, and thereby came so strong into the Citie, that the Castle was yeilded, more through feare than any necessitie, vpon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes; for which composition the Captaine at his returne to Sparta was put to death. When the newes of the doings at Thebes, and the successe arrived at Sparta, an Armie was raised forth-with, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recouering of that Citie, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had bene taken from the Lacedæmonians, and not a Towne perfidiously vsurped by them, restored to her owne libertie. Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was sent on this expedition, who haping wearied his followers, with a toilsome Winters journey, returned home without any good or harme done; leaving Sphodrias, with part of his Armie, at Thebes, to infect the Thebans; who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt vpon the Hauens of Athens, which failing to take, hee waisted the Countrey adioyning, and draue away Cattel, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the Warre, out of which they were before very carefully seeking how to with-draw themselves.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flourishing estate of Thebes, from the battaile of Leuctra to the battaile of Mantinea.

§. I.
How Thebes and Athens toyed together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battaile of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatness.

THE Lacedæmonians were men of great resolution, and of much grauitie in all their proceedings, but one dishonorable rule they held, That all respects withstanding the commoditie of Sparta were to be neglected; the practise of which doctrine, euen by the best and wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate, but when it was put in execution by insufficient overweening men, it seldome failed to bring vpon them in stead of profit vnjustly expected, both shame and losse.
And so it befell them in these enterprises of Phibalas, vpon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrias vpon the Piræus.
For howsoeuer Agellaus did spoile the Countrie about Thebes, in which hee spent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good successe of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise beganne to looke abroade, failing to the Ile of Ceræra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and hauing in some fights at Sea preuailed, began as in the Peloponnesian warre, to surround Peloponnesus with a Naue; afflicting so the Lacedæmonians, that had not the Thebans by their insolencie wearied their friends, and caused them to seeke for peace, it had bene very likely that the end of this warre, should haue soone come to a good end, which neuertheless, being persecuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) lett the Citee of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous.
But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroched every day vpon her weake Neighbours, not sparing such as had bene dependants vpon Athens, and finding themselves, whilst engaged in such a warre, vnable to relieue their complaining friends, resolued to settle the affaires of Greece, by renewing that forme of peace which Anticidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, perceptibly signifying, That it was their intent to finish the Warre; to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadors along with them to Sparta; who readily condescended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treatie of peace, which came to passe, being so wrought by the courageous wis-dome of Epaminondas, who vnderstood farre better than his Countreymen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedæmonians and Athenians did soone agree; but when the Thebans offered to sweare to the Articles in the name of the Boeotians, Agellaus required them to sweare in their owne name, and to leaue the Boeotians free, whom they had lately reduced vnder their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made answer, That the Citee of Sparta should giue example to Thebes by setting the Lacæmonians free; for that the Signorie of Boeotia did by as good right ap-pertaine to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly spoken; but was heard with no patience: For Agellaus bearing a vehement hatred vnto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawne back out of Achaia into Greece, and disappointed of all the glorie which he had hoped to archiue by the Persian Warre, did
now

now very passionately vrge that point of setting the Boeotians at libertie, and finding that obstinately refused, he dashed the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the same time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocis, who receiued command from the Gouernours of Sparta forthwith to enter vpon the Land of the Thebans with all his power, which he did, and was there slaine at Leuctra, and with him the flower of his Armie. This battaile of Leuctra being one of the most famous that euer were fought betwene the Greekes, was not so notable for any circumstance forgoing it, or for the managing of the fight it selfe, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta, but especially for that after this battaile (betwene which and the conclusion of the generall peacethere passed but twentie daies) the Lacedæmonians were neuer able to recouer the strength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted farre and neare; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest ambition had in former times confined it selfe vnto the litle Region of Boeotia, did now beginne to vndertake the leading and command of many People and Estates, in such wise that soone after they brought an Armie of threecore and ten thousand strong vnto the Gates of Sparta. So much doe the afflictions of an hard warre, valiantly indured, aduance the affaires of the distressed, and guide them into the way of Conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and ease had through luxurie, rechelessnesse, and many other vices or vanities, made ruttie and effeminate.

§. II.
How the Athenians tooke vpon them to maintain the peace of Greece. New troubles hence arising. EPAMINONDAS invaded and wresteth the Territories of Lacedæmon.

THE Athenians, refusing to take advantage of this ouerthrow fallen vpon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedæmonians, did neuertheless finely giue them to vnderstand, that their Dominion was expired and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking vpon themselves the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, which Agellaus (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrels that might arise) had lett imperfect, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens; where the generall libertie of all Townes, as well small as great, was ratified, vnder the stile Of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hereupon beganne fresh garboiles.
The Mantineans, claiming power by this decree to order their affaires at their owne pleasure, did (as it were) in despite of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raise their towne, reedifie it, and allie themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondence with the Lacedæmonians, some to weaken and keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedæmonians durst not giue impeachment to the Mantineans; nor take vpon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the factions brake out into violence, and each part called in foraine helpe. Then was an Armie sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegæ, against the Mantineans, but indeed against them both. Agellaus had the leading off, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the Phocians, & were become head of the Locrans, Arzians, Eubæans, and many others; with the power of which Countries they entered Peloponnesus in fauor of the Arcadians, who had vpon expectation of their coming, abstained from giuing battaile to Agellaus. The Armie of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas joyned with the Arcadians, the Region of Laconia was invaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could haue found beliefe if any had foretold it. Almost fixe hundred yeares were spent, since the Dorians, vnder the posteritie of Heracles, had seized vpon Laconia, in all which time the found of an Nnnn enemies

enemies trumpet was not heard in that Countrey: Ten yeares were not fully past since all Greece was at the dictation of the Spartans: but now the Region which neither Xerxes with his huge Armie could once looke vpon, nor the mightie forces of Athens, and other Enemie States had dared to set foot on, sauing by stealth, was all on a light fire, the very smoke whereof the women of Sparta were alhamed to behold. All which indignitie notwithstanding, the Lacedaemonians did not illue out of Sparta to fight, but sought how to preferre the Towne, setting at libertie as many of their Helotes or Slaves, as were willing to beare Armes in defence of the State, and somewhat pittifully entreated the Athenians to giue them succour. From Corinth and some Townes of Peloponnesus they receiued speedie assistance, the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaminandus returned without battaile, hauing rebuilded the Citie of Mefene, and peopled it a new by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacedaemonians many Ages before had chased away into other Countries, possessing their Territories themselves.

§. 111.

The composition betweene Athens and Sparta for command in warre against the Thebans; who againe inuade and spoile Peloponnesus. The vsurpatione presumption of the Arcadians.

THis iourne therefore vtterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, which was to be raised, nor any manner of precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, vnto Athens, they offered to yeld the Admiraltie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might bee Generals by Land. This had become a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of those two Cities; but it was rejected, because the Mariners and others that were to be employed at Sea, were men of no marke or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot whereof the Land-Armie was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to haue cruied vnder the Lacedaemonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the authoritie should be diuided by time, the Athenians ruling five daies, the Lacedaemonians other five, & so successiue,ly that each of them should haue command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vaine ambition was more regarded than the common profit, which must of necessitie be very slowly aduanced, where consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second inuasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so vnable to impeach them, that hauing fortified Hilum from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driven out of their strength by Epaminandus, who foraged the Countrey without resistance. But as the Articles of this league betweene Athens and Sparta did by diuiding the conduct in such manner, disable the societie, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanitie. For the Arcadians considering their owne numbers which they brought into the field, and hauing found by many trials that their people were not inferior to others in strength of bodie, in courage, or in good Souldieriship, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the gouernment, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by encasing whose greatness they should strengthen their owne yoke. Here vpon they began to demean themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hateful to their Neighbours, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of generall peace hauing been made (which tooke not effect, because the Citie of Mefene was not abandoned to the Lacedaemonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans and their friends was vpon these Arcadians, who relying too much vpon their owne worth, were ouerthrowne in a great battaile, their calamitie being as pleasing to their Confederates as to their Enemies.

§. 1111.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greekes to the Persian; with the reasons why he most fauoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse issue of the Embassages.

THe Thebans especially rejoyced at the Arcadians misfortune, considering, that, without their aide, the successe of all enterprises proved so ill; whereas they themselves had by their owne power accomplished very well whatsoeuer they tooke in hand, and were become not only victorious ouer the Lacedaemonians, but Patrons ouer the Thebians, and moderators of the great quarrells that had risen in Macedonia, where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleased them best, they carried Philip the Sonne of Amyntus, and Father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage vnto Thebes. Hauing therefore obtained such reputation that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought means of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassadors the great and famous Captaine Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant vnto the Thebans all that they desired; whereof two especiall points were, That Alexander should remaine free from the Lacedaemonians, and that the Athenians should forbear to send their ships of Warre to Sea; only the later of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further aduice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadors at the same time, of whom few or none receiued much contentment. For the King hauing found by long experience, how rare it concerned him to maintaine a sure partie in Greece, did vpon many waightie considerations resolve, to binde the Thebans firmly vnto him; justly expecting, that their greatnesse should bee on that side his owne securitie. The Athenians had bene ancient enemies to his Crowne, and, hauing turned the profit of their victories vpon the Persian to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their signorie in such perniciouse manner, that (seuerall grievous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a ten yeare warre, wherein the Lacedaemonians being followed by most of the Greeks, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aide by Darius the Old, were not able to vanquish them, till their owne indifferenoe brought them on their knees. The Lacedaemonians being victorious ouer Athens, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertooke the conquest of Asia, from which though, by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian gold, they were called backe, yet hauing renewed their power, and settled things in Greece, it was not unlikely, that they should vpon the next aduantage haue pursued the same enterprise, had not they bene emperched by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwise had alwaies discouraged a good alliance to the Crowne of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his inuasion of Greece, with Darius and the Lacedaemonians against Athens; And finally hauing offered much contumely to Alexander when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good deseruings, they were no Sea men, and therefore unlikely to looke abroad; whereunto if perchance they should haue any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good hauen townes, which they could not seize vpon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giuing libertie to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend vnto the requests of Pelopidas, as farre forth as hee might without giuing open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that meane he purchased his owne quiet, being neuer afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill meanes which the Greeks had to disturb Artaxerxes was very beneficiall to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Prouinces. For had then the affaires of Greece beene so composed, that any one Citie might without emperchment of the rest have transported an Armie, to assit the reuolting Satrapes, or Viceroyes of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Paphlagonia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phoenicia; humane reason can hardly finde the meane, by which the Empire could haue been preferred from that ruine, which the diuine Councell had deterred vnto the daies of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthie Prouinces, wanting a firme bodie of good and hardie Souldiers, was in short space dissolued and vanithed like a mist, without effect: these elemmated Alatages wearied quickly with the trauailes and dangers incident to warre, forsaking the common cause, and each man strining to bee the first that by treason to his companie should both redeem the former treason to his Prince, & purchase with all his owne promotion with encrease of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I haue rather chosē to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; both for that it was like a suddaine storme, rashly commenced, idly followed, and foolishly laied downe, hauing made a great noise without effect, and hauing small reference to any other action regardabie; as also because in the whole raigē of Alexander, from the warre of Cyros, to the inuasion of Aegypt, I finde nothing (this insurrection and a fruitlesse journey against the Cassians excepted) worthy of any mention, much lesse of digestion from the course of the buisines in Greece. All, or the most of his time, passed away so quietly, that he enjoyed the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could afford vnto so absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were only or chiefly Domestical; growing out of the hatred which Laryssa the Queen-Mother bare vnto his wife Statira, and to such as had been the greatest enemies to her sonne Cyros, or gloried in his death: vpon whom, when by poison and mischieuous practises shee had satisfied her feminine appetite of reuenge, thenceforth the wholly applied her selfe to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the leud desire of marrying his owne Daughter, and filling him with the persuasion, which Princes, not ended with an especiall grace doe readily caterraine. That his owne will was the supreme law of his subject, and the rule by which all things were to be measured, and adjudged to be good or euill. In this imaginarie happinesse Pelopidas, and the other Embassadors of Greece, both found and left him, but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the conclusion of his Treatie with them, being altogether to his owne aduantage, did seeme to promise, if not the perpetuall, a long endurance of the same felicity to him and his, or (at the least) a full securitie of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternitie laied by mortall men in this transitorie world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heauen, or made vaine and vnprofitable, ere the frame can be raised to full height, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other states of Greece that had sent Embassadors to the Persian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Townes, as well the little as the great, should bee set at libertie, and the Thebans made protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Iudges of all controveries that might arise, and Leaders in warre of all that would enter into this Confederacie; the Kings letters being solemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadors, drawne thither from all parts of Greece; when an oath was required for obseruation of the forme of peace therein set downe, a dilatorie answer was made by the Embassadors, who said that they were sent to heare the articles; not to swear vnto them. Hereby the Thebans were driuen to send vnto each of the Cities to require the Oath; But in vaine. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, That they did not neede it; others tooke courage by their example to doe the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Alexander gaue neither addition nor confirmation of greatnesse, but left them as it found them to relie vpon their owne swords.

§. V.

§. V.

Now all Greece was diuided, betweene the Athenians and Lacedaemonians, on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumult arising in Acadia.

The condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each vpon enuie of the others greatnesse drawne all her followers into a cruell intestine warre, by which the whole Countrey, and especially the Estate of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conioyne their forces against the Thebans, who sought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achaians, followed the partie of the seancient governing Cities; either for the old reputation of them, and benefits receiued, or in dislike of those who by strong hand were readie to become Rulers, to which authoritie they could not sodainly aspire without some iniurie and much enuie. The Citie of Thebes abounding with men whom necessitie had made warlike, and many victories in few yeares had filled with great spirits, & being lo mighty in dependants, that mee had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peloponnesus (the Region of Arcia, and very little part beside excepted) vnder such acknowledgements, as wanted not much of meeere Vassallage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein already shee had set good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Acadia. The Argues had beene alwaies bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselves in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were farre vnder them in valour, hauing beene often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of loosing all: which caused them to suspect and enuie nothing more than the greatnesse and honor of Sparta, taking truce with her when shee was arest and had leisure to bend her whole force against them, but firmly joyning with her enemies whenloeuer they found her entangled in a difficult Warre. As the Argues were, in hatred of Sparta, sure friends of Thebes, so the Acadians, transported with a great opinion of their owne worthinesse, had formerly renounced and prouoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedaemonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought conuenient by Epinomondas, and the State of Thebes, to send an Armie into Peloponnesus, before such time as these wavering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared, open enemies. And surely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens; which was very strange, and seemed no lesse to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firme league with Sparta at the same time when the Acadians treated with them, did neuertheless accept this new Confederacie, not relinquishing the old, because they found that, howloeuer these Acadians were enemies to the Lacedaemonians, they should hereby be drawne somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was vnlike to inuade Peloponnesus with a strong Armie. But this did rather hasten, than by any meanes stay, the coming of Epinomondas; who finding the way somewhat more cleare for him (because the Citie of Corinth, which lay vpon the Isthmus, and had beene aduerse to Thebes, was now, by miseries of this grievous warre, driuen to become Neutrall) tooke occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Acadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Armie, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had risen in Acadia about consecrated money, which many principall men among them had laied hands on, vnder pretence of employing it to publike vses. In compounding the differences growne vpon this occasion, such, as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captaine of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Countymen, as people desirous of inuolution. This was done: but the vp-roare thereby thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Aradians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much a doe scarce pacified. When complaint of the Captaines proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame vpon them who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them, to judge of their fidelitie, by the assistance which they should giue him, in that warre, which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly wordes did greatly amaze the Aradians, who needing not the aide of so mightie a power as he drew a-long with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to bee made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before fought meane to settle the affaires of their Countrey, by drawing thinges to some good conclusion of peace, did now forth-with send to Athens for helpe, and withall dispatched some of the principall among them as Embassadors to Sparta, by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now readie to be invaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedaemonians, who feared nothing more than the coming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew that all their forces, and best prouisions, would bee no more than very hardly sufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about prerogatives, they (who had bene accustomed into such a supremacie, as they would in no wise communicate with the powerful Citie of Athens, till other hope of securing their owne Estate could not be thought vpon) did now verie gently yeeld to the Aradians, that the command of the Armie in chiefe, should be giuen, for the time, to that Citie, in whose Territorie it lay.

§. VI.

A terrible inuasion of Peloponnesus by EPAMINONDAS.

Ertaine it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a verie firme consent, and vniforme care of the common saluicie. For beside the great forces raised out of the other parts of Greece, the Argines, and Alcians, prepared with all their strength to ioine with Epaminondas; who hauing lien a while at Nemea, to intercept the Athenians, receiued there intelligence, that the Armie coming from Athens would passe by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Trigee, which Citie, and the most of all Aradians besides, forth-with declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attempt of the Thebans, would be vpon such of the Aradians as had revolted; which caused the Lacedaemonian Captaines to fortifie Manitinea with all diligence, and to send for Agellus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men, which remained in the Towne, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held so good espiall vpon his Enemies, that had not an vnknowne fellow brought hastie aduertisement of his purpose to Agellus, who was then well onward in the way to Manitinea, the Citie of Sparta had sodainly bene taken. For thither with all speede and secrecie did the Thebans march, who had iurely carried the Citie, notwithstanding anie defence that could haue bene made by that handfull of men remaining within it; but that Agellus in all flying hast got into it with his Companies, whom the Armie of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast as it was able. The arrivall of the Lacedaemonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, so it presented him with a faire aduantage vpon Manitinea. It was the time of Haruest, which made it very likely that the Manitineans, finding the warre to be carried from their walls into an other quarter, would vse the commoditie of that vacation, by fetching in their corne, and turning out their cattail into their fields, whilst no enemy was neare that might empetch them. Wherefore hee turned away from Sparta to Manitinea, sending his horse-men before him, to seize vpon all that might be found without the Citie. The Manitineans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were scattered abroad in the Countrey; farre more intent vpon their hairell-buinesse, than vpon the warre, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselves out of distance. By which presumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattail, being vnable to recouer the Towne, were in a desperate case; and the Towne it selfe in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemy should haue taken all their prouision of victuals with so many of the people, as had not ouer-dearely bene redeemed, by that Citie returning to societie with Thebes. But at the same time, the Athenians coming to the succour of their Confederates, whom they thought to haue found at Manitinea, were very earnestly entreated by the Citizens to rescue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were possible by any courageous aduerture to deliuer those who otherwise were giuen as lost. The Thebans were knowne at that time to bee the best Souldiers of all the Greekes, and the commendation of good horsemanship had alwaies bene giuen to the Thebians, as excelling in that qualitie all other Nations; yet the regard of honour wrought vpon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, which had entred into this warre, vpon no necessity of her owne, but only in desire of relieuing her distressed friends, they issued forth of Manitinea, not abiding so long as to refresh themselves, or their horses with meat, and giuing a lustre charge vpon the enemy, who as brauely receiued them, after a long and hot fight they remained masters of the field, giuing by this victorie a safe and calie retreat to all that were without the walls. The whole power of the Boeotians arrived in the place soone after this battaile, whom the Lacedaemonians and their Alliants were neere sure to hindre.

§. VII.

EPAMINONDAS, considering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprising Sparta and Manitinea hauing failed, the impression of terror which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians, would soone vanish, vnlesse by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth, and leaue some memorable character of his expedition, resolved to giue them battaile, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtfull affections of his owne Associates, and to leaue the Spartans as weak in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subjection. Hauing therefore warned his men to prepare for that battaile, wherein victorie should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacritie of his Souldiers to be such, as promised the accomplishment of his owne desire, he made leue of declining the enemy, and intrenching himselfe in a place of more aduantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heate of their valour, and afterward strike their senses with amazement, when hee should come vpon them vnexpected. This opinion deceiued him not. For with verie much tumult, as in so great and sodaine a danger, the enemy ranne to Armes, necessity enforcing their resolution, and the consequence of that daies seruice vrging them to doe as well as they might. The Theban Armie consisted of thirte thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Lacedaemonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by a third part. The Manitineans (because the warre was in their Countrey) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedaemonians; the Athenians had the left wing, the Achaens, Eleans, and others of lesse account, filled the bodie of the Armie. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their owne battaile, opposite to the Lacedaemonians,

Lacedaemonians, having by them the Arcadians; the Eubaeans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Megarians, and Thebaisians with others, compounding the maine battaile; the Argives held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flankes, only a troupe of the Eleans were in reare. Before the footmen could joyne, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans prevailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians: who not yielding to the enemy either in courage or skill, were over-laid with numbers, and so beaten upon by the Thebaisians slings, that they were driven to forsake the place, and leave their infanterie naked. But this retreat was the lesse disgracefull, because they kept themselves together, and did not fall backe upon their owne foot-men; but finding the Theban horse to have given them over, and withall discouraging some Companies of foot, which had bene sent about by Epinondas, to charge their battaile in the reare, they brake upon them, routed them, and hewed them all in peeces. In the meane season the battaile of the Athenians had not only to doe with the Argives, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horse-men, in such wise that it beganne to open, and was ready to turne back, when the Elean Squadron of Horse came vp to the reliefe of it, and restored all on that part. With farre greater violence did the Lacedaemonians and Thebans meete, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour, so that equall courage and equall losse on both sides made the hope and appearance of victorie to either equally doubtfull: unless perhaps the Lacedaemonians being very firme abiders, might seeme the more likely to prevaile, as having borne the first brunt, and fume of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by Discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practise of a few yeares, cannot bee thought to have gotten a habite so sure and generall. But Epinondas perceiving the oblitrate stiffness of the Enemies to bee such, as neither the badde successe of their owne horse, nor all the force of the Boeotian Armie, could abate so farre, as to make them give one foot of ground; taking a choise Companie of the most able men, whom he cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the advantage of that figure against a Squadron, and by his owne exceeding vertue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their rankes, and cleave the whole battaile in despite of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day wonne by the Thebans, who may justly bee said to have carried the victorie, seeing that they remained Masters of the ground whereon the battaile was fought, having driven the Enemy to lodge farther off. For that which was alleged by the Athenians, as a token that the victorie was partly theirs, the slaughter of those Mercenaries upon whom they lighted by chance in their owne flight, finding them behinde their Armie, and the retaying of their dead bodies; it was a Ceremonie regardable only among the Greekes, and served merely for ostentation, shewing that by the fight they had obtained somewhat, which the Enemy could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arrived at the generall immediate end of battaile, none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is exprest from them, who forsake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for triall of their abilitie and prowess. This was the last worke of the incomparable vertue of Epinondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedaemonian Squadron, and forced it to give back in disaray, was furiously charged on the sodaine, by a desperate Companie of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiving many wounds, hee neuertheless with a singular courage maintayned the fight, vying against the Enemies many of their Darts, which hee drew out of his owne bodie; till at length by a Spartan, called Antistater, hee received so violent a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the yron and a peece of the troncheon in his brest. Hereupon hee sunke downe, and was soone conveyed out of the fight by his friends; having by his fall fall somewhat animated the Spartans (who faine would have got his bodie) but much more inflamed with reuengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heauie mischance did with great slaughter compell their disordered enemies to leave the field; though long they followed not the chafe, being wearied more with the sadnesse of this disaster, than with all the traualle of the day. Epinondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Philitians, That when the head of the Dart should bee drawne out of his bodie, hee must needs die. Hearing this, hee called for his shield, which to haue lost was held a great dishonour: It was brought vnto him. Hee bad them tell him which part had the victorie; and answer was made, that the Spartans had wonne the field. Then said hee, it is faire time for mee to die, and withall sent for Solidas, and Diaphantes, two principall men of Warre, that were both slaine; which being told him, hee aduised the Thebans to make Peace, whilist with aduantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a Generall. Herewithall hee willed that the head of the weapon should be drawne out of his bodie; comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of issue, by telling them that the victories of Leuctra and Mantineas were two faire Daughters, in whom his memorie should liue.

So died Epinondas, the worthiest man that euer was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to bee matched in any Age or Countrey: for hee equaled all others in the severall vertues, which in each of them were singular. His Iustice, and Sinceritie, his Temperance, Wisdome, and high Magnanimitie, were no way inferior to his Militarie vertue; in every part whereof hee so excelled, That hee could not properly bee called a Warre, a Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an Industrious, and a Proudient Captaine; all these Titles, and many other, being due vnto him, which with his notable Discipline, and good Conduct, made a perfect composition of an Heroique Generall. Neither was his private Conversation vnswearable to those high parts, which gaue him praise abroad. For hee was Graue, and yet very Affable and Curious; resolute in publique businesse, but in his owne particular case, and of much mildnesse; a lover of his People, bearing with mens infirmities, wittie and pleasant in speech, farre from insolence, Master of his owne affections, and furnished with all qualities that might winne and keepe loue. To these Graces were added great abilitie of bodie, much Eloquence, and very deepe knowledge in all parts of Philosophie and Learning, wherewith his minde being enlightened, rested not in the sweetnesse of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects as gaue vnto Thebes, which had euer more bene an vnderling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adjoining, and the highest command in Greece.

¶ VIII.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battaile of Mantineas. The voice of Agesilaus into Egypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made betwene him and Pompey the Roman.

His battaile of Mantineas was the greatest that had euer bene fought in that Countrey betwene the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Plataea, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gaue rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Graecian valour; neither were the practise of Armes and Art Militarie so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian Warre, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted excepted which were vnder taken against forraigne enemies, prouing for the most part vnfortunate. But in this last night all Greece was interceded, which neuer had more able Souldiers, and braue Commanders, nor euer contended for victorie with greater care of the successe, or more obstinate resolution. All which notwithstanding, the issue being such as hath bene related, it was found better for every particular Estate, that a generall peace should be established, every one retaining what hee presently had, and none being forced to depend vpon another. The Messians were by name comprised in this new league; which caused the Lacedaemonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindered not the rest from proceeding to concunion; considering that Sparta was now too weak to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to shew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it selfe in execution. This peace, as it gaue some breath and respite to all the Countrey, so to the Cities of Athen and Sparta it afforded leisure to seeke after wealth by forraigne employment in Egypt, whither Agesslaus was sent with some small forces to assist, or indeede, as a Mercenarie, to serue vnder Tachos King of Egypt in his warre vpon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded vnder Sicarus King of Egypt, went now as a voluntarie, with such forces as he could raise, by entreatie, and offer of good pay, to the same seruice. These Egyptian Kings descended from Amphyreus of Sais, who rebelled against Darius the 1st, hauing retained the Countrey notwithstanding all intestine dissensions, and forraigne inuasion, during three Generations of their owne race, were so well acquainted with the valour of the Greekes, that by their helpe (easily procured with gold) they conceived great hope, not only to assure themselves, but to become Lords of the Prouinces adjoining, which were held by the Persians. What the issue of this great enterprise might haue been, had it not fallen by Domestically rebellion, it is vncertaine. But very likely it is that the rebellion it selfe had soone come to nothing, if Agesslaus had not proued a false Traitor, joyning with Nectanebus who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebelle with that Arme which the money of Tachos had waged. This faithhood Agesslaus excused, as tending to the good of his owne Countrey; though it seeme rather, that hee grudged because the King tooke vpon himselfe the Conduet of the Arme, vsing his seruice only as Lieutenant, who had made full accompt of being appointed the Generall. Howsoeuer it came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betraied by them, in whom he had reposed his chiefe confidence, fled vnto the Persian, who vpon his submission gaue him gentle entertainment; and Nectanebus (who seemes to haue bene the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set vpon another King, to whom all, or most of the Egyptians yielded their obedience. But Agesslaus fighting with him in places of aduantage, preuailed so farre, that hee left Nectanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdome; who in recompence of his treason to the former King Tachos, and good seruice done to himselfe, rewarded him with two hundred and thirtie Talents of silver, with which bootie failing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant and a good Leader in warre, free from couetousnesse, and not reproched with any blemish of lust; which praises are the lesse admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparta was such as did endure euerie one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent frame of an ill nature) with all, or the chiefe, of these good qualities. Hee was neuertheless very arrogant, peruerse, vnjust, and vaine glorious, measuring all things by his owne will, and obstinately prosecuting those courses whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of Xenophon had filled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be ouerthrowne; with which conceipt being transported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans, and their Allies, hee did euer after beare such hatred vnto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meere necessity to grow warlike, and able, to the vtter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable losse of all her former greatnesse. The commendations giuen to him by Xenophon

Xenophon his good friend, haue caused Plutarch to lay his name in the ballance against Pompey the Great; whose actions (the isleme grauitie of carriage excepted) are very disproportionable. Yet we may truly say, That as Pompey made great warres vnder sundrie Climates; and in all the Prouinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of imployments all that were before him; so Agesslaus had at one time, or other some quarrell with euerie Towne in Greece, had made a Warre in Asia, and meddled in the businesse of the Egyptians, in which varietie he went beyond all his Predecessours; yet not winning any Countreys, as Pompey did manie, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey neuer tooke. Herein also they are very like; Each of them was the last great Captaine which his Nation brought forth in time of libertie, and each of them ruined the libertie of his Countrey by his owne Lordly wilfulness. We may therefore well say, Similitudo est omnia quam pars; There resemblance was nearer than the equalitie. Indee the freedome of Rome was loit with Pompey, falling into the handes of Cesar, whom he had enforced to take Armes; yet the Roman Empire stood, the forme of Gouernement only being changed, But the libertie of Greece, or of Sparta it selfe, was not forsaken vnto the Thebans, whom Agesslaus had compelled to enter into a victorious warre; yet the Signiorie, and ancient renowne of Sparta was presently lost: and the freedome of all Greece being wounded in this Theban warre, and after much blood lost ill healed by the peace ensuing, did very soone vpon the death of Agesslaus giue vp the Ghost, and the Lordship of the whole Countrey was seized by Philip King of Macedon, whose actions are now on foote, and more to bee regarded than the Contemporarie passages of things, in any other Nation.

10 THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:
INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the raigne of PHILIP of MACEDON, to the establisshing of that Kingdome, in the race of ANTIGONVS.

CHAP. I.

Of PHILIP, the Father of ALEXANDER the Great, King of Macedon.

§. I.

What Kings raigned in Macedon before PHILIP.

40 HE Greeks, of whom wee haue alreadye made large discourse, not as yet wearied with in-tinue Warre, nor made wise by their vaine contention for superiortie, doe still, as in former times, continue the inuasion and vassation of each other.

Against Xerxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the World, they defended their liber-tie, with as happie successe, as euer Nation had,
and with no lesse honour, than hath euer beene acquired by deeds of Armes. And hauing had a triall and experience, more than fortunate, against those Nations, they so little regarded what might come from them; who had 50 so often forfeited the reputation of their forces, as whatsoeuer could be spared from their owne distraction at home, they transported ouer the Hellaspont, as sufficient, to entertaine and buile them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with euery man of marke in the world, that they vnderfall, and perish, by the hands and harmes, which they least feare, so fared it at this that with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speake) they had so little regard, as they grew even then more violent in devouring each other, when the fast growing greatneesse of such a Neighbour-King, should, in regard of their owne safeties, haue serued them for a strong argument of vnion and accord. But the glorie of their Persian victories, wherewith they were pampered and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and therather to value at little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which fate nearer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the Father of Philip, so much weakened them, and wonne vpon them, that they were not (as the Graecians perswaded themselves) in any one age, likely to recouer their owne much lesse to work any wonders against their borders. And, indeede, it was not in their Philosophie to consider, That all great alterations are storme-like, suddaine, and violent; and that it is then ouer-late to repaire the decayed and broken banks, when great Riueres are once swollen, fast-running, and enraged. No, the Greeks did rather employ themselves, in breaking downe those defences, which stood between them and this inundation: than seeke to rampare and re-enforce their owne fields, which by the Leuell of reason they might haue found to haue lien vnder it. It was therefore well concluded by OROSIUS: Græciæ Civitates dum imperare singula cupiunt, imperium omnes perdidit; ut Citiæ of Greece lost their command, by striving each of them to command all.

The Kingdome of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the Sonne of Oristes, or, as other Auditors affirme, of Amphi, and Elira, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Ægean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west, by Thessalie and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the familie of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by nation Argiues; who are listed as followeth. About some fixe years after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Arbaces then governing Media, Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to lead a Colonie into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as he was marching through that Countrey, the weather being raynie and tempestuous, he espied a great heard of Goats, which fled the storme as fast as they could, hasting them to their knowne place of couert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to minde, that he had also by an other Oracle bene directed, to follow the first troupe of those beastes, that should either lead him, or sic before him: He pursued these Goats to the Gates of Elessa, and being vndiscovered by the Inhabitants by reason of the darknesse of the aire, he entred their Citie without resistance and posselt it. Soone after this, by the ouerthrow of Cisseus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twentie years. Carus succeeded Caranus, and reigned twelue years. Tyrinus followed Carus, and ruled eight and twentie years.

Perdiccas the first, the sonne of Tyrinus, governed one and fiftie years: a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinius, Iustine, Eusebius, Theophrastus, Arinarchus, and others, affirme, that he appointed a place of buriall for himselfe, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successours, at Ægeæ: assuring them, that the Kingdome should so long continue in his line and race, as they continued to lay vp their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is said, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the posteritie of the Temenides failed in him: a thing rather deused after the event, as I conceine, than foretold by Perdiccas.

Argæus succeeded vnto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twentie years.

Philip the first, his succellour, reigned eight and twentie years.

Europus followed Philip, and governed fixe and twentie years: in whose infancie the Illyrians inuaded Macedon, and hauing obtained a great victorie they pursued the same to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians gathering new forces, and resolving either to recouer their former losse, or to loose at once both their Kingdome and their King, they carried him with them in his Cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not be beaten (their King present;) or rather they perswaded themselves that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their natural Lord, being an Infant, and no way (but by the bandes of his seruants) able to defend him selfe from destruction. The like is reported by Simeonides, of Clotarius the sonne of Eredogunda.

their

Alextas succeeded Europus, and ruled nine and twentie years.

Amyntas the first succeeded Alextas, and reigned fiftie years; Hee liued at such times as Darius Hystaspes, after his vniuersal returne out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Armie into Europe, who in Xerxes name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yielding vnto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadors, as you haue heard before, were, for their insolent behaviour towards the Assacanian Ladies, slaine by the direction of Alexander, who was the sonne of Amyntas, and his Succellour.

Alexander, surnamed the rich, the sonne of Amyntas, gouerned Macedon three and fiftie years. He did not only appeale the wrath of Orontobates for the slaughter of the Assacanian Embassadors, by giuing Cyzax his Sister, to Babares of the blood of Persia, but by that match he grew to great in Xerxes grace, as he obtained all that Region between the Mountains of Olompus and Themus, to bee vnto the Kingdome of Macædon. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greekes. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Mardonius made General of the Persian Armie; Alexander acquainted the Greekes with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three Sonnes, Perdiccas, Alextas, and Philip.

Perdiccas the second, the sonne of Alexander, liued in the time of the Peloponnesian Warre, and reigned in all eight and twentie years. The Warre which hee made were not much remarkable: the Storie of eacm is found here and there by peeces, in Thucydides his first fixe bookes. He left behinde him two Sonnes; Perdiccas, who was very yong, and Archelaus who was base borne.

Perdiccas the third, being deliuered to the custodie and care of Archelaus, was at seven years of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false guardian: who excusing this fact to Cleopatra the Mother of the yong King, said, That the child in following a Goose hastily fell thervnto by misadventure. But Archelaus staied not here: for hauing thus dispatched his Brother, hee slew both his Vncle Alextas the sonne of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the sonne of this Alextas, his Cousin Germane, and enioyed the Kingdome of Macedon himselfe foure and twentie years.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though hee made himselfe King by wicked murder, yet he performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That he sought by all means to draw Socrates vnto him, and that he greatly loued and honoured Empyrides the Trageedian. He had two Sonnes, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelaus the second succeeded his Father, and hauing reigned seven yeares, hee was slaine in hunting, either by chance or by purpose, by Clætus.

Orestes his yonger sonne was committed to the education of Europus, of the roiall blood of Macedon, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupill, for Europus murdered him and vsurped the Kingdome, which he held some fixe yeares: the same who denied passage to Agesilaus King of Sparta, who desired after his returne from the Asian expedition, to passe by the way of Macedon into Greece.

This vsurper left three Sonnes, Pausanias, Argæus, and Alexander. Pausanias succeeded his father Europus, and hauing reigned one yeare, hee was driven out by Amyntas the sonne of Philip, the sonne of the first Perdiccas, the sonne of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preferred, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his brother Perdiccas, his Vncle Alextas, and his sonne Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very quietly) foure and twentie yeares; for he was not only infilled by Paulanias, assisted by the Thracians, and by his brother Argæus; incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argæus, for two yeares dispossest of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbours neare the Ægean Sea, made themselves for a while Matters of Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon.

Amyntas the second had by his Wife Eurydice, the Illyrian, three Sonnes; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Euryone or Esiene: He had also by his second wife Gyges three Sonnes; Archeleus, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterward slaine by tiir brother Philip. He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomee, surnamed Alorites, of the Citie Alorits, wherein he was borne.

Alexander the second reigned not much about one year, in which time he was invaded by Paulanias, the sonne of Æropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Albanian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great summe of money) to leaue his yongest brother Philip in Heltage with the Illyrians, who had subjected his Father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander, being invited by the Alcædes against Alexander the Tyrant of Pheres in Thessalie, hauing redeemed his brother Philip, to draw the Thracians to his assistance entred into confederacie with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Countre, with whom he also left Philip with diuers other principall persons for the gage of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his Mother failing in loue with her Sonne-in-law, who had married her Daughter Euryone or Esiene, practized the death of Alexander her sonne, with a purpose to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Ptolomee Alorites did put in execution: by meanes whereof hee held Macedon for three yeares, but was soone after slaine by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Diod. l. 15. c. 16

Perdiccas the third, after he had slaine Alorites his base brother, gouerned Macedon siue yeares, and was then slaine in a battaile against the Illyrians, according to Tirolonius, but Iustin affirmeth, that he perished by the practise of Eurydice his Mother, as Alexander did. Iust. l. 7.

§. II.

The beginning of PHILIP's raigens, and how he deliuered Macedon from the troubles wherein he found it entangled.

PHILIP the second, the yongest sonne of Amyntas by Eurydice, hauing bene instructed in all knowledge requisite vnto the gouernement of a Kingdome, in that excellent education which hee had vnder Egymionidas, making an escape from Thebes returned into Macedon, in the first yeare of the hundred and fifti Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourescore and thirteene yeares: and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was inuironed, hee tooke on him, not as King (for Perdiccas left a sonne, though but an Infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of Warre. Yet his fruitfull ambition soone ouer-grew his modelltie, and he was easily perswaded by the people to accept both the Title of King, and withall the absolute Rule of the Kingdome. And to say the truth, The necessitie of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and actiue. For, besides the incursions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did set vp in opposition Paulanias; the Athenians, Argæus, sonnes sonnes of the late Vürper Æropus: each of these labouring to place in Macedon a King of their owne Election. These becaue burdens when Philip could not well beare, he bought off the weightiest by money, and by faire promises vnloosed himselfe of so many of the rest, as he ranne vnder the remainder happily enough. For, notwithstanding that his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with foure thousand Macedonians, beside these that were wounded and taken prisoners; and that the Pannonians were destroying all before them in Macedon, and that the Athenians with a fleet by Sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land vnder Antanis, did beate vpon him on all sides and quarters of his Countre: Yet after he had practised the men of warre of Pannonia; and corrupted them with gifts, and had also bought the King of Thrace from Paulanias, he forthwith made head against the Athenians his stiffest enemies; and, for the first, he preuented their recouerie of Amphipolis, a Citie on the frontier of Macedon: and did then pursue Argæus the sonne of Æropus, set against him by the Athenians, and followed him so hard at the heeles, in his retreat from Æges, that he forced him to abide the battaile: which Argæus loth, hauing the greatest part of his Armie slaine in the place. Those of the Athenians, and others which remained vnbroken, tooke the aduantage of a strong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet auoiding thereby the present furie of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquishers life and libertie to returne into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded betwene him and the Athenians for that present, and for this clemencie hee was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greekes. 20 Attica

§. III.

The good successe which PHILIP had in many enterprises.

PHILIP had leisure to looke Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pannonians, his irreconcilable enemies and borderers: both which hee invaded with so prosperous successe, as hee (slow Bardilis, King of the Illyrians, with fiftie thousand of his Nation, and thereby recouered all those places which the Illyrians held in Macedon; and withall, vpon the death of the King of Pannonia, hee pierst that Countre, and after a maine victorie obtained, hee enforced them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done, than (without slaying to take longer breath) hee hastied speedily towards Larissa, vpon the Riuer Peneus in Thessalie, of which Towne hee soone made himselfe master; and thereby got good footing in that Countre, wherof he made vse in time following. Now although hee reloued either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his owne against all others, because the horse-men of that Countre were the best, and most feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it most for his safetie to close vp the entrances out of Thrace, lest while hee invaded Thessalie and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either withdraw him, or ouer-runne Macedon as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous Riuer of Sirmon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and wonne it. He also recouered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the Citie of Oreides (sometime Datus) and called it after his owne name Philippi: to the people whereof St. Paul afterward directed one of his Epistles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in Mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the advancement of Philippi affaires, he drew yearly a thousand talents, which make fixe hundred thousand French Crownes.

And that hee might with the more ease disburden the Thracian shores of the Athenian Garrison, to which hee had giuen a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entred into league with his Fathers malicious enemies the Olynthians: whom the better to sauen vnto him, he gaue them the Citie of Pydna with the Territorie, meanning nothing lesse than that they should enjoy it, or their owne Estate, manie years.

Now that he might by degrees winne ground vpon the Greekes, he tooke the faire occasion to deliuer the Citie of Pheres in Theſſalie, from the tyrannie of Lycophron and Tiphonius. Who, after they had conspired with Thebe the Wife of Alexander, who vsurped vpon the libertie of that State, they themselves (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former libertie. Which act of Philip did for-euer after fasten the Theſſalians vnto him, and to his exceeding great aduantage, binde them to his seruice.

§. IIII.

Of the Phocian Warre which first drew PHILIP into Greece.

About this time, to wit, in the second year of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight yeares after the battaile of Maninæ, and about the eighth yeare of Artaxerxes Ochus, beganne that Warre, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concurre towards the execution of eternall Providence, and of eury great alteration in the World there is some preceeding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this reuengefull hatred by the Thebians, Theſſalians, and Locrians, conceived against the Phocians, nor only teach Philip how he might with halfe a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greekes themselves beating downe their owne defences, to giue him an easie passage, and beating themselves, to giue him victorie without perill, left nothing vnperformed towards their owne slauerie, sauing the tide and imposition. Of this Warre the Thebians (made ouer-proude by their victorie at Leuctra) were the inflamers. For at the Councell of the Amphyctiones, or of the generall Estates of Greece, in which, at that time, they swaied most, they caused both the Lacedemonians and Phocians to bee condemned in greater summes of money than they could well beare; the one for surprisling the Cattle of Cadmeis in the time of peace, the other for ploughing vpon a peece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphes. The Phocians being resolved not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on and encouraged by the Lacedemonians; and for refusal were exposed as Sacrilegiers, and accursed, to all their Neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to invade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captaine of their owne, cast the same dice of hazard that Cæsar after many Ages following did; but had not the same chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their owne Nation. And the better to beare out an vngratious quarrell, of which there was left no hope of composition, they resolved to sack the Temple it selfe. For seeing that for the ploughing of a peece of Apollis ground, they had so much offended their neighbour-God, and their neighbour-Nations, as worse could not befall them than already was intended; they resolved to take the gold with the ground, and either to perill for all, or to preuaile against all that had communion to call them to accompt. The treasure which they tooke out of the Temple in the beginning of the warre was ten thousand talents, which in those daies serued them to wage a great many men, and such was their successe in the beginning of the warre, as they wonne three great battailes against the Thebians, Theſſalians, and Locrians, but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus cast himselfe head-long over the Rocks.

In the meane while the Cities of Cherſoneſus, both to defend themselves against their bad-Neighbour Philip, who encroched vpon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendred themselves to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his handes, and at the siege of Methone lost one of his cies. It is said, That hee that thot him did purposely direct his Arrow towards him, and that it was written on the shaft thereof: After PHILIPPO; After to PHILIP; for so he was called that gaue him the wound. This Citie he euened with the soile.

Plat. Vſpian.
Strab. 18.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was buſied on the border of Thrace, and the Theſſalians engaged in the holy Warre, entred Theſſalie with new forces, being assisted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Armie, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped lo to entertaine the Theſſalians at home, as they should nor finde leisure to invade them. Hereupon was Philip the second time called into Theſſalie, but both the Theſſalians, and Macedonians, (Philip being present) were vtterly ouerthrowne by Onomarchus; and great numbers of both Nations lost. From Theſſalie, Onomarchus drew speedily towards Beotia, and with the same victorious Armie brake the forces of the Boeotians, and tooke from them their Citie of Coronea. But Philip impatient of his late misadventure, after hee had reinforced his Armie, returned with all speede into Theſſalie, there to finde againe the honour which he lately lost: and was the second time incournt by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twentie thousand foote, and five hundred horſe. All this great preparation sufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip surmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Armie ouerturned, sixe thousand slaine, and three thousand taken: of which number himselfe being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Those that fled were in part receiued by the Athenian Gallies, which sailed along the coast, commanded by Chares, but the greatest number of those that tooke the Sea, were therein deuoured as they recovered them. Lycophron was now againe driuen out of Theſſalie, and Pheres made free as before.

§. V.

Of the Olynthian Warre. The ambitious praictises of PHILIP.

From hence Philip resolved to inuade Phocis it selfe, but the Athenians did not fauour his entrance into those parts, and therefore with the helpe of the Lacedemonians they retrencht his passage at the Straits of Thermopylis. Whereupon hee returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Micyberne, Torone, and other Townes, hee quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very strong, and had euermore both braued and beaten the Macedonians. It is said that Philip hauing put to death Archelaus his halfe brother (for Amyntus had three sonnes by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other sonnes by Gygis: but Philip elder brothers by the same Mother being dead, he determined to rid himselfe also of the rest) the two younger held themselves witian Olynthus; and that the receiuing of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the warre, Isidore affirmeth. But just quarrels are ballanced by just Princes, for to this King all things were lawfull that might any way serue his turne; all his affections, and passions, how diuers foucer in other men, were in his ambition swallowed vp, and thenceinto conuerted. For hee neither forbore the murder of his owne brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelitie, hee esteemed no place strong where his Asse loaden with gold might enter, Nor any Citie or State vnconquerable, where a few of the greatest lo be made greater, could loose the sense of other mens sorrow and subjection. And because hee thought it vaine to practise the wining of Olynthus, till hee had inclosed all the power they had within their owne walls, he entred their Territorie, and by the aduantage of a well-compounded and trained Armie, he gaue them two ouerthrowes hee fate downe before the Citie it selfe: which done, hee bought Eubulides and Asithenes from their people, and from the seruice of their Countrey and Common-weale, by whose treason hee entred the Towne, slew his brothers therein, sackt it, and sold the Inhabitants for slaves by the

the drum. By the spoile of this place he greatly enriched himselfe, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withall, which he daily did. For so was hee advised by the Oracle in the beginning of his vndertaking, That hee should make his assaults with silver speeres: Whereupon him see well and truly said.

And it is true that he wonne more by corruption and fraude than he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greece his secret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spaine:) So when in the contention betweene the Competitors for the Kingdome of Thraee, he was chosen the Arbitrator, he came not to the Councell accompanied with Pietie, and Iustice, but with a powerfull Armie, and hauing beaten and slaine both Kings, gaue sentence for himselfe, and made the Kingdome his owne.

§. VI.

How Philip ended the Phocian Warre.

THe warre still continuing betweene the Phocians, and the Associates of the holy Warre, the Boeotians, finding themselves vnable to subliſt without some present aide, ſent vnto Philip for succour, who willingly yielded to their necessities, and ſent them ſuch a proportion of men as were neither ſufficient to maſter their enemies, nor to aſſiſt themſelues; but yet to inable them to continue the warre, and to waite the ſtrength of Greece. They alſo ſent to Antaxerxes Ochus for ſupply of treaſure, who lent them thirtie talents, which makes a hundred and foureſcore thouſand Crownes, but when with theſe ſupplies they had ſtill the worſt in all their attempts againſt the Phocians, who held from them three of their ſtrongelt Cities within Boeotia it ſelfe, They then beſought Philip of Macedon that hee would aſſiſt them in perſon, to whom they would giue an entrance into their Territorie, and in all things obey his commandments in that Warre.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himſelfe in ſtate to giue the law to both, and ſo quitting all his other purpoſes towards the North, he marched with a ſpedie pace towards Boeotia, where being arriued, Phalceus who commanded the Phocian Armie, fearing to thack with this victorious King, made his owne peace, and with-drew himſelfe with a Regiment of eight thouſand ſouldiers into Peloponnelus, leauiſng the Phocians to the merce of the Conquerour, and for conſolation he had the glorie of that Warre called Sared, which the Grecians with ſo many mutuall ſlaughters had continued for ten yeares, and, beſides the glorie, he poſſeſſed himſelfe of Orchomene, Coronea, and Corſia, in the Countrie of the Boeotians, who inuited him to be victorious ouer themſelues. Hee brought the Phocians into ſeruitude, and waſted their Cities, and gaue them but their Villages to inhabite, reſeruing to himſelfe the yearly tribute of threeſcore talents, which make fixe and thirtie thouſand French Crownes. He alſo hereby (beſides the fame of pietie for ſeruice of the Gods) obtained the ſame double voice in the Councell of the Amphictyones, which the Phocians had, with the ſuperintendencie of the Pythian games, forfeited by the Carinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian ſacrilege.

§. VII.

How Philip with ill ſucceſſe attempted vpon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

Philip after his triumphant returne into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Armie Parmentis, ſlaughtered many thouſands of the Illyrians, and Dardaniens, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their reuenues. But his next enterpriſe againſt the Perinthians ſtaied his iurie. Perinthus was a Citie of Thraee, ſeated vpon Propontis, in the mid-way betweene Seſtor and Byzantium, a place of great ſtrength, and a people reſolued to defend their libertie againſt Philip, where the Athenians encouraged and aſſiſted them. Philip ſate downe before it with a powerfull Armie, made many faire breaches, gaue many furious aſſaults, built many ouer-topping and commanding Towers about it. But hee was repel'd with equall violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continuall aſſaults to wearie them, and waite both their men and munition, they were ſupplied, not only from the Perſians with men and money, and ſuccoured from Byzantium which ſtood vpon the ſame Sea-coaſt, but they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatſoeuer was wanting to their neceſſitie. But becauſe thoſe of Byzantium, by reaſon of their Neighbourhood, and the eaſie paſſage by water, gaue them often and readie helpe; Philip remoued with the one halfe of his Armie and beſieged it, leauiſng fiſtene thouſand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could, but to be ſhort, hee failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that vnder-take diuers enterpriſes at one time) and returned into Macedon with no leſſe diſhonour than loſſe: whereupon he made an Ouerture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly deſired it, to which though Phocion perſwaded them in all he could, and that by the occaſion offered they might greatly aduantage their conditions; Yet Demagheues with his eloquence prevailed in the reſuſall. In the meane while, Philip hauing digeſted his late affront, and ſupplied his expence by the taking of an hundred and threeſcore and ten Marchants ſhips, hee gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his ſonne Alexander, lead them into Scythia; but he was alſo vnproſperous in this enterpriſe: For the Triballi, a people of Mefia, ſet on him in his returne, wounded him, and tooke from him the greateſt part of the ſpoiles, which he had gathered.

§. VIII.

How Philip overthrowing the Greeks in the battaile of Cheronas, was choſen Captaine-Generall of Greece. The death of Philip.

Among theſe Northern Nations (part of which hee ſuppreſſed, and part quieted) hee ſpent ſome eight yeares; and in the ninth year, after the end of the holy Warre, he was to his great aduantage inuited againe by the Grecians to their aſſiſtance. For the Citizens of Amphibia hauing diſobeyed the decree of the Amphictyones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reaſon that the Thebans and Locrians gaue countenance and aide to the Amphictyones, the reſt were not of themſelues able to conſtraine them, they beſought Philip to come in perſon to their aſſiſtance. Now you muſt thinke that Philip was not long in reſolving vpon this enterpriſe; hee needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keepe back; nor other diſſuaſion that a maſtering power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Armie forthwith to march; the ſame being compounded of thirtie thouſand foote, and two thouſand horſe; and with as much expedition expedition as could be made, he entered Phocis, wanne Plataea, and brought into subjection all that Region.

The rest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to feare that a great part of this storme would fall on them selves, yet were they dissuaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choise (having drawne the Thebans to joyn with them) to leave the injoying of their states and their freedom to the chance of one battaile, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Orators eloquence cost them deare. It is true that he could farre more easly misde them of the vertue of their Ancestors, then make them to be such as they were. Hee might repeat vnto them (with words mouing passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but hee could not transforme the Macedonians into Perfians, nor draw from the dead, a Mitridates, an Artilles, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had paid with the greatest ingratitude that euer Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrarie faction hee was at this time in disgrace, and not imploied: in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incountred, although some thousand of the Athenians abid the killing, and the like number well heare of the Theban died with them; yet the want of worthe men on that side to hold vp the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choise Captaines of the Macedonians, incouraged by a King of growing fortune, as it gaue to Philip so shining a victorie that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despite of all the Nations intercept) into Perfia, India, and Egypt; so he cut to the ground, and gaue end and date to all the Grecian glorie: Yea their libertie (saith Cicero) with their large Laminion womne with so many difficulties, continued for so many Ages. and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for euer lost.

Now this aduiled King (neuer passionate to his disadvantage) to the end hee might obtaine the Soueraignetie ouer all Greece and be acknowledged for their Capitaine-Generall against the Perfians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let goe those Athenians that were taken at this battaile of Cleoneas, as he also forbore to attempt any thing against their Citie: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Eparinondas triumphed ouer the rest) hee lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being sooner after (according vnto the long desire which hee had nourished of this Soueraignetie) by the generall States at Cornith, titled The first Commander of all the Grecians, and contribution of men and money granted him, hee compounded an Armie of great strength, and vnder the commandement of Attalus and Parmenio, transported the same ouer the Hellepont into Asia, to beginne the Warre. Of his enterprise against Perfia hee sought the successe from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence hee received such an other conuertible riddle, as Cicero did when hee attempted Cyprus, and was in like sort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discern and withstand the flatteries of our owne appetites, so did *Philip*s ambitious desire to invade Perfia abuse his judgement, so farre, that the death, wherewith himselfe was threatned, he understood to be deliuered of his enemy, whom he intended presently to invade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, hee prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra with Alexander King of Epirus, to which Rust and pastimes thereat appointed hee invited all his Friends, and Allies, with the principall persons of the Grecian Cities, from whom hee received much honour and many rich presents; but this was indeede the feast of his Funerall. For hauing refused to doe iustice to one Pausanias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly fauoured by Philip) had first made drunke, and then left to be carnally abused by diuers base persons, This Pausanias grew into so great detestation of the Kings partialitie in so fowle a fact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater, he drew a sword from vnder his long garment and wounded him to death, when hee had liued fixe and fortie yeares, and reigned fixe and twentie.

In fine reports it, that Olympias incouraged Pausanias to murder the King her husband, which after his death shee boldly auowed, by the honour thee did vnto Pausanias in crowning his dead bodie, in consecrating his sword vnto Apello, by building for him a Monument, and other like Graces.

¶ I X.

What good foundations of ALEXANDERS greatnesse were laied by PHILIP.
of his inaudable qualities, and issue.

10 NOW although hee were then taken from the World, when hee had mastered all opposition on that side the Sea, and had seene the fruits of his hopes and labours, changing colour towards ripenesse, and perfection, yet hee was herein happie that hee liued to see his sonne Alexander at mans estate, and had himselfe been an eye-witnesse of his resolution, and singular valour in this last battaile.

The foundation of whose future greatnesse hee had laied so foundly for him, with so plaine a patterne of the buildings which himselfe meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more calie to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginnings were vnto Philip, though lesse famous. For besides the recoverie of Macedon it selfe, in competition betwene him and the sonnes of Aegropus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and besides the regaining of many places posselt by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northern Kings his Neighbours, the ouerthrow of Olympus, a State that dispised the power of his Father, the many Maritimate Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedom, and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it selfe against the greatest Kings of the World, and woune vpon them; Hee left vnto his sonne, and had bred vp for him, so many choise Commanders, as the most of them both for their valour and judgement in the Warre were no lesse worthe of Crownes, than himselfe was that wore a Crowne: For it was said of Parmenio (whom Alexander, vngratefull to so great vertue, impiously murdered) That Parmenio had performed many things challenging eternall fame, without the King, but the King, without Parmenio, neuer did any thing worthe of renowne; as for the rest of his Captaines, though content to obey the Sonne of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themselves.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature, and his excellent Education had enriched him with vertues. For besides that Hee was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Afflictions, hee had this fauour of Pietie, that hee rather laboured to satisfie those that were grieved, than to suppress them, Whereof (among many other) wee finde a good example in his dealing with Arsadon, and Alexander; whom, when for their euill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death; Hee answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them that gaue him ill language, or in himselfe: Secondly, that it was in currey mans owne power to bee well spoken off; and this was shortly proued, for after Philip had relieved their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon hee told those that had perswaded him to vse violence, that hee was a better Philition for euill speech than they were.

10 His Epistles to Alexander his sonne are remembered by Cicero, and Gellius; and by Dion and Chrysostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyxenus and Frontinus, his wife sayings by Plutarch. And albeit hee held Macedon as in his owne right, all the time of his raigne, yet was he not the true and next Heire thereof: for Amyntus the sonne of his Brother Perdiccas (of whom hee had the protection protection during his infancie) had the right. This Amyntas hee married to his Daughter Cyna, who had by him a Daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philip base sonne Aridaus, her Vncle by the mothers-side: both which Olympias, Philip first Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Aridaus by extreme torments; Eurydice shee strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias the Daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molossians (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Vncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her Brother Alexander death slaine at Sardis, by the commandment of Antigonus.

By Andania, an Illyrian, his second wife, hee had Cyna, married as is shewed before.

By Neapolis, the Sister of Isaon, Tyrant of Pheres, hee had Thestylis, whom Cassander, after hee had taken Ptolema, married, but shee was afterward by her Father-in-law Antipater put to death.

By Cleopatra, the Niece of Attalus, hee had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him, Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be rofled to death in a copper Pan. Others lay this murder on Alexander himselfe. By the same Cleopatra hee had likewise a Daughter, called Eurydice, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers brest.

By Phila and Meda hee had no issue.

Hee had also two Concubines, Asine, whom, after hee had gotten with child, hee married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptoleme, King of Aegypt, called the sonne of Lagus, but esteemed the sonne of Philip: by Phelania, his second Concubine, a publike Dancer, hee had Aridaus, of whom wee shall haue much occasion to speake hereafter.

CHAP. II.

Of ALEXANDER the Great.

§. I.

A briefe rehearsal of ALEXANDERS doings, before hee invaded Asia.

ALEXANDER, afterward called the Great, succeeded vnto Philip his Father, being a Prince no lesse valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and enriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his raigne ouer the Macedonians foure hundred and seuenteen yeares after Kene built, and after his owne birth twentie yeares. The strange dreames of Philip his Father, and that one of the Gods, in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, (I omit as foolish tales; but that the Temple of Dion burnt vpon the day of his birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three seuerall victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable.

remarkable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and foretelling the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Vpon the change of the King, the Neighbour-Nations, whom Philip had opprest, beganne to consult about the recouerie of their former libertie, and to aduenture it by force of Armes. Alexanders young-year gaue them hope of preuailling, and his suspected seueritie increased courage in those, who could better resolve to die, than to liue slavishly. But Alexander gaue no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily haue endangered the health of his state. For after reuenge taken vpon the Conspirators against his Father, whom hee slew vpon his Tomb; and the celebration of his Funerals, hee first fastened vnto him his owne Nation, by freeing them from all exactions, and bodily slaueerie, other than their seruice in his warres; and used such Kingly austeritie towards those that contemned his young yeares, and such clemencie to the rest that perswaded themselves of the clemencie of his disposition, as all affections being pacified at home, He made a present journey into Peloponnesus, and so well excecuted his spirits among them, as by the Counsell of the States of Greece, he was according to the great desire of his heart, elected Capitaine-Generall against the Persians, vpon which warre Philip his Father had not only resolved, (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported vnder the leading of Parmenio, and Attalus, a part of his Armie, to recouer some places on Asia-side, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprise against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections; those faire marks of riches, Honour, and large Dominion, hee now shot at both sleeping and waking: all other thoughts and imaginations were either grieuous or hatfull. But a contrarie wind carsteth; for hee receiued aduertisement that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedemonians, had vniued themselves against him, and by assistance from the Persian, hoped for the recouerie of their former freedome. Hereto they were perswaded by Demosthenes, himselfe being thereto perswaded by the gold of Persia; the deuse he used was more subtile than profitable; for hee caused it to be bruted that Alexander was slaine in a battaile against the Triballer, and brought into the assemblie a Companion whom hee had corrupted to affirme, That himselfe was present and wounded in the battaile. There is indeede a certaine Doctrine of Policy (as Policy is now a daies defined by falsehood and knauerie) that deuised rumours and lies, if they serue the turne, but for a day or two, are greatly auailable. It is true that common people are sometime mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarms in the Warres; but in all that I haue obserued, I haue found the successe as ridiculous as the inuention. For as those that finde themselves at one time abused by such like brutes, doe at other times neglect their duties, when they are vpon true repores, and in occasions perilous, summoned to assemblie; so doe all men in generall condemne the Venters of such trumperie, and for them feare vpon necessitie occasions to entertaine the truth it selfe. This labour vnllooked for, and losse of time, was not only very grieuous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which hee had directed it, towards the manly and famous Gracians, of whose assistance hee thought himselfe assured, his present vnder-taking was greatly disordered. But hee that cannot indure to strue against the winds, shall hardly attaine the Port which hee purpoeth to recouer; and it no lesse becòmeth the worthiest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to beaule them.

He therefore made such expedition towards these Reuolters, as that himselfe, with the Armie that followed him, brought them the first newes of his preparation. Hereupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moued, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadors to pacifie the King, and to be receiued againe into his grace. Alexander was not long in resolving; for the Persians perswaded him to pardon the Gracians. Wise men are not easily drawne from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King cuer brought to effect any great affaire, who hath intangled himselfe in many enterprises at once, not tending to one and the same certaine end.

And having now quieted his borderers towards the South, he resolved to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Triballes, Peones, Getes, Agrians, and other salvage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not only other of his Predecessours, but euen Philip his Father: with all which after diuers ouerthrows giuen them, hee made peace, or else brought them into subjection. Notwithstanding this good successe, he could not yet find the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than libertie; the Greekes had enjoyed it ouer-long, and lost it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once againe. The Thebans, who had in their Citadell a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander buileth to their succour, and presents himselfe with thirre thousand foot, all old Souldiers, and three thousand horse, before the Citie, and gaue the Inhabitants some daies to resolute, being euen heart-like with the desire of passing into Asia. So vnwilling, indeede, he was to draw bloud of the Gracians, by whom hee hoped to serue himselfe elsewhere, that hee offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliuer into his hands Phanix and Procles, the stirrers vp of the Rebellion. But they, oppoling the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking-in of the Ocean-Sea) in stead of such an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should haue made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to bee deliuered vnto them; as if Thebes alone, then laied in the balance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon and many other Prouinces, could either haue euened the scale or swaied it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obtinacie. For while the Thebans oppose the Armie assailable, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, their Citie taken and rased to the ground, sixe thousand slaine, and thirte thousand sold for slaves, at the price of four hundred and fortie talents. This the King did to the terror of the other Gracian Cities.

Many Arguments were vsed by Cleadas one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbear the destruction of Thebes. He praised the King to beleuee that they were rather misle-led by giuing halfe credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his Successour. Hee also besought the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that Citie, yea that his Ancestor Hercules was borne therein: but all perswasions were fruitlesse, the times wherein offences are committed, doe greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all of the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at libertie Timoclea, the sister of Theogenes, who did in defence of the libertie of Greece against his Father Philip. This Noble woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him rauished, hee threatened to take her life vnclesse shee would confesse her treasure, shee led the Thracian to a Well, and told him that shee had therein cast it, and when the Thracian stooped to looke into the Well, shee suddainly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and stoned him to death.

Now because the Athenians had receiued into their Citie so many of the Thebans, as had escaped and fled vnto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but vpon condition to deliuer into his hands both their Orators which perswaded this second reuolt, and their Captaines; yet in the end it being a torment vnto him to retard the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remaine, and accepted of the banishment of the Captaines wherein he was exceeding ill aduised, had not his fortune, or rather the prouidence of God, made all the resistance against him vnpromisable: for these good Leaders of the Gracians becooke themselves to the seruice of the Persian, whom after a few daies he inuadeth.

How ALEXANDER passing into Asia, sought with the Persians vpon the River of Granicus.

When all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the first of the Spring did passe the Hellespont, and being readie to disembark, hee threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waite in their owne Territorie, or to burne, or deface those buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to possesse. He landed his Armie, consisting of two and thirte thousand foot, and hue thousand horse, all old Souldiers, neare vnto Troy, where he offered a solemne sacrifice vpon Achilles Tombe, his maternall Ancestor.

But before he left his owne coast, he put to death, without any offence giuen him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly aduanced, not sparing such of his owne as he suspected. Hee also tooke with him many of his tributarie Princes, of whose fidelitie he doubted; thinking by vnjust crueltie to asser all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrarie to the policie which his Ambition had commanded vnto him, though agreeing verie well with the iustice of God, for all that he had planned, was soone after withered, and rooted vp; those, whom he most trusted, were the most traitterous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercurie sword as his owne, and all manner of confusion followed his dead bodie to the graue, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexanders landing on Asia-side was brought to Darius, he so much scorned the Armie of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himselfe, as hauing stiled him his seruant on a letter which hee wrote vnto him, reprehending his disloyaltie and audacitie (for Darius intitled himselfe King of Kings, and the Kinsman of the Gods) hee gaue order withall to his Lieutenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander a liue, whip him with rods, and then conuoy him to his presence: that they should sinke his ships, and send the Macedons taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea, belike into Ethiopia, or some other vnhealthfull part of Africa.

In this sort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartlesse, multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already vanquished Macedonians. But the ill definitions of men beare them to the ground, by what strong confidence sooner armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heape into the field, gaue rather an exceeding aduantage to his enemies, than any discouragement at all. For besides that they were men verily vnacquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to preuaile against those of lesse courage than themselves, men that tooke more care how to embroder with gold and siluer their vpper garments, as if they attended the inuasion but of the Sunne-beames, than they did to arme themselves with yron and Steele against the sharpe-pikes, swordes, and darts of the hardie Macedonians; I say besides all these, euen the opinion they had of their owne numbers, of which euery one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turne to fight, filled euery of them with the care of their owne safetie, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their owne breath, and that of their horse, in running away. The Macedonians as they came to fight, and thereby to inrich themselves with the gold and Jewells of Persia, both which they needed, so the Persians who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obaied the King; who had power to constraime them in assembling themselves for his seruice; but their owne feares and cowardice, which in time of danger had most power ouer them, they only then obaied, when their rebellion against so scruple a passion did iustly and violently violently require it. For saith VEGEVIVS: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles praelium cupit, ita formidat inductus; nam sciendum est in pugna esse summi prodesse quam vires. As the well-practised Soldier desires to come to battaile, so the raw one fears it: for we must understand, that in fight it more awailes to have bene accustomed into the like, than only to beate wile strength. What manner of men the Persians were, Alexander discovered in the first encounter, before which time it is said, by those that writ his Storye, That it was hard to judge, whether his daring to undertake the Conquest of an Empire so well peopled, with a handfull of men, or the successe he had, were more to be wondred at. For at the River of Granick, which severeth the Territorie of Tre from Propontia, the Persians sought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and bank of the river to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime vp vnto, and scale from the Leuell of the water; Great resistance (saith Curtius) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander prevailed. But it seemes to mee, that the victorie then gotten was exceeding easie, and that the twentie thousand Persian foot-men, said to be slaine, were rather kil'd in the back, in running away, than hurt in the bosomes by resisting. For had those twentie thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horse-men, or, after Plutarch, two thousand and five hundred horse-men, died with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not have bought their livers at so small a rate, as with the losse of foure and thirtie of all sorts of his owne. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountered two of the Persian Commanders, Spithridates and Perseus; and that the Persian horse-men fought with great furie, though in the end scattered; and lastly how those Gracians in Darius his pay holding themselves in one bodie vpon a peece of ground of advantage, did (after mercie was refused them) fight it out to the last; how doth it then resemble truth, that such resistance having bene made, yet of Alexanders Armie there fell but twelve Foote-men, and two and twentie Horse-men.

§. III.

A digression concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the battaile of Granick.

THe winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terror vpon all those of the lesser Asia, as hee obtained all the Kingdomes thereof without a blow, some one or two Townes excepted. For in all invasions, where the Nations invaded have once bene beaten vpon a great advantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Streights, and Mountaines, they will soone have perswaded themselves, that such an enemy, vpon equal termes and euen ground, can hardly be resisted. It was therefore Aschines counsel, that he which resoluth to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies, of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the naturall difficultie of the waies. One passage or other is commonly left vnguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Countrey be distracted, and yet lightly, some one place will be found that is defended very weakly. How often haue the Alpes given way to Armies, breaking into Italie? Yea, where shall we finde that euer they kept out an invadour? Yet are they such, as (to speake briefly) afflict with all difficulties those that trauaile ouer them; but they giue no securitie to those that lie beinde them: for they are of too large extent. The Townes of Lumbardie perswaded themselves that they might enjoy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had undertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Duchie of Milan: but whilst these Patrons of Milan, whom their owne dwelling in those

Mountaines had made ittself of all other for such a service, were busied in custodie of the Alpes; Francis appeared in Lumbardie, to so much the greater terror of the Inhabitants, by how much the lesse they had expected his arrivall. What shall we say of those Mountaines, which locke vp whole Regions in such fort, as they leaue but one Gate open? The Streights, or (as they were called) the Gates of Tanus in Chicia, and those of Thermopylae, haue seldom bene attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable: but how seldom (if euer) haue they been attempted in vaine? Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopylae; Cyrus the younger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Chicia wide open; how strongly looser they had bene locked and barred, yet were those Countreies open enough to a fleet that should enter on the back-side. The defence of Rivers how hard a thing it is, wee finde examples in all histories that beare good witness. The deepeft haue many Foords; the swiftest and broadest may bee passed by Boates, in case it be found a matter of difficultie to make a Bridge. He that hath men enough to defend all the length of his owne banke, hath also enough to beate his enemy; and may therefore goe better to let him come ouer, to his losse, than by striving in vaine to hinder the passage, as a matter tending to his owne disadvantage, till the heads of his Soldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, hauing their meanes of safeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of such as are too good for them. Certainly if a River were sufficient defence against an Armie, the Ile of Mon, now called Angleser, which is diuided from North-Wales by an arme of the Sea; had bene safe enough against the Romans, inuading it vnder conduct of Iulius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to spend the time in making vessels to transport his forces, did assay the foords. Whereby hee so amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like prouision by Sea, that surely beleeuing nothing could bee hard or inuincible to men, which came so minded to Warre, they humbly intreated for peace, and yielded the Island. Yet the Brittaines were men stout enough; the Persians verie daltards.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to passe the River of Granick in face of the enemy; not marching higher to seeke an easier way, nor labouring to conuey his men ouer it by some safer meanes. For hauing beaten them vpon their owne ground, hee did thereby cut off no lesse of their reputation, than of their strenght, leauing no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such vnable Protectors.

Soone after this victorie he recovered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Trallians and Milyetians, which were rendred vnto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrey, hee received with great grace, suffering them to be gouerned by their owne lawes. For hee obserued it well; Neuam Imperium inchoantibus: his clementia summa; it is commodious vnto such as lay the foundations of a new Soueraigntie to haue the same of being mercifull. Hee then by Parmenio wanne Miletus, and by force mastered Hilaricarnus, which, because it resisted obstinately, hee razed to the ground. From thence hee entred into Caria, where Ada the Queene, who had bene cast out of all that shee held (except the Citie of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, perswaded her selfe vnto him, and adopted him her sonne and successor; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part as hee left the whole Kingdom to her disposing. Hee then entred into Lycia, and Pamphilia, and obtained all the Sea coasts, and subiecting vnto him Paphlagonia, he directed himselfe towards Darius (who was said to be aduanced towards him with a maruallous Armie) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Prouince of Asia the lesse, bordering vpon the Sea, his first victorie laied vnder his feet.

While he gaue order for the gouernment and setting of Lycia, and Pamphilia, he sent Cleander to raise some new Companies in Peloponnesus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas, seated on the River Meander, which was abandoned vnto him, the Castle only holding out; which also after fortie daies was giuen vp: for so long time he gaue them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenas hee past on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a Citie called Gordium, the Regall-seate, in former times, of King Midas. In this Citie it was that he found the Gordian-knot, which when he knew not how to vndoe, hee cut it a-funder with his sword. For there was an ancient propheticke did promise to him that could vntie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, so it were done, assumed to himselfe the fulfilling of the propheticke, by hewing it in peeces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the lesse towards the East, hee tooke care to cleare the Sea-coast on his backe, and to thrust the Persians out of the Ilands of Lesbos, Sio, and Cos, the charge whereof he committed vnto two of his Captaines, giuing them such order as he thought to be most convenient for that seruice; and deliuering vnto them fiftie talents to defray the charge; and withall out of his first spoile gotten, he sent threecore talents more to Antipater his Licutenant in Greece, and Macedon. From Celenas he remoued to Ancira, now called Anguiri, standing on the same Riuer of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there hee multried his Armie, and then entred Babylagonia, whose people submitted themselves vnto him, and obtained freedome of tribute: where hee left Critus Gouvernour with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

Here hee vnderstood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which heartned him greatly to passe on towards him, for of this only Captaine hee had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders hee had besides. For so much hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath vnderaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weales, the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of Kingdomes and Empires guided handfulls of men against multitudes of equall bodily strength, contriued victories beyond all hope and discouree of reason, conuered the fearefull passions of his owne followers into magnanimitie, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; such spirits haue bene stirred vp in sundrie Ages of the world, and in diuers parts thereof, to erect and cast downe againe, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Persons and States; to the same certaine ends, which the infinite spirit of the Finis fall, piercing, mouing, and gouerning all things hath ordained. Certainly the things that this King did were maruailous, and would hardly haue bene vnderaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to haue invaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would haue contented himselfe with some part thereof, and not haue discouered the Riuer of Indus, as this man did. The swift course of victory, wherewith he ranne ouer so large a portion of the World, in so short a space, may iustly be imputed vnto this, that he was neuer encountered by an equall spirit, concurring with equall power against him. Hereby it came to passe that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, than Desert places, and the meere length of tedious Iournies could make, were like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praise-worthy, as for the huge bulke. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, discouer as braue a spirit as Alexanders, and working no lesse exquisitely, though the effects were lesse materiall, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would finde the exact patterne of a noble Commander, must looke vpon such as Epinomenus, that encountering worthie Captains, and those better followed than themselves, haue by their singular vertue ouer-topped their valiant enemies, and still preuailed ouer those, that would not haue yielded one foot to any other. Such as these are doe become liue to obtaine great Empires. For it is a worke of more labour and longer time, to matter the equall forces of one hardie and well-ordered State, than to tread downe and vtterly subdue a multitude of feeble Nations, compounding the bodie of a grosse vniuersitie Empire. Wherefore these Paruo Potentes, men that with little haue done much vpon enemies of like abilitie, are to be regarded as choise examples of worth; but great Conquerors, to be rather admired for the substance substance of their actions, than the exquisite menaging: exactnesse and greatnesse concurring so seldome, that I can finde no instance of both in one, save only that braue Roman Caesar.

Having thus farre digressed, it is now time that wee retorne vnto our Easterne Conqueror; who is traailing hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recouer the Streights thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispatch into Greece, he sent to those Cities, in which he reposed most trust, some of the Persian Targets which he had recovered in his first battaile; vpon which, by certaine inscriptions, he made them partakers of his victorie. Herein hee well aduised himselfe, for he that doth not atwell impart of the honour which he gaineth in the Warres, as hee doth of the spoiles, shall neuer be long followed by the better sort. For men which are either well borne or well bred, and haue more of wealth than of reputation, doe as often satisfie themselves with the purchase of glorie; as the weak in fortune, and strong in courage, doe with the gaine of gold and siluer.

The Gouvernour of Cilicia hearing of Alexander coming on, left some Companies to keepe the Streights, which were indeede very defensible; and withall, as Curcius noteth, hee beganne ouer-late to prise and purin execution the Counsell of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Warres aduised him to waitt all the provisions for Men and Horfe, that could not bee lodged in strong places, and alwaies to giue ground to the Inuader, till hee found some notable aduantage as might assuredly promise him the obtaining of victorie. For the furie of an inuading Armie is best broken, by delaies, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes repelling themselves in beds, and more often on the cold ground. These and the like suddaine alterations bring many diseases vpon all Nations out of their owne Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and sleepe, and refusing to giue or take battaile, had wearied them with his light horfe, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans; hee might perchance haue saued his owne life, and his estate: For it was one of the greatest encouragements giuen by Alexander to the Macedonians, in the third and last tall battaile, that they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Xerxes when hee invaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, lost only his men; but Darius being invaded by the Greekes, and fighting at home, by being beaten, lost his Kingdome; Pericles, though the Lacedemonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not bee drawne to hazard a battaile: for the inuaded ought euermore to fight vpon the aduantage of time and place. Because we reade Histories to inform our vnderstanding by the examples therein found, we will giue some instances of those that haue perished by aduenturing in their owne Countries, to charge an inuading Armie. The Romans, by fighting with Hamul, were brought to the brink of their destruction.

Pempey was well aduised for a while, when hee gaue Caesar ground, but when by the importunitie of his Captaines hee aduentured to fight at Pharsalia, hee lost the battaile, lost the freedome of Rome, and his owne life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battaile with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound iudgement, that those Counsels which promise suretie in all things, are honourable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mightie preparation of Charles the Fifth, when hee invaded Prouence, by waiting the Countrie, and forbearing to fight; so did the Duke of Alua weare the French in Naples, and dissolue the boisterous Armie of the Prince of Orange in the low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrarie to the aduise of their Generall, would needs fight a battaile with the Bourgonians, invading their Countrie, and could not be perswaded to linger the time, and stay their aduantage; but they lost eight and twentie thousand vpon the place. Philip of Valois set vpon King Edward at Cressle and King John (when the English were well neare tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit haue haue bene waited to nothing) constrained the black Prince with great furie, neare Poitiers, to joyne battaile with him: But all men know what lamentable successe the two French Kings found. Charles the Fifth of France made an other kinde of Fabian-Warfare; and though the English burnt and wasted many places, yett this King held his resolution to forbear blowes, and followed his aduise which told him, That the English could neuer get his inheritance by smooke; and it is reported by Belay and Hierault, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that hee wanted from him the Duchie of Guien without euer putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, will men grow short lined, and the charge of things is committed vnto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any found aduise. The course which Nemnon had propounded, mist in all appearance of reason haue brought the Macedonian to a great perplexitie, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shamefull to returne, or dangerous to proceede. For had Cappadocia and Paphlagonia bene waited whilst Alexander was farre off; and the Streights of Cilicia bene defended by Asenes, Governor of that Prouince, with the best of his forces: hunger would not haue suffered the enimie, to stay the trial of all means that might be thought vpon, of forcing that passage; or if the place could not haue bene maintained, yet might Cilicia at better leisure haue bene thoroughly spoiled, that the heart of his Armie should haue bene broken, by seeing out miseries with painefull trauaile.

But Asenes leauing a small number to defend the Streights, tooke the best of his Armie with him, to wait, and spoile the Countrey; or rather, as may seeme, to find himselfe some work, by pretence of which hee might honestly runne further away from Alexander. Hee should rather haue aduentured his person in custodie of the Streights, whereby hee might perhaps haue saved the Prouince; and in the meane time, all that was in the fields, would haue bene conueighed into strong Townes. So should his Armie, if it were driuen from the place of aduantage, haue found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himselfe with his horse-men haue had the lesse worke in destroying that little which was left abroade. Handling the matter as hee did, he gaue the Cilician cause to will for Alexanders coming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wisen apprehending all formes of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Asenes made all hait to joyne himselfe with Darius, burning downe all as he went, like one despairing of the defence, beganne to grow circumspect, and to thinke that surely their Generall, who gaue as lost the Countrey behinde their backs, had exposed themselves vnto certaine death, as men that were good for nothing else, but to dull the Macedonian Swords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countrey (which honour they saw that Asenes himselfe could well forbeare) they speedily followed the foote-steps of their Generall, gleaming after his Harcuff. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardise of his Enemies, and the whole Prouince that had bene alienated from the Persian side by their indiscretion.

§. IIII.

of the vnnarlike Armie leaued by Darius against ALEXANDER.
The vnadvised courses which Darius tooke in this expedition. Hee is vanquished at Issus; where his Mother, Wife, and Children are made prisoners. Of some things following the battaile of Issus.

N the meane season Darius approached; who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Armie of more than two hundred and ninetie thousand Souldiers, out of diuers Nations; Iustine musters them at three hundred thousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horse; Plutarch at sixe hundred thousand.

The manner of his coming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a masker than a man of Warre, and like one that tooke more care to set out his glorie and riches, than to provide for his owne safetie, perswading himselfe, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pompe and sumptuous Pageants. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priests, and after them three hundred and threecore and fve yong-men, answering the number of the daies of the yeare, couered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Iupiter drawne with white Horses, with their Riders clothed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horse of the Sunne: Next after these followed ten sumptuous Chariots, inlaied and garnisht with siluer and gold, and then the Vantguard of their horse, compounded of twelue severall Nations, which the better to auoide confusion, did hardly vnderstand each others language, and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serue very fitly to disorder all that followed them; in the taile of these Horses the Regiment of foote marched, with the Persians called immortal, because if any died the number was presently supplied: and these were armed with chaines of gold, and their coates with the same metall imbrodered, whereof the sleeves were garnished with pearle, bannes, either to catch the hungrie Macedonians withall, or to perswade them that it were great incivillitie to cut and to deface such glorious garments. But it was well said: Sumptuose inductus miles, se virtute superiorem alij non existimet, cum in prelijs oportet fortis esse animi, & non vestimentis se muniri, quantum hostes vestibus non debellantur; Let no man thinke that hee exceedeth those in valour, whom hee exceedeth in gay garments, for it is by men armed with fortitude of minde, and not by the apparell they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papirus that this aduice was borrowed, who when hee fought against the Sannites in that fatall battaile, wherein they all sware either to preuaile or die, thirtie thousand of them hauing apparelled themselves in white garments, with high crests and great plumes of feathers, bad the Roman Souldiers to lay aside all feare: Non enim eris illi vulnera facere, linteatus & per pici atque anata scuta transire Romanum pilum; For these plumed crests would wound no Lodie, and the Roman pike would bore holes in painted and gilded shields.

To second this Court-like companie, fiftene thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breede the more terrour) and these were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinsmen. Then came Darius himselfe, the Gentlemen of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the Gods of his Nation, cast and cut in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not serue, but they serued their turnes of these, by changing their massie-bodies into thinne portable and currant coine. The head of this Chariot was set with pretious stones, with two little golden Idols, couered with an open-winged Eagle of the same metall: The hinder part being raised high whereon Darius sat, had a covering of inestimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horse-men, their Lances plated with siluer, and their heads head; guilt; which they meant not to imbrue in the Macedonian blood, for feare of marring their beautie. He had for the proper Guard of his person two hundred of the blood Royall, blood too Royall and pretious to be spilt by any valorous adventure, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdie fellows, like the Switzers, would haue done him more seruice) and these were backt with thirtie thousand foot-men, after whom againe were led foure hundred spare horses for the King, which if hee had meant to haue vsed he would haue marshalled somewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Rcareward, the same being led by Sijgambis the Kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawne in glorious Chariots, followed by a great traine of Ladies their attendants on horse-back, with fiftene Wagons of the Kings children, and the wines of the Nobilitie, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines, and a world of Nurses, and Ennues's, most sumptuously apparelled, By which it should seeme that Darius thought that the Macedonians had bene Comedians or Tumblers; for this troupe was late fitter to behold those sport: than to bee present at battailes. Betwene these & a companie of slight-armed slaves, with a world of Vallets, was the Kings treasure, charged on fixe hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proved, to pay the Macedonians. In this sort came this Mygame-King into the field, incumberd with a most vnnecessarie traine of Carriumpets, attended with troupes of diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled, and for the most part so effeminate, and so rich in gold and in garments, as the same could not but haue encouraged the nakeddest Nation of the world against them. We finde in daily experience that all discourse of magnanimitie, of Nationall Vertue, of Religion, of Libertie, and whatsoever else hath bene wont to moue and encourage vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common-Souldier, in comparison of spoile and riches, The rich ships are boarded vpon all disadvantages, the rich Townes are furiously assaulted, and the plentifull Countries willingly invaded. Our English Nations haue attempted many places in the Indies, and runne vpon the Spaniards head-long in hope of their royalls of plate, and Pistoles, which had they bene put to it vpon the like disadvantages in Indies, or in any poore Countrie, they would haue turned their Peeces and Pikes against their Commanders, contending that they had bene brought without reason to the Butcherie and slaughter. Its true that the warre is made willingly, and for the most part with good successe, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needie are alwaies aduenturous, so plentie is wont to thinne perill, and men that haue well to liue, doe rather studie how to liue well, I meane wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car c'est là que arien a gaigner, que des coups volontiers il n'y va pas; Noman makes hazz to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his Southsiders, hee would haue satisfied himselfe by the out-sides of the Persians, and neuer haue looked into the intrayles of Beasts for successe. For lenning the description of this second battaile (which is indeede no-where well described, neither for the confusion and haste running away of the Asians could it be) we haue enough by the slaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to informe vs what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that threecore thousand Persian foot-men were slaine in this battaile, with ten thousand of their horse-men, Or (as Curtius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horse-men, and besides this slaughter, fortie thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there miscarried but two hundred and fourecore of all sorts, of which numbers Arianus and other Historians cut off almost the one halfe: I doe verily beleeeue that this small number rather died with the ouer-trauaile and paines-taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes receiued from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate and the basest of the World) had had any fauour remaining of the ancient valour of their forefathers; they would neuer haue sold so good cheape, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, ters, and other the Kings children; had their owne honor bene valued by them at nothing, and the Kings saletie and his estate at lesse. Darius by this time found it true that Charidemus a banished Græcian of Athens had told him, when hee made a view of his Armie about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which hee had assembled of diuers Nations, richly attired, but poorly armed, would bee found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the countrie, whom in passing they would deuour, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to assaile; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattaile in grosse Squadrons, which they call their Phalans, well couered with Armour for defence, and furnished with weapons for offence of great advantage, would make so little account of his delicate Persians, louing their ease and their palat, being withall ill armed and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertaine (hauing so great abundance of treasure to doe it withall) a sufficient number of the same Græcians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equall courage, hee would repent him ouer-late, as taught by the miserable successe like to follow.

But this discourse was so vnpleasing to Darius (who had bene accustomed to nothing so much as to his owne praises, and to nothing so little as to heare truth;) as he commanded that this poore Græcian should be presently slaine: who while hee was a sundring in the Tormentors hand, vied this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom hee had given this good counsell, should assuredly reuenge his death, and lay deferred punishment vpon Darius for despising his aduise.

It was the laying of a Wife man. Depetratus Principis salus est, cuius aures ita formata sunt, ut aspera quæ utilitas, nec quicquam nisi incundum accipiat. That Princes saletie is in a desperate case, whose eares indge all that is profitable to be too sharpe, and will entertaine nothing that is vnpleasant.

For liuere in counsell is the life and essence of counsell, Libertas consilij est vitæ, et essentia, quæ crepta consilium emanat.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the Aduise given him by the Græcian Souldiers that serued him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: but had they bene Counsellors and directors in that Warre, as they were vnderlings and commanded by others, they had with the helpe of a good troupe of horse-men bene able to haue opposed the furie of Alexander, without any assistance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was ouerthrowne with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Græcians, vnder their Capitaine Amyntas, held firme, and marched away in order in despite of the vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: we reade in Histories ancient and moderne, what braue retraitts haue bene made by them, though the rest of the Armie in which they haue serued, hath bene broken.

At the battaile of Raunne, where the Imperials were beaten by the French, a Squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off vnbroken and vndimayned; whom when Gaston de Foix, Duke of Acemures, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victorie not intire by their escape, hee was ouer-turned and slaine in the place. For it is truly said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers feare them not, That, Neque est o periculum imminens nisi opus ipsam quantumvis difficile aggrediantur. They goe about the businesse it selfe, how hard soeuer it be, not standing to consider of the danger, which the mischiefe hanging ouer their heads may bring; and as truly of those that know the warres but by heare-say. Quod valentes sunt et preuenientes ante pericula, in ipsis tamen periculis discedunt; They haue abilitie enough, and to spare, till dangers appeare; but when perill indeede cometh they get them gone.

These Græcians also that made the retraite, aduised Darius to retire his Armie into the plaine of Alasporonia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large fields and great Champions, he might haue inuironed the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withall they counselled him to diuide that his huge Armie into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might, might haue fought many battailes, and haue brought no greater numbers at once then might haue bene well marshalled and conducted. But this counsell was to contrarie to the cowardly affections of the Perrians, as they perswaded Darius to inuiron the Graecians which gaue the aduile, and to cut them in peeces as Traitors. The infinite wisdome of God doth not worke alwaies by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking vnderstanding from the Gouvernours, so as they can neither giue nor discern of Counsels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander vpon a straightned peece of ground, neare vnto the Citie of Isus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the aduile of Parmenio layed there, as in a place of best advantage) was utterly ouerthrowne, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mocher, and Children (whom the Graecians his followers had perswaded him to leaue in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexander, preiudice were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Honours preferred, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Ladie, and his Daughters of excellent forme, Yet Alexander mistreated his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Aristobulus the Historian, That he embraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Oculus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobilitie of Persia in effect, fell into captiuitie; At which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Isus) was seized, amounting to fixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bellion five hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himselfe leauing his brother dead, with diuers other of his chiefe Captaines (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this ouerthrow giuen vnto Larus, all Phanicia (the Citie of Tyre excepted) was yielded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Gouvernour.

Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it troode on his heeles, for Antigonus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Asia the lesse, ouerthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately revolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admirall, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly leaued; the Leucedemonians that warred against Antipater were beaten; foure thousand of those Greeks which made the retreat at the last battaile, forsaking both the partie of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Aegypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to diuide Kingdomes.

Alexander, to honour Ephesius, whom hee loued most, gaue him power to dispose of the Kingdom of Zidon. A man of a most poore estate, that laboured to sustain his life, being of the Royall bloud, was commended by the people vnto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Beggar and a King in one and the same houre.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht that hee could beare his prosperitie with the same moderation, and quietnesse of heart, that he had done his aduersitie; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not performe in himselfe that which hee commended in an other mans desire: for it was a signe that he did but accompanie, and could not gouerne, his felicitie.

While he made some stay in those parts, he receiued a letter from Darius, importing the ransom of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now bene twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing, in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had receiued an ouerthrow by Pyrrius returned returned him a more scornfull answer vpon the offer of peace, than they did before the triall of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had alreadye cast lease, the one a resolute well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander declined the offers of Darius, and sent him word that he not only directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himselfe.

§. V.

How ALEXANDER besieged and wanne the Citie of Tyre.

ALEXANDER coming neare to the Citie of Tyre, receiued from them the present of a golden Crowne, with great store of victuals, and other prelents, which hee tooke very thankfully, returning them answer

That he desired to offer a sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Citie, from whom hee was defended. But the Tyrrians like not his companie within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was seated in the old Citie adjoining, now abandoned and desolate: To bee short, Alexander refused to enter it by force, and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the land whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Maine, yet with the labour of many hands, having great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lithanus, hee filled the passage of the Sea between the land and the Maine, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Sea vpon a storme of winde, sometime by the Tyrrians fired, and sometime torne a-funder, yet with the helpe of his Nauie which arrived (during the siege) from Cyprus, hee ouercame all difficulties and preuailed, after he had spent seuen Moneths in that attempt. The Tyrrians in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the Citie, in respect whereof, and of the great losse of time and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those, that escaped the first furie, to bee hanged on Crolles on the Sea-shore, and reserved for slaues (saith Diodore) thirteene thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirtie thousand. Many more had died had not the Zelouians, that serued Alexander, conuicid great numbers away by shipping vnto their owne Citie.

Happie it was for *Apoll*o that the Towne was taken, for one of the Tyrrians hauing dreamt, that this God meant to forsake the Citie, they bound him fast with a golden chaine to the Idoll of Hercules; but Alexander like a gracious Prince loosened him againe.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprize and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nibuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled vp the channell, that lay between the land and the Maine.

The gouernement of this Territorie he gaue to Philotas, the Sonne of Parmenio; Clitus, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant vnder Parmenio; Ephesius had the charge of the Fleet, and was directed to finde Alexander at Gaza towards Aegypt.

§. VI.

How DARIUS offered conditions of peace to ALEXANDER. ALEXANDER winnes Gaza; and deales graciously with the leues.

IN the meane while Darius sends againe to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and laith the losse of the last battaile to the straightnesse of the place: he hoped to terrifie him, by threatening to incompass him in the plaine Countreies, he bids him consider, how impossible it was to passe the Riuer of Euphrates,

Tigris, Axax, and the rest, with all such other fierce full things: for, hee that was now filled with nothing but feare, had arguments enough of that nature to present vnto another. All the Kingdomes betwene the Riuer of Asia and the Hellepont, he offered him in Lower with his beloued daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his owne, and that which victorie and his owne vertue had possit him of; That he was to giue conditions, and not to receiue any; and that he hauing passed the Sea it selfe, disdained to thinke of resistance in transporting himselfe ouer Riuers. It is said that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the King, that were he Alexander hee would accept of Darius his offers, to which Alexander answered, That so would he if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and coming before Gaza, Betis a faithful servant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Towne with an obstinate resolution, at the liege whereof Alexander receiued a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone; Hee found better men in this place than he did at the former battailes, for he left so many of his Macedonians buried in the lands of Gaza, that he was faine to send for a new supply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first beganne to change condition, and to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entred Gaza by assault, and taken Betis, (whom Ioseph calleth B-benefes) that was weakened with many wounds, and who neuer gave ground to the Assaultants; he bored holes through his feet, and caused him to be drawne about the streets, whilest he was yet alive; who being as valiant a man as himselfe, disdained to aske him either life or remission of his torments. And what had hee to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his ancestor Achilles, who did like to Hector? It is true, that cruelty hath alwaies somewhat to couer her deformitie.

From Gaza (saith Iosephus) he led his Armie towards Ierusalem, a Citie, for the antiquitie and great fame thereof, well knowne vnto him while he lay before Tyre; He had sent for some supply thither, which Iaddus the high Priest, being subject and sworne to Darius, had refused him. The Iewes therefore fearing his reuenge, and vnable to resist, committed the care of their estates and safetie to Iaddus, who, being taught by God, issued out of the Citie couered with his Pontificall-Robes, to wit, an upper garment of purple, embroidered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests & Leuites in their rich ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a manner so vnusall, statelie, and graue, as Alexander greatly admired it. Iosephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Priest, as reuerencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it; Howeouer it was, I am of opinion, That he became so confident in his enterprise, and so assured of the successe after the prophetic of Daniel had been read vnto him, wherein he saw himselfe, and the conquest of Perse so directly pointed at, as nothing thenceforth could discourage him or feare him. He confessed to Parmenio (saith Iosephus) That in Dio a Citie of Macedon, when his mind laboured the conquest of Asia, hee saw in his sleepe such a person as Iaddus, and so apparailled, professing one and the same God, by whom he was encouraged to pursue the purpose hee had in hand with assurance of victorie. This apparition, formerly apprehended onely by the light of his phantasie, he now beheld with his bodily eyes; wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and emboldened, as contrarie to the practice of the Phoenicians, (who hoped to haue sackt and destroyed Ierusalem) he gaue the Iewes all, and more than they desired, both of libertie and immunitie, with permission to liue vnder their owne lawes, and to exercise and enjoy their owne Religion.

§. VII.

ALEXANDER WINNES Egypt: and makes a iourne to the Temple of HAMMON.

From Ierusalem Alexander turned againe towards Egypt, and entred it, where Darius his Lieutenant, Astaces, receiued him and deliuered into his hand the Citie of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this wee see that the Kings of Perse, who had more of affection than of iudgement, gaue to the valiantest man hee had but the command of one Citie, and to the veriest coward the gouernement of all Egypt. When he had set thinges in order in Egypt, he beganne to trauaile after God-head, towards Iupiter Hammon, so foolishly had prosperitie made him, He was to passe ouer the dangerous and drie sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels-back was spent, hee could not but haue perished, had not a maruillous shower of raine fallen vpon him, when his Armie was in extreme despair. All men that know Egypt, and haue written thereof, affirme, That it neuer raines there; but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, and he bringeth to passe what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when hee had lost his way in those vast deserts, that a flight of Crows flew before the Armie, who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Armie was call back, guided them ouer those pathlesse lands to Iupiter Temple.

Arianus from the report of Ptoleme, the sonne of Lagus, saies, That hee wasled by two Dragons, both which reports may be a-like true; But many of these wonders and thinges prodigious, are fained by those that haue written the storie of Alexander, as that an Eagle lay houching directly ouer his head at the battaile of Issus; That a Swallow flew about his head when hee slept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him, at Halicarnassus, fore-shewing the treason of Arropus, practised by Darius to haue slaine him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrans made their defensive engines, when Alexander beleegged them, there fell drops of blood; and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turke of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the aire. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West-Indies haue many such pretie tales; telling how they haue been assisted in battaile, by the presence of our Lades, and by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I thinke themselves doe hardly beleue. The strangest things that I haue read of in this kind being certainly true, was, That the night before the battaile at Neurra, all the Dogges which followed the French Armie, ranne from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning vpon them, as if they had bene bred and fed by them all their liues, and in the morning following, Switzers and Tremouille, Generals for Leuis the twelfth, were by these Imperiall Switzers utterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idoll of Iupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius, for he bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the south, between whom and the territorie of Hammon, the Region Thebas, or the superiour Egypt, with the Mountaines of Lybia, and the Riuer of Nilus, are interparent, and on the North he joyntes it to a Nation, called Agizones, who bordering the Sea-shore, liue (saith hee) vpon the spoiles of shipwrack, whereas the Temple or Grove of this Idoll hath no Sea neare it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Agizones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica.

When Alexander came neare the place, he sent some of his Paralitres before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might bee giuen in all thinges, agreeable to his madde ambition, who affected the title of Iupiter sonne. And so hee was saluted Sonne of Iupiter by the Devils Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some thinke) defective in the Greeke tongue; For whereas he meant to say Opaideon, he said Opauidon, that is; O sonne of Iupiter, in stead of, O uere, onne; for which Grammaticall error he was richly rewarded, and a rumor presently spread, that the great Iupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his owne.

He had heard that Perseus and Literales had formerly consulted with this Oracle. The one, when he was imploied against Gorgon, The other, against Anteu and Buſiris; and seeing these men had derided themselves from the Gods, why might not hee? By this it ſeemes, that he hoped to make his followers and the world fooles, though indeede he made himselfe one, by thinking to couer from the Worlds knowledge his vancies and vices; and the better to confirme his followers in the belief of his Deities, hee had practized the Pricits to giue anſwere to ſuch as conſulted with the Oracle, that it ſhould be pleaſing to Iupiter to honour Alexander as his Sonne.

Curt. li. 4.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a boſſe carried in a Boate, or by a Ramme, or a hammes-head; I ſee that many wiſe-men have troubled themselves to finde out; but, as Strianus ſpeakes of Iſenſus, or Liber Pater (who liued ſaith St. Auguſtine in Apoſtles time). Ea que de ays & eteris fabulis ſuis conſcribere non ſunt nimium curioſe perueſtiganda; We muſt not over-cuſionſly ſearch into the fables, which the Ancients have written of their Gods.

But this is certaine and notable, that after the Copell beganne to be preached in the World, the Deuill in this and in all other Idols became ſpeechleſſe. For that this Ammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Caſar, and in the time of Traian altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witneſſe.

There is found neare his Temple a Fountaine called Fons ſolis (though Ptolome in his third African Table ſets it farther off) that at mid-night is as hot as boiling water, and at Noone as cold as any yce, to which I cannot but giue credit, becauſe I haue heard of ſome other Wells of like nature, and becauſe it is reported by Saint Auguſtine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Plinie, Mela, Solinus, Arianus, Curtius, and others, and indeede our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night, than in the day.

§. VIII.

How ALEXANDER marching againſt DARIUS, was oppoſed very unſkilfully by the Enemics.

From the Temple of Hammon he returned to Memphis, where among many other learned men he heard the Philoſopher Pſammon, who, belike vnderſtanding that he affected the title of Iupiters Sonne, told him that God was the Father-King of all men in generally; and refining the pride of this haughtie King, brought him to ſay, That God was the Father of all mortall men, but that hee acknowledged none for his children ſauē good men.

Ariſt. Pol. 1.

He gaue the charge of the ſeuerrall Prouinces of Egypt to ſeuerrall Gouernours, following the rule of his Maſter Ariſtotle, That a great Dominion ſhould not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Roman Emperours alſo followed, not daring to commit the gouernement of Egypt to any of their ſenators, but to men of meaner ranck and degree. He then gaue order for the founding of Alexandria vpon the Weſter-moſt branch of Nilus. And hauing now ſetled (as he could) the eſtate of Egypt, with the Kingdomes of the leſſer Aſia, Phanicia, and Syria, (which being but the pawnes of Darius his ill fortune, one happie victorie would readily haue redeemed,) he led his Armie towards Euphrates, which paſſage though the ſame was committed to Mazæus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without reſiſtance paſt it. From thence he marched towards Tigris, a Riuer for the ſwiftneſſe thereof called by the Persians The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and Raſon it ſelfe tells vs, might Darius eaſily haue repelled the inuading Macedonian: for the violent courſe of the ſtreame was ſuch, as it draue before it many waightie ſtones, and thoſe that moued not but lay in the bottome, were ſo round and well poliſhed by continuall rolling, rolling, that no man was able to fight on ſo ſlipperie a footing; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the Riuer, otherwiſe than by joining their hands and enterlacing their Armes together, making one waightie and entire bodie to reſiſt the ſwift paſſage and furious race of the ſtreame. Belides this notable helpe, the Channell was ſo deepe towards the Eaſterne ſhore, where Darius ſhould haue made head, as the foot-men were inſorſt to liſt their Bowes and Arrows and Darts ouer their heads, to keepe them from being moiſtined, and made vnſcruicible by the Waters. But it was truly and vnderſtandingly ſaid of Homere.

Talis eſt hominum terreſtrium mens, Quilibet quæſitæ ducit pater vtrorūq; Deorumq;.

The mindes of men are euē ſo affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Eſtates of the World by the ſurfeit of miſgouernement haue bene ſubject to many greuous, and ſometimes mortall diſeaſes, So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it ſelfe into a burning and conſuming Feuer, and thereby become frantick and without vnderſtanding, foreſeeing manifiſtly the diſſolution and death thereof. But Alexander hath now recovered the Eaſterne ſhores of Tigris, without any other diſcultie, than that of the nature of the place; where Mazæus (who had charge to defend the paſſage both of Euphrates and it) preſented himſelfe to the Macedonians, followed with certaine companies of Horſe-men, as if with vnquen forces hee durſt haue charged them on euē ground, when as with a multitude ſarre exceeding them hee forſooke the aduantage which no valour of his enemies could eaſily haue ouer come. But it is commonly ſcene, that fearefull and cowardly men doe ouer follow thoſe waies, and counſells, whereof the opportunitie is already loſt.

It is true that he ſet all prouiſions a fire wherewith the Macedonians might ſerue themſelves ouer Tigris, thinking thereby greatly to haue diſtreſſed them; but the execution of good counſell is fruitleſſe when vnſeaſonable. For now was Alexander ſo well furniſhed with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the compentence of the Armie which he conducted, Thoſe things alſo which he ſought to wait, Alexander being now in ſight, were by his Horſe-men ſaued and recovered. This, Mazæus might haue done ſome daies before at good leiſure; or at this time with ſo great a ſtrength of horſe-men, as the Macedonians durſt not haue purſued them, leauing the ſtrength of their foote out of ſight, and ſarre behinde.

The new prouiſions of DARIUS. Accidents ſeuering the battale of Arbela.

DARIUS, vpon Alexanders firſt returne out of Egypt, had aſſembled all the forces, which thoſe Regions next him could furniſh, and now alſo were the Arians, Seythians, Indians, and other Nations arriued; Nations (ſaith Curtius) that rather ſerued to make vp the names of men, than to make reſiſtance. Arianus hath numbred them with their Leaders; and finds of foot-men of all ſorts ten hundred thouſand, and of horſe four hundred thouſand, belides armed Chariots, and ſome few Elephants. Curtius who mulsters the Armie of Darius at two hundred thouſand foote, and neare ſiſtie thouſand horſe, comes (I thinke) nearer to the true number; and yet ſeeing he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vaſſalls, it is like enough that hee had gathered together of all ſorts ſome three or foure hundred thouſand, with which hee hoped in those faire plaines of Assyria to haue ouer-borne the few numbers of the invading Armie. But it is a Rule in the Philosophie of the Warre.

In omni praelio non tam multitudine, & virtus indocita, quam ars & exercitum solent preare victoriam; in cunctis battaile skill and practise doe more towards the victorie, than multitude and rude audacitie.

While Alexander gaured self to his Armie after their passage ouer Tigris, there happened an Eclipse of the Moone, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant, (as the multitude alwaies are) tooke it for a certaine preface of good successe; for that it was naturall 10 in so much as they began not only to murmur, but to speake it boldly, That for the ambition of one man, a man that did disdain Philip for his Father, and would needes be called the Sonne of Iupiter, they should all perill; For hee not only inforst them to make warre againt Worlds of enemies, but againt Riuers, Mountaines, and the Heauens themselves.

Hereupon Alexander being readie to march forward made a halt, and to quiet the mindes of the multitude, he called before him the Aegyptian Astrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might bee assured that this defection of the Moone was a certaine preface of good successe; for that it was naturall 20 they neuer imparted to the common people, but reserved the knowledge to themselves, so as forric Almanack-maker had bene no small foole in those daies.

Of this kinde of superstitious obseruation Cæsar made good vse, when he fought againt Arrius and the Germans: for they being perswaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moone, they should certainly looke the battaile, Cæsar forst them to abide it, though they durst not giue it, when hauing their mindes already beaten by their owne superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Armie in effect perished.

These Aegyptians gaue no other reason than this, That the Græcians were vnder the aspect of the Sunne, the Persians of the Moone; and therefore the Moone failing and being darkened, the state of Persia was now in danger of falling, and their glorie of being obscured. This judgement of the Aegyptian Priests being noised through 30 all the Armie, all were satisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though deuised since, was well obserued then. Exercitum terror plenum Dux ad pugnam non docet; Let not a Captain lead his Armie to the fight, when it is possessed with matter of terror.

It is truly obserued by Cartius, that the people are led by nothing so much as by superstition; yea, we finde it in all Stories, and often in our owne, that by such inuentions, deuised tales, dreames, and prophesies the people of this Land haue bene carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and still to their owne losse and ruine.

As Alexander drew neare the Persian Armie, certaine letters were surprized written by Darius to the Græcians, perswading them for great summes of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these by the aduice of Parmenio hee suppressed.

At this time also Darius his faire Wife, oppressd with sorrow, and wearied with trauell, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no lesse to bewaile than Darius, who vpon the first brute suspected that some dishonourable violence had bene offered her, but being satisfied by an Eunuch of his owne that attended her, of Alexander Kingly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortal Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to conferre it on so iust and continent an enemy as Alexander, to whom hee once againe before the last triall by battaile offered these conditions of peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliuer vp and resigne all Asia the lesse, and with Aegypt, all those Kingdomes betweene the Phœnician Sea, and the Riuer of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the ranfome of his Mother, and his other

other Daughter thirte thousand talents, and that for the performance thereof, hee would leaue his Sonne Ochus in hostage: To this they fought to perswade Alexander by such arguments as they had. Alexander causing the Embassadors to be remoued, aduiled with his Counsell, but heard no man speake but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune; who perswaded him to accept of these faire conditions. Hee told him, that the Empire betweene Euphrates and Tellisfont was a faire addition to Macedon; that the retyning of the Persian prisoners was a great cumber, and the treasure offered for them of farre better vse than their persons, with diuers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable 10 that if he had followed his aduice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, he might haue liued as famous for vertue as for fortune, and left himselfe a Successor of able age to haue enjoyed his estate, which afterward, indeed, he much enlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himselfe: who to assure himselfe of what they had vsurped vpon his issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few yeares after. The truth is, That Alexander in going so farre into the East, left behinde him the reputation which hee brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a iust and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, aduised and grateful: and being taught new lessons by abundance of prosperitie, became a loue of wine, of his owne flattery, and of extreame cruditie. Yea, as Seneca hath obscured, the taint of one vnjust
20 slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beautie of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadors stay his answer, which was to this effect, That whatsoever hee had bestowed on the Wife and Children of Darius, proceeded from his owne naturall clemencie and magnanimitie, without all respect to their Master, that thanks to an enemy was improper, that hee made no warres againt aduersitie, but againt those that resisted him, Not againt Women and Children, but againt armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great summes of money to perswade his friends to attempt vpon his person, hee had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet hee could not (were it otherwise and 30 faithfull) resolute in halt to accept the same, seeing Darius had made the Warre againt him, not as a King with Royall and ouert-force, but as a Traitor by secret and base practices; That for the Territorie offered him, it was already his owne, and if Darius could beate him back againe ouer Euphrates, which hee had already past, hee would then beleue that hee offered him somewhat in his owne power: Otherwile hee propounded to himselfe for the reward of the Warre, which hee had made, all those Kingdomes as yet in Darius possession, wherein, whether hee were abused by his owne hopes or no, the battaile which hee meant to fight in the day following should determine. For conclusion, hee told them, that hee came into Asia to giue, and not to receive; That the Heauens could not hold two Sunnes; and therefore if

The battaile of Arbela: and that it could not bee so strongly fought as report hath made it.

10 In this answer the Embassadors returned; Darius prepares to fight, and sends Mazæus to defend a passage, which hee neuer yet dared so much as to hazard. Alexander consults with his Captaines, Parmenio perswades him to force Darius his Camp by night, so that the multitude of enemies might not moue terror in the Macedonians, being but few. Alexander disdaines to steale the victorie, and resolves to bring with him the day-

day-night, to witness his valour, But it was the successe that made good Alexanders resolution, though the counsell given by Permenio was more sound: For it is a ground in Warre, Si paucis necessarius cum multitudine pugnare cogatur, consilium est noctis tempus belli fortunam sentire. Notwithstanding vpon the view of the multitude at hand, he taggers & intrenches himselfe vpon a ground of aduantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for feare of surprisall had flood with his Armie in armour all the day, and for orne sleepe all the night; Alexander gaue his men rest and store of foode, for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre, In pugna milites validius resistunt, si cibo potusque refecti fuerint, nam famis intrinsecus magis pugnat, quam ferrum exterius; Souldiers doe the better stand to it in fight; if they haue their bellies full of meate and drinke; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than Steele without.

The numbers which Alexander had, saith Arianus, were fortie thousand foote, and seuen thousand horse; these belike were of the European Armie; for hee had besides both Syrians, Indians, Aegyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He liued but a short speech to his Souldiers to encourage them; and I thinke that he needed little Rhetorick; for by the two former battailes vpon the Riuer of Granick and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true saying, Victoria Victoriam parat, amicum victoribus auget, & aduersus visum fert; One victorie begets an other, and puts courage into those that haue already had the better, taking spirit away from such as haue beene beaten.

Arianus and Curtius make large descriptions of this battaile fought at Gaugamela; They tell vs of many charges and re-charges; That the victorie inclined sometime to the Persians; sometime to the Macedonians; That Permenio was in danger of being ouerthrowne, who led the left wing; That Alexanders Rear-guard was broken and his carriages lost; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both sides, Fortune her selfe was long vnresolued on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retreat. But, in conclusion, Curtius deliuevs vs in accompt but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible daies worke; saying, That Ephesian, Persicatus, and others of name, were wounded. Arianus findes not a third part of this number slaine; of the Persians there fell fortie thousand (saith Curtius), thirtie thousand according to Arianus: Ninetie thousand, if we beleue Diodor. But what can we judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battailes, the Persians vpon the first charge ranne away, and that the Macedonians pursued? For if of these foure or five hundred thousand Arians brought into the field by Darius, euery man had but cast a Dart, or a Stone, the Macedonians could not haue bought the Empire of the East at so small a rate, as sixe or seuen hundred men in three notorious battailes. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander vpon the banks of Euphrates, and had armed but fiftie or thre score thousand of this great multitude, only with Spades (for the most all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had beene impossible for Alexander to haue past that Riuer so easily, much lesse the Riuer of Tigris. But as a man whose Empire God in his prouidence had determined, Hee abandoned all places of aduantage, and suitered Alexander to enter so far into the bowells of his Kingdome, as all hope and possibilitie of escape by retreat being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented vnto them the choise, either of death or victorie; to which election Darius could no way constrain his owne, seeing they had many large Regions to runne into from those that invaded them.

§. XI.

Of things following the battaile of Arbela. The yielding of Babylon and Susa.

DARivs after the rout of his Armie recovered Arbela the same night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded vnto them that ranne after him his purpose of making a retreat into Media, perswading them that the Macedonians, greedy of spoile and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities, filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobilitie rather obeyed than approved.

Alexander soon after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great masse of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred vnto him: for the Treasurie which conducted Darius tooke nothing with it but shame and dishonour. Hee that had beene twice beaten, should rather haue sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so neare the place where he abid the coming of his enemies; if he had beene victorious he might haue brought it after him at leisure, but being ouer come, hee knew it vnpossible to drue Mules and Cammels laden with gold from the pursuing Enemie, seeing himselfe, at the overthrow hee had in Cilicia, call the Crowne from his head to runne away with the more speede. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable. Et praterita scelus reprehenda possunt quoniam corrigi; It is easier to reprehend than amend what is past.

From Arbela Alexander tooke his way towards Babylon, where Mazæus in whom Darius had most confidence rendred himselfe, his children and the Citie. Also the Captaine of the Cattle, who was keeper of the treasure, strewed the streets with flowers, burnt frankincense vpon Altars of silueras Alexander passed by, and deliuered vnto him whatsoever was committed to his trust. The Chaldeans (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Captain in great solemnitie to entertaine their new King: after the came the Babylonian horsemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poore in warlike furniture. Betwene these (though not greatly to be feared) and himselfe, Alexander caused his Macedonian foote-men to march. When hee entered the Cattle hee admired the glorie thereof, and the abundance of treasure therein found amounting to fiftie thousand talents of siluer vncyncoed. The Citie it selfe I haue elsewhere described with the Walles, the Towers, the Gates and the Circuite, with the wonderfull place of pleasure about two miles in Circuite, surrounded with a Wall of fourescore foote high, and on the toppe thereof (being vnder-borne with Pillars) a Groue of beautifull and fruitfull trees, which it is said that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queene and other Princesses might walke privately therein. In this Citie, rich in all things but most of all in Voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himselfe and the whole Armie foure and thirtie daies, consuming that time in banqueting and in all sorts of effeminate exercise, which so much softened the mindes of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the seuer discipline of warre which taught them the sufferances of hunger and thirst, of painfull traualle, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Heere it was that those bands of a thousand Souldiers were erected, & Commanders appointed ouer them, who thereupon were stiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honor those Captaines which were found by certain selected Iudges to haue deserved best in the late warre. For before this time the Macedonian companies consisted but of fiftie hundred. Certainly the drawing downe of the foote-bands in this latter age hath beene the cause (saith the Most Excellent) that the title and charge of a Capitaine hath beene bestowed on euery Picque Brevet or Spurr-Cow, for when the Captaines of foote had a thousand Souldiers vnder one one Ensigne, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honorable and the Kings were lesse charged, and farre better serued. King Henric the eighth of England neuer gaue the commandement of any of his good shippes, but to men of knowne valour, and of great estate, may sometime he made two Gentlemen of quaine commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe, for Antipater sent him nine thousand foote and five hundred horse, out of Macedonia, of Thracians three thousand foote and the like number of horse, and out of Greece four thousand foote and four hundred horse, by which his Armie was greatly strengthened: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon could hardly be brought againe, Lequelz la plaine, et le camp sur la cistre; To change from soft beds to hard boords.

He left the Caste and Citie of Babylon with the Territories about it in charge vnto three of his owne Captaines, deliuering withall into their hands to supply all wants a thousand talents: but to grace Mazens who rendred the citie vnto him, he gaue him the title of his Lieutenant ouer all, and tooke with him Baglines that gaue vp the Cattle, and hauing distributed to euery Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon and entred into the Prouince Satrapene: from thence he went on towards Susa in Persia, the same which Ptoleme, Herodotus, and Elianus call Meconia, situate on the river Euphrates, a Citie sometime gouerned by Daniel the prophet. Abulites also, gouernour of this famous Citie gaue it vp to the Conqueror with fiftie thousand talents of siluer in bullion, and twelue Elephants for the warre, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this fort did those Vassalls of fortune, louers of the Kings prosperitie, not of his person (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their owne peace and safetie with the Kings treasures.

of more than fiftie thousand talents in bullion; and of nine Millions of counted gold.

While Alexander spoiled Abela, Mazens might haue furnished his owne King from Babylon, and while he staid foure and thirtie daies at Babylon, Abulites might haue holpen him from Susa: and while he staid there, Tristates from Persepolis might haue relieved him: for the great masse of treasure was laied vp in that Citie. But who hath fought out and friended fearefull aduersitie? It is certaine, that benefits binde not the ambitious, but the honest: for those that are but greedie of themselves, doe in all changes of fortune only studie the conseruation of their owne greatnesse.

And therefore was Alexander well aduised, that what fouer titles he gaue to the Persians, yet he left all places of importance in trust with his owne Captaines, to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, with other Cities and Prouinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet liuing) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobilitie of Persia would haue returned to their naturall Lord. Those that are Traitors to their owne Kings are neuer to be trusted alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertaine them, nor euer to be trusted with the defences of any frontier-Towne, or Fortresse of waight, by the rendering whereof they may redeme their libertie and estates lost.

Hereof the French had experience, when Pon Petro de Scutaria, being banished out of Spaine, was trusted with Fanturabe, in the yeare 1523.

It is said, that Charles the fifth hauing promised Charles of Boslon the gouernement of Mysedles, if he could haue for it, and whereof he made sure account, told some of his nearest Counsellors, that hee meant nothing lesse than the performance of that promise, because hee should thereby haue left the Duke (reuoiced from his Master) very well wherewithall to haue recouered his fauour.

The gouernment of Susa, with the Caste and Treasure, Alexander committed to his owne Macedonians, making Abulites who rendred it vnto him his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazens and others, in giuing them Titles, but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousand old Souldiers in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius his Mother and her children to repose themselves.

§. XII.

§. XII.

How ALEXANDER came to Persepolis, and burnt it.

From Susa Alexander leadeth his Armie toward Persepolis, and when he sought to passe those Mountaines which sunder Susians and Persians, hee was soundly beaten by Artabazanes, who defended against him those Straights, called Pylæ Persidis, or Susæ; and after the losse of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was faine to saue himselfe by retreat, causing his foote to march close together, and to couer themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountaine-top. Yet in the end he found out an other path, which a Lycian, liuing in that Countrey, discovered vnto him, and came thereby suddenly in view of Artabazanes, who being inforced to fight vpon euery ground, was by Alexander broken, wherupon hee fled to Persepolis, but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receiue him) hee returned and gaue a second charge vpon the Macedonians, wherein he was slaine. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the yeare 1515. finde a way ouer the Alpes, the Switzers vndertaking to defend all the passages, who, if their footmanlipe had not faued them vpon the Kings descent on the other side, they had bene ill paid for their hard lodging on those Hills.

Four thousand Greekes, saith Curtius, (insigne numbers them but at eight hundred) hauing bene taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their Hands, Noses, Eares, and other Members, as they could no way haue bene knowne to their Countrey-men, but by their voices; to each of these Alexander gaue three hundred Crownes, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to liue vpon.

Tristates, one of Darius his false-hearted Grandes, hearing of Alexander's approach, made him know that Persepolis was readie to receiue him, and praised him to double his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoile the Kings treasure. This Citie was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants vpon Alexander's arrival, and they that staid followed the worst counsell, for all was left to the libertie of the Souldiers, to spoile and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had bene laied in ballance with Persepolis, would haue weighed it downe. Babylon, indeede, and Susa, were very rich, but in Persepolis lay the bulke and maine store of the Persians. For after the spoile that had bene made of money, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and siluer, and other Jewells; there remained to Alexander him selfe one hundred and twentie thousand talents. He left the same number of three thousand Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in Susa, and gaue the same formall honour to the Traitor Tristates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nearchides, a creature of his owne. The bodie of his Armie hee left here for thirtie daies, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thousand horse and certaine troupes of chosen foote, he would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had couered, a fruitlesse and foolish enterprise, but as Seneca saies: Non illic ire vult, sed non potest flere; He hath not a will to goe, but he is unable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise, That when his Souldiers cried out against him, because they could not indure the extreame frost, and make way, but with extreme difficulty through the snow, that Alexander forooke his horse, and led them the way. But what can bee more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremitie, thereby to shew how well himselfe can indure it? His walking on foote did no otherwise take off their wearinesse that followed him, than his sometime forbearing to drinke did quench their thirst; that could lesse indure it. For mine owne little judgement I shall rather commend that Captaine, that makes carefull provision for those that follow follow him, and that seekes wisely to prevent extreme necessitie, than those wilde arrogant fooles, that make the vaine of hauing indured equally with the common-Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glorie and importance.

We finde in all the Warres that Cæsar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the prouision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Cæsar, Admirall of France; That who so will shape that best (meaning Warre) must beginn with his bellie.

Curt. l. 5.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians, that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberallie, of his clemencie, towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drinke; That he smothered in carrowling cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reuerend Throne of the greatest King, into the companie and familiaritie of base Harlots, he beganne to be despised both of his owne and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was inflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumptuous and goodly Castle and Citie of Persepolis, to bee consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Pamenio to the contrarie, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Aliens, to thinke hardly of him, and thereby aliene their hearts: For they might well beleuee that hee which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing lesse than (after such vastation) to hold their possession. Peruicaciam crudelitatis sequitur; Crueltate docti communiter follow drunkenesse: For so it fell out soone after, and often, in Alexander.

Sen. Epist. 84.

§. XIII.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his death.

About this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Armie, which hee meant to haue increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexanders coming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as hee had, which was numbred at thirtie or fortie thousand) he determined once againe to trie his fortune. Hee therefore calls together his Captains and Commanders, and propound vnto them his resolution, who being desperate of good successe vsed silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had sometime liued with Philip of Macedon, brake the yce, and protesting that hee could neuer be beaten by any aduersitie of the Kings, from the faith which he had euer ought him, with firme confidence, that all the rest were of the same disposition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) he approved the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Naburzanes, and Bessus, whereof the latter was Governour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master, and therefore aduised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the Gods nor Fortune had in all things declared themselves to be an enemy: this preamble Naburzanes vsed, and in conclusion aduised the election of his fellow Traitor Bessus, with promise that, the warres ended, the Empire should againe be restored to Darius. The King swollen with disdain prest towards Naburzanes to haue slaine him, but Bessus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, withheld him. In the meane while Naburzanes with-drew himselfe, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Armie. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull seruant, perswaded him to be aduised, and serue the time, seeing Alexander was at hand, and that hee would at least make the wof of forgetting the offence made, which the King being of a gentle disposition willingly yielded vnto. Bessus makes his submission and attends the King, who remoues his Armie. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of foure thousand Greekes, which had in all the former battailes serued Darius with great fidelitie, and alwaies made the retreat in sight of the Macedonians, offered himselfe to guard his person, protesting against the treason of Bessus, but it was not in his destinie to follow their aduice, who from the beginning of the Warre gaue him faithfull counsell, but hee inclined still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greekes with Patron their Captaine were corrupted by Alexander, and practised the diuision of his faithfull seruants. Bessus had drawne vnto him thirtie thousand of the Armie, promising them all those things, by which the louers of the world and themselves, are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, satietie, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainly discovered the purposes of Bessus, and being ouer-come with passion, as thinking himselfe vnable to make head against these vngratefull and vnnatural Traitors, hee praised Artabazus his faithfull seruant to depart from him, and to provide for himselfe. In like sort hee discharged the rest of his attendants, all saue a few of his Eunuchs; for his guards had voluntarily abandoned him, His Persians being most base cowards, durst not vndertake his defence against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had foure thousand Greekes to ioyne with him, who had beene able to haue beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forsakes himselfe, no man follows. It had beene farre more man-like and King-like, to haue died in the head of those foure thousand Greekes, which offered him the disposition of their liues, (to which Artabazus perswaded him) than to haue lien bewailing himselfe on the ground, and suffering himselfe to be bound like a slave by those ambitious Monsters that laied hand on him, whom neither the consideration of his former great estate, nor the honors hee had giuen them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could moue to pittie: no, nor his present aduersitie, which about all things should haue smoued them, could pierce their viperous and vngratefull hearts. Vaine it was indeed to hope it, for insideltie hath no compassion.

Now Darius, thus forsaken, was bound and laied in a Cart, couered with hides of beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be discovered; and to adde despiht and denision to his aduersitie, they fastened him with chaines of gold, and so drew him on among their ordinarie carriages and Carts. For Bessus and Naburzanes perswaded themselves to redeeme their liues and the Provinces they held either by deliuering him a prisoner to Alexander, or if that hope failed, to make themselves Kings by his slaughter, and then to defend themselves by force of Armes. But they failed in both. For it was against the nature of God, who is most iust, to pardon so strange villanie, yea though against a Prince purely Heathenish, and an Idolater.

Alexander hauing knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durst not abide his coming, halted after him with a violent speed, and because he would not force his foot-men beyond their powers, hee mounted on horse backe certaine selected Companies of them, and best armed, and with sixe thousand other Horse, rather ranne than marched after Darius. Such as hated the treason of Bessus, and secretly forsooke him, gaue knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus tooke, and how neare hee was at hand: for many men of worth daily ranne from him. Hereupon Alexander againe doubled his pace, and his Vant-guard being discovered by Bessus his reare, Bessus brought a horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perswading him to mount thereon, and to saue himselfe. But the vnfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the beasts that drew him, and slew two poore seruants that attended his person. This done, they all all fled that could, leaving the rest to the mercie of the Macedonian Swords. Polystratus a Macedonian, being by pursute of the vanquished prest with thirst, as he was refreshing himselfe with some water that he had discovered, espying a Cart with a Teame of wounded beastes breathing for life, and not able to moue, searched the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his owne blood. And by a Persian captiue which followed this Polystratus, he vnderstood that it was Darius, and was informed of this barbarous Tragedie. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the liuing God can bee comforted) that hee call not out his last sorrowes vnbear'd, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traitors, which had dealt no lesse vnworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their reuenge to Alexander by this Messenger, which hee besought him to pursue, not because Darius had desired it, but for his owne honor, and for the sake of all that did, or should after weare Crownes. Hee also, having nothing else to present, rendred thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace vnto him the Empire of the whole world. As hee was thus speaking, impatient death pressing out his few remaining spirits, he desired water, which Polystratus presented him, after which he liued but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, where-with to delire the Gods to reward his compassion.

§. XIII.

How Alexander pursued Bessus, and tooke into his grace
Darius his Captiues.

IT was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their trauells were nere an end, euery man preparing for his returne. Hercof when Alexander had knowledge, hee was greatly grieved; for the bounded earth sufficed not his boundlesse ambition. Many arguments hee therefore vsed to draw on his Armie farther into the East, but that which had most strength was, that Bessus, a most cruell Traitor to his Master Darius, hauing at his deuotion the Hircanians, and Sactians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should returne) make himselfe Lord of the Persian Empire, and enjoy the fruits of all their former trauailes. In conclusion, hee wanne their consents to goe on: which done, leaving Craterus with certaine Regiments of foot, and Antyptus with fixe thousand Horse in Parthenia, hee enters not without some opposition into Hircania; for the Atians, and other barbarous Nations, defended certaine passages for a while. Hee passeth the River of Zoborus, which taking beginning in Parthia dissolues it selfe in the Caspian Sea: it runneth vnder the ledge of Mountaines, which bound Parthia and Hircania, where hiding it selfe vnder ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riseth againe and followeth its former course. In Sabacarta or Zendacarta, the same Citie which Ptolemeus writes Hircania, the Metropolis of that Region, hee rested fifteene daies, banquetting, and feasting therein.

Phithernes, one of Darius his greatest Comanders, with other of his best followers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and governments. But of all other hee graced Artabazus most highly for his approued & constant faith to his Master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and fixe hundred Greekes, the remainder of all those that had serued Darius; He treats with Alexander for their pardon before they were yet arriued, but in the end they render themselves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedaemonians, whom hee imprisoned, their Leader hauing slaine himselfe. Hee was also wrought

(though to his great dishonour) to receiue Abazaranes that had joynd with Bessus to murder Darius.

§. XV.

Of Thalestris Queene of the Amazons; where, by way of digression it is shewed, that such Amazons haue bene, and are.

Erre it is said, that Thalestris or Alinothes, a Queene of the Amazons, came to visite him, and her sute was, (which shee calily obtrayned) That shee might accompany him till shee were made with child by him: which done (refusing to follow him into India) shee returned into her owne Countrey.

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But, indeede, the letters of Alexander himselfe to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian buisnesse, may iustly breede suspition of the whole matter as forged. Much more iustly may we suspect it as a vaine tale, because an Historian of the same time recording one of his bookes to Lysimachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voiage; was laught at by the King for inserting such newes of the Amazons, as Lysimachus himselfe had neuer heard of. One that accompanied Alexander tooke vpon him to write his acts, which to amplify, He told how the King had fought single with an Elephant, and slaine it. The King hearing such stufte, caught the booke, and threw it into the River of Indus; saying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inserting such fables disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as wee beleeuue and know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we giue credit vnto writers, making mention of such Amazons, whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaues the matter vnderdetermined. Therefore I will here take leaue to make digression, as well to shew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some moderne discoverers touching these warlike Women, because not only Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether, or no, there were any such kinde of people. Iulius Solinus relates them in the North parts of Asia the lesse. Pom. Melis finds two Regions filled with them; the one, on the River Thermodon; the other, neare the Caspian Sea; Quas (saith hee) Sauomatikas appellant, which the people call Sauomatides. The former of these two had the Cimmerians for their Neighbours; Certum est (saith Plinius, who hath Commented vpon Mela) Illos proximos Amazonibus fuisse. It is certaine that the Cimmerians were the next Nations to the Amazons. Ptolemeus sets them farther into the Land North-wards, neare the Mountaines Hippaci, not far from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it selfe toward India, Solinus and Plinius tell vs; Where they gouerned a people called the Pandans, or Padeans, so called after Pandea the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest deriue themselves. Claudian affirms, That they commanded many Nations: For he speaks (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus.

Dionysius Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith hee) than those which kept the bankes of Thermadon, a Riuer falling into the Euxine Sea neare Ieracium.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom hee tells vs that the Scythians call Aorpatas, which is as much as Viricides, or Men-killers. And that they made incursion into Aſia the lesse, sackt Ephesus, and burnt the Temple of Diana, Alenehon and Auentinus report, which they performed fortie yeares after Troy was taken. At the siege of Troy it selfe wee read of Penthesilea, That shee came to the succour of Prismus.

Enclid. 1. 13.

Am. Marcellinus gives the cause of their inhabiting vpon the riuer of Thermadon, speaking confidently of the Warres they made with diuers Nations, and of their ouerthrow.

Plutarch in the life of Theſeus, out of Philochorus, Hellanicus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiope Queene of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him giuent to Theſeus, though some affirme, That Theſeus himselfe got her by stealth when shee came to visit him aboard his ship. But in substance there is little difference, all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speaks of certain companies of the Amazons, that came to aide the Albanians against the Romans, by whom, after the battaile, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken vp: and he saith farther, That these women entertaine the Gels and Lelages once a yeare, Nations inhabiting betwene them and the Albanians.

Histo Ind. part. 2. c. 38.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Fran. Lopez, who hath written the nauigation of Orellana, which he made down the Riuer of Amazons from Peru, in the yeare 1542. (vpon which Riuer, for the diuers turnings, he is said to haue sailed like thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Councell of the Indies, That hee both saw those women and fought with them, where they sought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea.

It is also reported by Vricus Schmidel, that in the yeare 1542. where he sailed vpon the Riuers of Paragu and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Countrie, called Scherues, inhabiting vnder the Tropicke of Capricorne, who gaue his Captaine Ernando Riesfere, a Crowne of silver, which hee had gotten in fight from a Queene of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopes, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling vs, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burne off their right breast, and liue a-part from men, saue at one time of the yeare, when they feast and accompanie them for one moneth. These (saith he) possesse a part of the Kingdome of Monomotapa in Africa, nineteene degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest guards of this Emperour, all the East Indian Portugals know.

I haue produced these authorities, in part, to iustifie mine owne relation of these Amazons, because that which was deliuered mee for truth by an ancient Casique of Guiana, how vpon the Riuer of Papamens (since the Spanishe discoueries called Amazons) that these women still liue and gouerne, was held for a vaine and vnp probable report.

§. XVI.

How ALEXANDER fell into the Persians Lacerie: and how hee further pursued Bessus.

Now as Alexander had begunne to change his conditions after the taking of Persepolis: so at this time his prosperitie had so much ouerwrought his vertue, as hee accompanied clemencie to bee but basenesse, and the temperance which hee had vsed all his life time, but a poore and dejected humor, rather becoming the instructors of his youth, than the condition and state of so mightie a King, as the world could not equall. For hee perswaded himselfe that hee now represented the greatnesse of the Gods; hee was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground and adore him; hee ware the Robes, and garments of the Persians, and commanded that his Nobilitie should doe the like; hee entertained in his Court, and Campe, the same shamelesse rabble of Curtians, and Sodomiticall Eunuchs, that Darius had done, and imitated in all things the proude, voluptuous, and detested manners of the Persians, whom hee had vanquished. So licentious is felicitie, as notwithstanding that hee was fully perswaded, that the Gods, whom hee feared (detesting the vices of the invaded) assisted him in all attempts against them, hee himselfe contrarie to the religion hee profest (which how Idolatrous fouler it were, could not be but fearfull vnto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, and not by ignorance or education, a more foule and fearefull Monster than Darius, from whose tyrannie hee vaunted to haue deliuered so many Nations. Yea those that were dearest and nearest vnto him, began to be aſhamed of him, entreating each other with this, and the like scornfull discourse, That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example the Macedonians were in the end of so many traualles more impouerished in their vertues, than enriched by their victories; and that it was hard to judge whether the Conquerors, or the conquered were the baser slaues. Neither were these opinions so referred, but that the noise of them came to his eares. He therefore with great gifts sought to pacifie the better sort, and those of whose iudgements hee was most ious; and making it knowne to the Armie that Bessus had assumed the title of a King, and called himselfe Ataxerxes, and that hee had compounded a great Armie of the Bactrians, and other Nations, hee had arguments enough to perswade them to goe on, to the end that all alreadie gotten, might not with themselves (so farre engaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole Armie seemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much unlike the warfare of the French) hauing commanded euery mans fardells to be brought into the market place, hee together with his owne, caused all to bee consumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but haue proued most dangerous vnto him, seeing the common-Souldiers had more interest in these things, which they had bought with their painefull traualles, and with their blood; than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often obserued) his happie temeritie ouer-come all things. As hee was in his way, newes came to him that Satibarzanes, whom hee had established in his former gouernement ouer the Arrians, was reuolted, whereupon leauing the way of Bactria, hee fought him out, but the Rebelle hearing of his comming fled to Bessus with two thousand Horse. Hee then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire with the aduantage of a strong winde, wonne a passage ouer a high and vnaccessable Rock, which was defended against him with thirtene thousand foote. For the extremite of the flame and smoke forced them from the place, otherwise inuincible. I saw in the third ciuill Warre of France certaine caues in Langueoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rocks, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last by certaine bundells of strawler downe by

by an yron chaine, and a waightie itone in the middelt, those that defended it were so smothered, as they rendred themselves with their plate, monie, and other goods therein hidden. There were also, some three years before my arriual in Guisa, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horses, by the Countrie people, who did set the long drie-grasse on fire to the eastward of them, (the winde in those parts being alwaies East) so as notwithstanding their flying from the smoke, there was not any one that escaped. St. Iohn Barrenes also, with a hundred English, was in great danger of being lost at Margarita, in the West-Indies, by having the grasse fired behinde him, but the smoke being time-ly discovered, hee recovered the Sea-shore with the losse of sixteene of his men. I remember these things, but to give caution to those that shall in times to come invade any part of those Countreies, that they alwaies, before they passe into the Land, burne downe the grasse and fedge to the East of them; they may otherwise, without any other enemie than a handfull of straw set on fire, die the death of honnie-Bees, burnt out of the Hivie.

§. XVII.

A conspiracie against ALEXANDER. The death of PHILOTAS and PARMENIO.

ALEXANDER was after he parted hence no where resisted, till he came into Asia, to the East of Bactria, where the chiefe Prince of that Province, called Artaxanes, was a while defended against him, by the reuolt of Sartibarzanes, but in the end hee received the Inhabitantes to mercie. At this place his Armie was re-enforced with a new supply of fixe thousand and fixe hundred foote, and neare fixe hundred Horse, out of Greece, Thessalie, and other places. His journey out of Persia into these parts is very confusedly described. For hauing (as all his Historians tell vs) a determination to finde Bessus in Bactria, he leaues it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Hyrcania; from thence he wanders Northward towards the obscure Mardi, vpon the Caspian-Sea, and thence ouer the Mountaines Coronus into Asia, and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the treason of Dimmus brake out, of which Philotas the sonne of Parmenio was accused, as accessarie, if not principall. This Dimmus, hauing (I know not vpon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a yong-man whom he loued, into the same treason. The youth, although he was first bound by oath to secrecie, when he heard so foule a matter vttered, beganne to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to haue flaine him for securitie of his owne life. So contrained by feare, hee made shew as if hee had bene wonne by perswasion, and by seeming at length to like well of the businesse, hee was told more at large what they were, that had undertaken it. There were nine orten of them, all men of ranke; whose names Dimmus (to countenance the enterprise) reckoned vp to Nicomachus. Nicomachus had no sooner freed himselfe from the companie of this Traitor Dimmus, than he acquainted his owne brother Ceballinus with the whole Historie: whereupon it was agreed betweene them, that Ceballinus (who might with least suspicion) should goe to the Court and vtter all, and Philotas neuer brake with the King about the matter; but still excused himselfe to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldnesse bred suspicion, and caused Ceballinus to addresse himselfe to another, one Aetron, keeper of the Kings Armorie, who forth-with I thought him to Alexanders presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed betweene Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perswade himselfe that this concalement of the treason,

son argued his hand to haue bene in the businesse. Therefore when Dimmus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other question than this: Wherein haue I so offended thee, that thou shouldst thinke PHILOTAS more wortie to be King than I? Dimmus perceiuing, when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had lo wounded himselfe that hee liued no longer than to giue his last groane in the Kings presence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspicion which his silence might iustly breede. His answer was, That when the practise was reuealed vnto him by Nicomachus, he judging it to be but frivulous, did forbear to acquaint Alexander therewithall, vntill he might haue better information. This error of his, (if it were only an error) although Alexander, for the notorious cruelties of his Father Parmenio, of his brother Nicomachus lately dead, and of Philotas himselfe, had freely pardoned and giuen him his hand for assurance; yet by the insinuation of Craterus, hee againe swallowed his Princely promise, and made his enemies his Iudges: Curtius giues a note of Craterus in this businesse; How hee perswaded himselfe, that he could neuer finde a better occasion to oppress his priuate enemie, than by pretending pietie and dutie towards the King. Hercol a Poet of our owne hath giuen a note as much better as it is more generall in his Philotas.

See how these great men cloath their priuate hate,
In these faire colours of the publike good,
And to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection stood,
And arm'd with power and Princes jealousies,
Will put the least conceit of discontent
Into the greatest ranke of treacheries,
That no one action shall seeme innocent;
Yea valour, honour, bountie, shall be made
As accessaries vnto ends vnjust:
And euen the seruice of the State must lade
The needfull vnder taking with distrust,
So that base vileness, idle Luxurie,
Seeme faireer, than to doe worthily, &c.

Now although it were so that the King, following the aduise of Craterus, had refused the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very evening of the same night in which he was apprehended, he called him to a banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him beganne to binde him; he cried out vpon the King in these words: O ALEXANDER, the malice of mine-
40 Enemies hath surmounted thy mercie, and their hatred is farre more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were vtred against him by Alexander himselfe; (for the Kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason) and this was not the least (not the least offence, indeede, against the Kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote vnto him concerning the title giuen him by Iupiter Iamunus, He answered, That he could not but reioyce that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the Gods, and yet hee could not but withall grieve for those that should liue vnder such a one as would exceede the nature of man. This was (saith Alexander) a firme perswasion vnto me, that his heart was changed, and that hee held my glorie in despit. See what a strange monster
50 flatterie is that can perswade Kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those things in them which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude to heare the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in wilde garments, and bound like a Theefe; where hee heard himselfe, and his absent Father the greatest Captaine of the World, accused, his two other Brothers

hector and Ulysses having beene loit in the present Warre. Hee was so greatly oppressed with griefe as for a while he could vnder nothing but teares, and sorrow had lo waited his spirits as hee sunke vnder those that led him. In the end the King asked him in what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same where- in it had pleased the King to accuse him, which hee did to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might vnderstand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, perswading the assembly that hee diddaine the language of his owne Countre, and lo with-drawing himselfe, left him to his mercilesse enemies.

His proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, seeing the King who had so sharply inuaded against him, would not vouchsafe to heare his excuse. For, not his enemies only were imboldened thereby against him, but all the rest hauing discovered the Kings disposition and resolution, contended among themselves which of them should exceede in hatred towards him; Among many other arguments which he vied in his owne defence, this was not the weakest, That when Nicomachus desired to know of Demetrius what men of marke and power were his partners in the conspiracie (as seeming vnwilling to adventure himselfe with meane and base Companions) Demetrius named vnto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amynias, and some others, but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being commander of the Horse, would greatly haue valued the parties, and haue encouraged Nicomachus. Indee, as Philotas said well for himselfe, it is likely that Demetrius thereby the better to haue heartened Nicomachus, would haue named him, though hee had neuer dealt with him in any such practise. And for more certaine prooffe that he knew nothing of their intents, that practised against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, infort by torments or otherwise, that could accuse him, and it is true, that aduentic being seldome able to beare her owne burden, is for the most part found so malicious, as shee rather desires to draw others (not alwaies deserring it) into the same danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howsoeuer it were, to auoide the extremitie of reuilsse and vnaturall torments, deuised by his profest enemies Craterus, Ceneas, Ephesion, and others, Philotas accused his owne selfe; being perswaded that they would haue slaine him forthwith. But he failed euen in that miserable hope, and suffering all that could be laied on flesh and bloud, he was forit to deliuer, not what he knew, but whatsoeuer best pleased their eares, that were farre more mercilesse than death it selfe.

Dei. l. 2. c. 6.*

Of this kinde of iudiciall proceeding St. Augustine greatly complaineth as a matter to bee beualded, faith hee, with Fountaines of teares. Quid cum in sua causa quisq; torquetur: et cum queritur et non sit nocens cruciatur: et innocens luit pro inerto scelere certissimas pœnas: non quia illud commississe detegitur, sed quia non commisisse negatur; What shall we say to it, when one is put to torture in his owne cases, and tormented whilst yet it is in question whether he be guiltie; and being innocent suffers assured punishment for a fault of which there is no certaintie, not because he is knowne to haue committed the offence, but because other doe not know that he hath not committed it.

It had beene enough for Alexanders satisfaction if Philotas had been put to death without torment, the rest would not much haue grieved thereat, because he was greatly suspected. But Hemolus, who after ward conspired against him, made the Kings crueltye and delight in bloud the greatest moitie of his owne ill intent. Therefore, Seneca speaking of Alexander, faith thus: Cruditatis nimirum humanum modum est, indignum tam miti animo; serma ista rabies est sanguine gaudere et vincitibus; et adiectione homine in suaves animal transire; Crueltie is not a humane vice, it is unworthie of mankind a spirit. It is euen a beastly rage to delight in bloud and wounds, and casting away the nature of man to become a savage Monster.

For the conclusion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confession that Philotas made were to giue end to the torments which hee could not any longer indure, or that the same was true indeede; For (faith he) in this case, they that speake truly, or they that denie falsly, come to one and the same end. Now while while the Kings hands were yet wet in bloud, he commanded that Lynesestes, sonne-in-Law to Anipater, who had beene three yeares in prison, should bee slaine: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there were that were suspected, because they had followed Philotas, but when they had answered for themselves that they knew no way so direct to winne the Kings fauour, as by loving those whom the King fauoured; they were dismist. But Parmenio was yet living; Parmenio, who had serued with great fidelitie as well Philip of Macedon as the Kings Father, as himselfe; Parmenio that first opened the way into Asia; That had deprett Attalus the Kings enemy, that had alwaies, and in all hazards, the leading of the Kings Vant-guard, that was no lesse prudent in counsell, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloued of the men of Warre, and, to say the truth, hee that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glorie and fame hee had: That he might not therefore reuenge the death of his Sonne, though not vpon the King, (for it was vnlikely that he would haue dishonoured his fidelitie in his eld stage, hauing now liued threefore and ten yeares) yet vpon those that by the witchcraft of flatterie had posselt themselves of his affection; it was resolued that he should be dispatched. Polydamas was imploied in this businesse, a man whom of all other Parmenio trusted most, and loued best, who (to be short) finding him in Medas, and hauing Cleander and other Murderers with him, slew him walking in his Garden, while he was reading the Kings letters. Hic exitus PARMENIONIS fuit, militis domq; clarissimi; Multa sine Rege profecto, Res sine illo nihil magnæ rei gestæ; This was the end of PARMENIO (saith CURTIUS) who had performed many notable things without the King, but the King, without him, did neuer effect any thing worthe of praise.

§. XVIII.

How ALEXANDER subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people, How Bessus was deliuered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

When these things had end, Alexander went on with his Armie, and brought vnder his obedience the Arapsians or Euegitans; he made Amendes (Sometime Darius his Secretary) their Gouverneur; then he subdued the Arachians, and left Artaban to command ouer them. Here the Armie, sometimes led by Parmenio, findes him, consisting of twelue thousand Bactrians and Greekes, with whom he past through some colde regions with difficultie enough. At length hee came to the foote of the Mountaine Taurus towards the East, where hee built a Citie which hee honoured with his owne name, and peopled it with seuen thousand of his olde Macedons, worne with age and with traualles of the warre. The Arapsians, who since hee left them were reuolted, hee subdued againe by the industrie and valour of Caranus and Erigius. And now hee resolved to find out the new King Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his coming, prepares to passe ouer the great Riuer of Oxus which diuides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Gouverneur of Bactria abandoned by Bessus; The Macedonian Armie suffereth for want of Water, inso much as when they came to the Riuer of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately then Alexander had lost in any one battaile against the Persians. And it may well be; For (as Cicero did after obiect vnto him) he fought against weomen, not against men, and not against their persons but their shadowes. He found on the banks of this great Riuer no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boats, bridges, or rafts, but was forit to fow together the Hides that couered his carriages, and stuffe them with straw, and on them in fixe daies to passe ouer his Armie; which Bessus might easily haue distreit, if he had dared but to beholde the Macedonian Armie after- farre.

farre-off. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the bankes of Tigris, and other passages, and yet now, when this traitorous slaue had styled himselfe a King, hee durst not performe any thing worthe of assaue. And therefore those that were nere it into him, and whom he most trusted, to wit Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Armie, moued both by the care of their owne safetie, and by the memorie of Bessus his Treason and crueltie against Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chaine closed about his neck like a maffie Dogge, and so was dragged along to be presented to his enemye.

In the meane while Alexander was arrived at a certaine Towne inhabited with Greekes of Mileum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before hee returned out of Greece, whose illnes had well-nere forgotten their Countrey language. These molt cruilly (after they had receiued him with great ioy) he put to the sword, and destroyed their Citie. At this place he receiued Bessus, and, hauing rewarded Spitamenes with the reft that deliuered him, he gaue the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his brother, to be tormented.

But while he now thought himselfe secure, some twentie thousand Mountaines assailed his Camp; in repelling whom he receiued a flou in the leg, the arrow-head sticking in the flesh, so as he was carried in a Horse-Lytter, sometime by the horse-men, sometime by the foote.

Soone after he came vnto Marsacanda, which Petrus Peroninus takes to be Samarcanda, the regall Citie of the great Tamerlane. It had in compasse three score and ten furlongs (Curius saith.) Here he receiued the Embassadors of the Scythians (called Assians) who offered to serue him.

The Bactrians are shortly againe with the Scythians stirred to Rebellion by the same Spitamenes and Catanes who had lately deliuered into his hands the Traitor Bessus. Many Cities were resolutely defended against him all which, after victorie, hee defaced and rased, killing all therein. At one of these hee receiued a blow on the neck which strucke him to the ground, and much disabled him for many daies after. In the meane while Spitamenes had recovered Marsacanda, against whom he employed Menedemus with three thousand foote and eight hundred horse.

In the heate of these tumults Alexander marched (on if we may beleue Curius and others) till he came to the River of Tanais; vpon whose banke he built another Alexandria three score furlongs in compasse which he beautified with houses within fourteen daies after the walls built. The building of this Citie is said to haue bin occasion of war betweene him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perswading himselfe, that this new Towne was fortified of purpose to keepe him vnder. I doe not well vnderstand, why the Scythians, offering warre in such terrible manner that Alexander was iudged by his owne Souldiers to counterfeit sicknesse for verie feare, should neuerthelesse make suit for peace: neither finde I the reason why Alexander (not intending the conquest of those Northerne deserts, but only the defense of his owne banke) should refuse to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further than they should agree to suffer him. Yet heretofore is made a great matter; and a victorie described; in pursuit of which the Macedons ranne beyond the boundes and monuments of Bacchus his expedition.

The truth is, That Curius and Tregus haue greatly misaken this River which they call Tanais. For it was the River of Iaxartes, that runnes betwene Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander past ouer, while Menedemus was employed in the recovery of Samarcanda: But Tanais which diuides Asia from Europe is nere two thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria or Sogdiana, and the way desert and vnkowne. So that Alexander had (besides Iaxartes) the great River of Volga and many others to swimme ouer, ere he could recouer Tanais: which (from the place where he was) he could hardly haue discovered with the Armie that followed him, if he had implied all the time that he liued in Asia in that traualle.

Where

Wherefore it is enough to beleuee, that the Asiaticke Scythians, makinge some offer to disturbe the erection of this new Citie, which was like to giue some hindrance to their excursions, were driuen away by the Macedons; and being naked of defense Armes, easily chased some tenne or twelue miles; which is the substance of Curius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his iourne; like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life time he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken God) went not verie farre into that wast Countrey, where he could finde nothing but trees and stones, nor other buisnes than to set vp a monument.

Threecore of the Macedons are said to haue beene slaine, and one thousand one hundred hurt in this fight, which might easily be, in passing a great Ruer, defended against them by good Archers. Of Scythian Armes, one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Campe, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeed it is hardly possible, to set downe the numbers of such as perished in battell: yet Cæsar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors hath beene inquisiuitive into the greatnesse of their owne successe, that writers haue beene able to deliuer such particulars by credible reporte, I hold it not vnlawfull to set downe what we finde; especially when it serues to giue light to the buisnes in hand. The small number which the Macedons lost; the omission of the number which they flew (a thing not vsuall in Curius, who forbears nothing that may set out the greatnesse of Alexander) and the little bootie that was gotten; doe make it probable, that this warre was no better than the repulsion of a few routing Partians (the like being yearly performed by the Assians, without any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was affuring himselfe of those Scythians bordering vpon Iaxartes, he receiued the ill newes that Menedemus was slaine by Spitamenes, the Armie (by him led) broken, and the greatst numbers slaine, to wit, two thousand foote; and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appease the rebellion and to take reuenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander kills, burnes, and laies wast all before him; not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leauing a new Governour in that Prouince.

To repaire this losse he receiued a great supply of nineteene thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lydia, and Syria; with all which, and the old Armie, hee retournes towards the South, and passeth the Ruer of Oxus; on the South-side whereof hee built fixe Townes neare each other for mutual succour. But hee finds a new starvp-Rebell, called Arimazes, (a Sogdian) followed with thirtie thousand Souldiers that defended against him a strong peece of ground on the top of a high Hill, whom when Alexander had fought in vaine to winne by faire words, hee made choise of three hundred yong-men, and promised ten talents to the first, nine to the second, and so in proportion to the rest, that could finde a way to creape vpon the top thereof. This they performed with the losse of some two and thirtie of their men, and then made a figure to Alexander, that they had performed his commandement. Hereupon he sent one Caphes to perswade Arimazes to yeeld the place; who, being shewed by Caphes that the Armie of Macedon was already mounted vpon yedled steeles to Alexanders mercie, and was (with all his kindred) scorched and crucified to death; which punishment they well deserved for neglecting to keepe good watch in so dangerous a time. For the place, as seemes by the description, might easily haue beene defended against all the Armies of the World. But what strength can doe? Mans wit, being the most forcible engine, hath often effected; Of which I will giue you an example in a place of our owne.

The Iland of Sarke, joyning to Garnsey and of that govtinment, was in Queene Marius time surprised by the French, and could neuer haue beene recovered againe by strong hand, hauing cattle and corne enough vpon the place to feede so many men as will serue to defend it, and being euery way so inaccessible that it might be held held against the Great Turke. Yet by the industrie of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this fort regained. Her anchored in the roade with one ship of small burden, and, pretending the death of his Marchant, besought the French, being some thirtie in number, that they might burie their Marchant in hallowed ground, and in the Chappell of that Isle; offering a present to the French of such commodities as they had aboard; whereto (with condition that they should not come ashore with any weapon, no not so much as with a knife) the French-men yielded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their boat, not filled with a dead carcase, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebusses; The French received them at their landing; and searching euery of them so narrowly as they could not hide a pen-knife, gaue them leaue to draw their Coffin vpon the Rocks with great difficultie; some part of the French tooke the Flemish boat and rowed aboard their ship, to fetch the commodities promised, and what else they pleased, but being entred they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, shut the dore to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin set vpon the French; they ranne to the Cliffe and cie to their companie aboard the Fleming to come to their succour, but finding the boat charged with Flemings yielded themselves and the place. Thus a Foxe-taile doth sometimes helpe well to pcece out the Lions-skinne, that else would be too short.

§. XIX.

How ALEXANDER slew his owne friends.

AFTER the Sagalian and Scythian Warres, wee reade of Alexander's killing of a Lion, and other friuolous warres, and that he committed the gouernment of Marasanda, and the Countrie about it, to Clytus, and how he slew him soone after, for valuing the vertue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the sonne, or rather because hee objected to the King the death of Parmenio, and derided the Oracle of Hammon: for therein he toucht him to the quick, the same being deliuered in publike and at a drunken banquet. Clytus, in deede, had deserved as much at the Kings hands, as any man liuing had done, and had in particular saued his life, which the King well remembered when he came to himselfe, and when it was too late. Yet to say the truth, Clytus his insolencie was intolerable. As he in his cups forgot whom hee offended, so the King in his (for neither of them were themselves) forgot whom he went about to slay, for the griefe wherof he tare his owne face and sorrowed so inordinately, as, but for the perswasions of Callisthenes, it is thought he would haue slaine himselfe.

Wine begat furie, furie matter of repentance: but preceeding mischiefes are not amended by succeeding bewallings. Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & deiecit obstantem malis conatus uerecundiam remouet; ubi posset animam nimis vis uis, quicquid mali latebat, emergit: non facit ebrietas uirtus, sed proterbit. Drunkennesse both kindles and laies open euery vice; it remoues out of the way that shame which giues impediment vnto bad attempts; where wine gets the mastery, all the ill that before lay hidden breakes out: drunkennesse in deede rather discovers vices, than makes them.

Soone after this, Spitamenes, who slew Bessus, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dabians also seized vpon his fellow-conspirator Dalaphernes, and deliuered him vp. So Alexander being now freed from all these pettie-rebels, disposed of the Prouinces which hee past ouer, and went on with his Armie into Gissazet, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storme, as hee lost in one Tempest a thousand of his traine. From hence hee invaded the Sacans, and destroyed their Countrie. Then came he into the Territorie of Cobanites who submitted himselfe vnto him, feasted him greatly, and presented him with thirtie thirtie beautifull Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterward his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians did dained, yet none of them durst vie any freedom of speech after Clytus his death. From hence hee directed his course towards India, hauing so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twentie thousand armed men.

In the meane while hee would needs bee honoured as a God: whereto that hee might allure the Macedonians, hee imploied two pernicious Parafites, Hegus and Cleus, whom Callisthenes opposed: For, among many other honest arguments vied to the assembly, he told Cleus, That he thought that Alexander would diddaine the gift of God-head from his Vassalls; That the opinion of Sanctitie, though it did sometime follow the death of those who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it neuer accompanied any one as yet liuing in the World. He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a banquet, and vpon drinke, (for this matter was propounded by Cleus at a caroling feast) but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they liued, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbered among the Gods. Alexander stood behinde a partition and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunitie to bee reuenged on Callisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a louer of the Kings honour, was yet soone after tormented to death, not for that hee had betrayed the King to others, but because hee neuer would condescend to betray the King to himselfe, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracie against the King made by one Hermolus and others (which they confest) he caused Callisthenes without confession, accusation, or triall, to be torne asunder vpon the rack: This deede, vnworthie of a King, Seneca thus censureth. Hoc est ALEXANDRI crimen aeternum, quod nulli uirtus, nulla bellorum felicitas redimet: Nam quoniam quis dixerit, Occidit Persarum multamilla: opponitur, & CALLISTHENEM: Quotiens dictum erit, Occidit DARIUM: opponitur, & CALLISTHENEM. Quotiens dictum erit Omnia Oceano tenas: erit, ipsum quoque tentauit nona clauibus, & Imperium ex angulo Thracie: off. ad Orientis terminos protulit: dicitur, sed CALLISTHENEM occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Ducum Regumq. exempla transierit, ex his quae fecit nihil tam magnum erit quam scelus CALLISTHENES; This is the eternall crime of ALEXANDER, which no vertuous felicitie of his in Warre shall ever be able to redeeme. For as often as any man shall say, He slew many thousand Persians; it shall be replied, Hee did so, and he slew CALLISTHENES: When it shall be said, He slew DARIUS; it shall be replied, and CALLISTHENES: When it shall be said, hee wonne all as farre as to the very Ocean, thereon also hee aduentured vnusall Nauies; and extended his Empire from a corner of Thracie, to the utmost bounds of the Orient, it shall be said with all, But hee killed CALLISTHENES. Let him haue out-gone all the ancient examples of Captaines and Kings; none of all his acts makes so much to his glorie, as CALLISTHENES to his reproach.

§. XX.

Of ALEXANDERS iourne into India. The battaile betwene him and PORVS.

WITH the Armie before remembred, of one hundred and twentie thousand foot and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselves vnto him, hee entertained louingly, the rest hee contrained; killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they resisted. Hee then came before Nisa built by Bacchus, which after a few daies was rendred vnto him. From thence hee removed to a hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom hee made feasts for ten daies together. Now when hee had drunken his fill, hee went on towards Dedala, and thence to Acadera,

Countries

Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants, by reason whereof, victualls raising, he diuides his Armie: Ptoleme led one part, Cenon another, and himselfe the rest. They take many Townes, whereof that of greatest fame was Mazage, which had in it three hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yielded vnto him by Cleophe the Queene, to whom againe he restored it at the siege of this Citie he receiued a wound in the legge. After this, Nera was taken by Polyperchon, and a Rock of great strength by himselfe: he wanne also a passage vpon one Eryx, who was slaine by his companie, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the summe of Alexanders doings in those parts, before such time as hee arrived at the Riuer of Indus. Comming to Indus hee found there Ephesion, who (being sent before) had prepared boates for the transportation of his Armie, and ere Alexanders arrival had perswaded Omphis King of that part of the Countrey to submit himselfe to this great Conquerour. Therefore, soone vpon Alexanders comming, Omphis presented himselfe with all the strength of his Countrey, and fixe and fiftie Elephants, vnto him; offering him his seruice and assilance. Hee made Alexander know that hee was an Enemy to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abisares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this diuision to make his owne victorie by farre the more easie. Hee presented Alexander with a Crowne of gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and withall fourescore talents of siluer coine, which Alexander not only refused, but to shew that he was courteous of glorie, not of gold, hee gaue Omphis a thousand talents of his owne treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abisares, hauing heard that Alexander had receiued his enemy Omphis into his protection, refused to make his owne peace also: For, knowing that his owne strength did but equal that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference betweene them, than that which the chance of Warre gaue, hee thought it an ill match when Alexander, who had already beaten vnder foote all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himselfe a Partie and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander now now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a commandement, that he should attend him at the border of his Kingdome, there to doe him homage. But from Porus hee receiued this manly answer; That hee would satisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement hee was resolved to take counsell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolves to passe ouer the Riuer Hydaspes, and to find Porus at his owne home. Porus attend him on the farther bankes with thirtie thousand foot, fourescore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariotes, and a great troupe of Horle. If Porus had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had surely staied somewhat longer ere he had seene India. The Riuer was foure furlong broad, which makes halfe a mile, and withall deepe and swift. It had in it many Ilands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacite. Alexander sent Ptoleme vnto the Riuer with a great part of the Armie, throwing the rest from the view of Porus: who by this deuice being drawne from his first incamping, sets himselfe downe opposite to Ptoleme, supposing that the whole Armie of Macedon meant to force their passage there. In the meane while Alexander recouers the farther shore without resistance. He orders his troups and aduanceth towards Porus, who at first rather beleeueth that Abisares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had bene come ouer Hydaspes to his aide, than that Alexander had past it. But he finds it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hages with foure thousand horle, and a hundred armed waggons to entertaine him. Each waggon had in it foure to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little vse: for there had talken so much raine, and thereby the fields were so moistned, as the horses could hardly trot. The Seythians and Debians had the Vanguard, who so galled these Indians as they brake their reines, & other furniture, overturning the wagons & those in them. Perdice also gaue vpon the Indian horse-men, and the one & the other were for to recoile. Porus moues forward with grosse of his Armie Armie, that those of his Vanguard scattered might recover his Reare: Alexander being followed with Ephesion, Ptoleme, and Perdiccas, tooke on him to charge the Indian horse-men on the left wing, commanding Cenon or Cenon to invade the right; Antigonus and Leonatus, hee directed to breake vpon Porus his battaile of horle, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himselfe being carried vpon one of them of the greatest stature. By these beafts the Macedonian foot were most offended; but the Archers and Darters being well guarded with the long and strong Pikes of the Macedons, so galled them, as being enraged, they turned head and ranne ouer the foote that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight by the aduantage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulnesse of the Macedonian Captaines, the victorie fell to Alexander, who also farre exceeded Porus in might: for besides the Macedonians and other Easterne and Northern Nations, Porus was assailed by his owne Confederate and Countrey people. Yet for his owne person he neuer gaue ground otherwise than with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Armie, he became a prisoner to the Conqueror, from whom againe he receiued his estate with a great enariement.

§. XXI.

How ALEXANDER finished his expedition, and returned out of India.

Forbeare to trouble my selfe and others with a fruitles discourse of Serpents, Apes, and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their traualles: or of those petty Wars which Alexander made betwene the overthrow of Porus, and his sailing downe the Riuer of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better knowne vnto vs in this Age, by means of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no sort be perswaded to beleue, till our owne experience had taught vs, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seene betwene London and Stanes.

Our great trauelier Mandevile who died in the yeare 1372. and had seene so much of the World, and of the East India, wee accompted the greatest fabler of the World; yet had he an other reputation among other Nations, as well able to iudge as we. Witnesse the Monument made of him in the Couent of the Friars Guillem in Liege, where the religious of that place keepe some things of his, Come par honorable memoire de son Excellence; For an honorable memoire of his Excellence, saith Guichardine.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Riuers of Hydaspes, Zaradrus, Acetes, and the rest, fall into the maine streame, are now possesed by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamierlane, who commands all that tract betwene Persia and India towards the West, as also a great extent of Countrey towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a ship of London, suffered shipwrack in the yeare 1609. and some of the companie trauielled our Land till they came to Agra, the same great Citie (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Tagra, being named of old Dionysopolis.

Phylotratius in the life of Apollonius Tyanus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells vs that those two great Captaines (whom Alexander sought by all means to out-fame) when they deuoured to subiect vnto them the Oxydraces, a people inhabiting betwene the Riuers of Hyphes and Ganges, they were beaten from the assault of their Cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be vnderstood by the great Ordinance that those people had then in vse. For it is now certainly knowne, that the great Kings of the vttermost East, haue had the vle of the Cannon, many hundreds of yeares since, and euen since their first civillie and greatnesse, which was long before Alexanders time. But Alexander persist not so farre into the East. It sufficed, that having already over-wearied his Armie hee discovered the rest of India by land. The Indian Kings whom hee had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the River of Ganges, was the powerfullst King of all those Regions: and that hee was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twentie thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed than euer to proceede in this discoverie and conquest, yet all the art hee had could not perswade the Souldiers to wander over those great desarts beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible unto them than the greatest Armie that the East could gather. Yet at the last consented they were, after many perswasive Orationes, to follow him towards the South, to discover such part of the Ocean Sea, as was nearer at hand, whereunto the River of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would bee no otherwise, devised a prettie trick, where-with hee hoped to beguile posteritie, and make himselfe seeme greater than hee was. Hee enlarged his Campe, made greater trenches, greater cabins for the Souldiers, greater Horse-stalls, and higher mangers than his Hories could feede in. Hee caused all furniture of Men and Hories to bee made larger than would serve for use; and scattered these Armour and Bridles about his Campe, to be kept as reliques, and wondered at by the fauages. Proportionable to these hee raised up twelve great Altars to be the monument of his journeyes end. This was a ready way to encrease the fame of his bigneffe; to his greatnesse it could adoe nothing save a suspicion that it was lesse than is thought, seeing hee shrowd so carnically to make it thought more than it was.

This done, hee returned againe to the bankes of Acetes, and there determined to set up his fleet where Acetes and Hydaspes encounter, where to testifie by a furment, how farre hee had past towards the East, hee built by those Rivers two Cities: the one hee called Nikes, and the other Bucephalon, after the name of his bequied Horse Bucephalus. There againe hee received a fourth supply of fixe thousand Indian Horse-men, seven thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylon two and twentie thousand Armour, garnished with silver and gold, which hee distributed among his Souldiers. A bout these Rivers hee wanne many Townes, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted. It is then written of him, that assaulting a Citie of the Oxadracans, hee leapt from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Bevis of Southampton, frivolous and incredible. Finally, hee past downe the River with his fleet, at which time also the newes came unto him of a rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arrivall of an hundred Embassadors from a King of India, who submitted himselfe unto him. Hee feasted these Embassadors vpon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuositie that could be devised, who soone after their dispatch returned againe with a present of three hundred Horie, one hundred and thirtie Wagons, and to each foure Hories, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainments ended, hee sailes towards the South, passeth through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld unto him either quietly or compelled by force: among these hee builded another Alexandria. Of many places which hee tooke in this passage, Samus was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poisoned Swords, with one of which Ptolomee (afterward King of Agypt) was wounded, and cured by an herbe which Alexander dreamt that hee had seen in the mouth of a Serpent.

When hee came neare the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a suddaine shuffled one vpon another by the Floud, so on the Ebbe they were left on the drie ground, and on the sandie bankes of the River, where-with the Macedonians were much amazed, but after hee had a few daies observed well the course of the Sea, hee past out of the rivers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned: and the better to informe himselfe, hee sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discover the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arianus in the beginning of his sixt Booke hath written this passage downe the River of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vessells, in which hee transported his Armie, the Commanders that were led therein, and other the marvellous prouisions made.

Neare the out-lets of this River hee spent some part of the Winter, and in eightene daies march from thence recovered Gedrosia, in which passage his Armie suffered such miserie for want of foodes, that of a hundred and twentie thousand foot, and twelue thousand horie, which hee carried into India, not the fourth part returned alive.

§. XXII.

Of ALEXANDERS Riot, Crueltie, and death.

From Gedrosia Alexander led his Armie into Carmania, and so drawing neare to Persia, hee gaue himselfe wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice bee hateful enough in it selfe, yet it alwaies inflamed this King to Crueltie. For (saith Cicero) the Hang-man followed the fest, for Aspastes one of his Prouinciall Governours hee commanded to be slaine, so as neither did the excesse of voluptuousnesse qualifye his crueltie, nor his crueltie binder in ought his voluptuousnesse.

While hee refreshed his Armie in these parts, a new supply of fixe thousand foote and a thousand horie, was brought him by Cleander, and his followers, that had been imploied in the killing of Parmenio. Against these Murderers great complaint was made, by the Deputies of the Prouinces in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outrageous, as Alexander was perswaded, that, had they not altogether despaired of his returne out of India, they durst not haue committed them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembering the vertue of him whom they had slaughtered. The end was, That Cleander and the other chiefe, with fixe hundred Souldiers by them imploied, were deliuered ouer to the Hang-man: euery one rejoycing that the Irc of the King was at last executed on the misdoers of his Irc.

Nearchus and Onesicritus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an land rich in gold, and of other strange things; whereupon they were commanded to make some farther discoverie: which done, that they should enter the mouth of Euphrates, and finde the King at Babylon.

As hee drew neare to Babylon hee visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Pasargada, now called Chelquera: where hee was presented with many rich gifts by Oristes, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagoas an Eunuch in especiall fauour with the King, was neglected, hee not only practised certaine loose fellows to witness against Oristes, that hee had robbed Cyrus Tomb, for which hee was condemned to die; but hee assisted the Hang-man with his owne handes in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phradates to be slaine, suspecting his greatnesse. Cepes (saith Cicero) esse princeps ad repraesentanda supplicia, item ad deteriora crudelia: He became headlongly to shed blood, and to beleue false reports. It is true, that hee took a way to make all men wearie of his gouernement, seeing crueltie is more rare than all the adventures that can be made against it.

At this time it is said that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himselfe, when hee had lived threescore and thirteene yeares. Whether herein hee followed the custome of his Countrey, being an Indian, Or sought to prevent the griefe and incommodie of cider age, it is vncertaine; but in this the Historians agree, that fore-seeing and fore-throwing Alexanders death, he promised to meete him shortly after at Babylon.

From Pasargada hee came to Susa, where hee married Statira, Darius his eldest Daughter, giuing her younger sister to his beloued Epheslion, and fourescore other Persian Ladies to his Captaines. There were fixe thousand guests invited to the feast, to each of which hee gaue a cup of gold. Here there came vnto him three thousand yong souldiers out of his conquered Prouinces, wherethe the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon hauing lawfully consumed the monies in his keeping, got him going with fixe thousand talents, and fixe thousand hired Souldiers, but he was rejected in Greece, and there slaine. Alexander greatly rejoyced at the fidelitie of the Greekes, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not flurrie yet hee sent commandement that they should againe receiue their banished men, wherunto (hearefull of his indignation) all submitted themselves, (except the Athenians, though they refused that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this there followed a marauilous discontentment in his Armie, because hee had resolved to send into Macedon all those old Souldiers which could no longer endure the trauell of Warre, and to keepe the rest in Asia. Hee had many Orations to fasshion them, but it was in vaine during the tempest of this time. But afterward, as Whales are drawne to the Land with a twine duced, when they haue tumbled a while, so are the vnconsiderate multitude easily conducted when their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licenced to depart, hee sent Craterus, to whom hee gaue the Lieutenantship of Macedon, Thessalie, and Thrace, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greekes in his absence, discharged the trait committed vnto him with great fidelitie, and sent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainly, if Alexander had not taken counsell of his cups, hee would haue cault some better colour on this alteration, and giuen Antipater a stronger reason for his remouee, than to haue employed him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the warre being now at an end. For Antipater saw nothing in this remouee, but the Kings disposition to send him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this Antipater, the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though jealous, doe not stand in doubt of euery man ill-affected though valiant; but there is a kinde of Kingly courage, compounded of hardinesse and vnderstanding, which is many times so fearefull vnto them, as they take leaue both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After hee had sent for Antipater, hee made a iourne into Media to settle things there; where Epheslion, whom hee fauoured most of all men, dies. The King according to the greatnesse of his loue, laments his losse; hangs his Philition; and bestowes vpon his Monument twelue thousand talents: After which hee returns to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but sent; and not to excuse himselfe, but to free himselfe. For if we beleue Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gaine-say) Antipater by his Sonnes, Cassander, Philip, and Isidra, who waited on Alexanders cup, gaue him poison, Thessalus (who was of the conspiracie) hauing invited him to a drinking feast of purpose. For after hee had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drinke stronger than Hercules himselfe, hee quitted the World within a few daies.

Certainely the Princes of the World haue seldom found good by making their ministers ouer-great, and thereby suspitious to themselves. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelitie to bee a debt, but is perswaded that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassalls, will neuer please himselfe with the price giuen. The only reparation, indeed, that strengthens it, is the goodnesse and vertue of the Prince, and his liberalitie makes it more diligent; so as proportion and distance be obserued. It may be that Antipater hauing commanded two or three Kingdomes twelue yeares, knew not now how to play any other part; no more than Cesar did, after hee had so long a time gouerned the Gauls, where hee utterly forgot the art of obedience. A most cruell and and vngratefull traitor Antipater was, if Curtius doe not belie him: For though hee feared some ill measure vpon his remouee (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Cassiphenes, hauing beene so lately acted) yet hee knew nothing to the contrarie, but that the King had resolved to haue giuen him some other great gouernement in Asia: the old Souldiers thence returned, hauing perchance desired to be gouerned by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

§. XXIII.

Of ALEXANDERS Person and qualities.

OWsoever it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot bee excused, no more than his vanitie to be esteemed the sonne of Iupiter, with his excellie delight in drinke and drunkenesse, which others make the cause of his feuer and death. In that hee lamented his want of enterprising, and grieved to consider what hee should doe when hee had conquered the World, Augustus Caesar found iust cause to deride him, as if the well gouerning of so many Nations and Kingdomes, as hee had alreadye conquered, could not haue offered him matter more than abundant, to busie his braines withall. That he was both learned and a louer of learning, it cannot be doubted. St. Francis Bacon, in his first booke of the aduancement of learning, hath proued it sufficiently. His liberalitie I know not how to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is said, That when he gaue a whole Citie to one of his Seruants, He, to whom it was giuen, did out of modestie refuse it, as disproportionable to his fortune: to whom Alexander replied, That hee did not enquire what became him to accept. But the King to giue: of which SENECA; Animo sa vox videtur & regia, cum sit iustissima. Libet enim persequi quicquam deest. Refert quid, cui, quando, quare, ubi, &c. sine quibus fasti ratio non consistit; habetur personarum & dignitatum proportio, &c. cum sit vniuersi, virtutis &c. ut, &c. que peccat quod excedit, quam quod deficit; It seems a braue and royall speech, & thereas indeede it is very foolish. For nothing simply considered by it selfe becommes a man. We must regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which considerations no sike can be approached. Let honours bee proportioned vnto the persons: for whereas vertue is euery limited by measure, the excesse is as faultie as the defect.

For his Person, it is very apparant, That he was as valiant as any man, a disposition taken by it selfe, not much to be admired; For I am resolved that hee had ten thousand in his Armie as daring as himselfe. Surely, if aduenturous natures were to be commended simply, we should confound that vertue with the hardinesse of Thucies, Ruffians, and mastie Dogges. For certainly it is no way praise-worthy but in daring good things, and in the performance of those lawfull enterprises, in which we are employed for the seruice of our Kings and Common-weales.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other Troublers of the World, who haue bought their glorie with so great destruction, and effusion of blood, I thinke him farre inferior to Cesar, and many other that liued after him, seeing hee neuer undertooke any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted, nor was euer encountered with any Armie of which hee had not a most marring aduantage, both of weapons and of Commanders, euery one of his Fathers old Captaines by farre exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seemeth, Fortune and Destinies (if we may vse those termes) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his owne, both heapes of Men, that willingly offered their necks to the voke, and Kingdomes that invited and called in their owne Conquerours. For conclusion, we will agree with Seneca who speaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Sonne, giues this iudgement of them. Quod non minores fuisse pestes mortalium quam inundatio, qua pluvialis omne perisum est, quam conflagratio, qua magna pars animantium excarnit; That they were no lesse plagues to mankind, than an ouer-flow of waters, drowning all the land, or some burning droughts, whereby a great part of liuing creatures is scorched up.

CHAP. III.

The raigne of ARIDEVS.

§. I.

Of the question about succession to ALEXANDER.

THE death of Alexander left his Armie (as Demades the Athenian then compared) in such case, as that monstrous Giant Polyphemus, hauing lost his only eye. For, that which is reported in tables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance vncertaine, and harmefull chiefly to themselves. The causes wherof (vnder the diuine ordinance) were, partly the vncertainetie of Title to succession in the Kingdome of Macedonia, partly the suborne pride of Alexander himselfe, who thinking none worthie to be his Heire, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leauing euery one to his owne fortune: but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals; a lesson soone taught vnto spirits reflecting vpon their owne worth, when the reuerence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly bene shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) gouerning in Macedonia as Protector, assumed vnto himselfe the Kingdome, not rendering it vnto Amyntas, (the Sonne of his elder brother Perdiccas) when he grew to mans estate; but only bestowing vpon him in marriage a Daughter of his owne: by which bond and much more by his proper strength he assured the Crowne vnto himselfe: Amyntas neuer attempting ought against Philip, though (with price of his life) he did against Alexander in the beginning of his raigne. Wherefore Eurydice, the sole issue of his marriage, ought in reason to haue bene acknowledged Queene after Alexander; as hauing better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they liued, vnlesse (peraduenture) some Law of that Nation forbad the raigne of women. But the excellent vertue of those two Princes had vtterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming for their owne bodies: and so great were their conquests, that Macedonia it selfe was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deferring to be laied in ballance against the demand of their posteritie, had they left any able to make challenge of the Roiall seate.

Alexander hauing taken many wiues had issue by none of the principall of them. Roxane the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian had borne vnto him a young Sonne; and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more solemnely married) was left by him great with child. But the baseness of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleaged in Barre of the Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) haue wrought out their owne ends, vnder the name of Alexanders children.

Cleopatra

Cleopatra the sister of Alexander, widow to the King of Epirus, and Aridaeus his half brother (sonne to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Ladie Eurydice before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may giue suspition, that either Law or Custome had made that sexe vacapable of the Soueraignetie: Aridaeus (besides his ballardie) was neither for person nor qualitie fit to rule as King; yet vpon him the election fell, but slowly and (as happeneth often) for lack of a better: when the Counsaillors hauing ouer-laboured their disagreeing wits in deuiling what was best, were content for very wearie-ness to take what came next to hand.

10 Ptolomeus (soone after King of Egypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the halfe-Persian broode, King Alexander's children, was of opinion, that the rule of all should bee giuen to the Captaines, that going for law which by the greater part of them should be decreed: so farre was hee from acknowledging any one as true Heire to the Crowne.

This Ptolomeus was called the sonne of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who hauing vied the companie of Arsinoe Ptolomeus mother, deliuered her in marriage to Lagus being great with child. Therefore, whether it were so, that he hoped well to worke his owne fortune out of those dilutions, which are incident vnto the consultations of many ambitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeme their quiet with subiection to one, deferring regard by his blood, and trust for his euery carriage; or whether hee desired only to get a share to himselfe, which could not haue come to passe had all bene giuen to one: plaine enough it is, that hee thought not on preferring Aridaeus before himselfe; and therefore gaue such counsaile as fitted his owne and other mens purposes. Yea, this deuce of his tooke place in deede, though not in forme as hee had propounded it: For, it was in effect all one, to haue assembled at Alexanders empty chaire, as Ptolomeus had conceived the forme of their consultations, or to set in the chaire such a King as Aridaeus, no wiser then the chaire it selfe. Also the controuersies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captaines; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puissance.

30 But as these counterfait shewes of dissembling aspirers, doe often take check by the plaine dealing of them, who dare to goe more directly to worke: so was it like to haue fared with Ptolomeus and the rest, when Aristonius, an other of the Captaines, interpreted the wordes of Alexander, (saying, These hee left his Kingdome to doe withall, as designing Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) hee deliuered his ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should be disposer of his owne purchases; and those tokens of Alexanders purpose appeared plaine enough, so long as no man would interpose an other contradiction: euery one being vncertaine how the secret affections of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their lone, or because they would not be of the latest, urged Perdiccas to take 40 vpon him the estate Roiall. He was no stranger to the Roiall blood; yet his birth gaue him not such reputation, as the great fauour of his dead King, with whom hee had bene very inward, and that especially since the death of Epephion (a powerfull Minion) into whose place hee was chosen. For his owne worth hee might well be commended, as a good man of Warre, and one that had giuen much proofe of his private valour. But very furly he was: which qualitie (joynd with good fortune) carried a shew of Majestie: being checkt with misaduenture, it was called by a true name Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the present businesse a foolish orer-weening did him as great harme, as it had bene great happinesse to haue succeeded Alexander. For not content to haue the 50 acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the sentence of Aristonius, he would needs counterfait modellie; thinking that euery one of the Princes would haue intreated him to take the waightie burden of an Empire, which would be the lesse enuious the more solemnitie he vied in the acceptance. It is truly said, He that faimeth himselfe a sheepe may chance to be eaten by a Wolfe. Melager, (a man by nature en-vious; uous, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas tooke aduantage of his irrelouche behaviour, and very bitterly mouged against him. In conclusion he pronounced, that whosoeuer was Heire to the Crowne, the Souldiers ought to be Heires to the treasure; and therefore he invited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Capitaines were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to haue brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedie of spoile thronged about Meleager.

§. II.

*The election of ARIDAVS, with the troubles there-about arising;
the first diuision of the Empire.*

DVing this vp-rore, mention was made of Aridaus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, vntill at last it grew to the voice of the Armie. Meleager hauing with-drawne himselfe tumultuously from the companie of the Lords, was glad of to haue an occasion to make himselfe great: therefore he produced Aridaus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, inuecting him in Alexanders Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vaine: for they could not resolute what course to follow, rejecting this. Only Pythion, a hot-headed-man, tooke vpon him to proclaim the Sonne of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsaile which Perdiccas at first had giuen, appointing Perdiccas and Leontatus his Protectors. But this child was not yet borne, which made that attempt of Pythion vaine. Finally, Perdiccas with lixe hundred men, and Ptolomie with the Kings Pages tooke vpon them to defend the place where Alexanders bodie lay: but the Armie conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whither he listed, easily brake in vpon them, and inforced them to accept Aridaus for their Soueraigne Lord. Then by the intercession of the ancient Capitaines, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leontatus who was of the Roiall blood, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horse, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobilitie. Perdiccas abode in the Citie (but standing vpon his guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunitie of any commotion, that should happen among the infanterie. The King (who was gouerned by Meleager) commanded or gaue leaue to haue Perdiccas made away; which attempt succeeded ill being neither secretly carried, nor committed to sure executioners. Their coming was not unexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with such grauitie, that they departed honestlier than they came; being forie of their bad enterprise. Vpon the newes of this attempt the campe was in an vp-rore, which the King seeking to pacifie wanted authoritie, as hauing newly got the Crowne by them, and holding it by their courtlesie. The matter it selfe afforded no good excuses, and his indiscretion made them worse. He said that no harme was done, for Perdiccas was alive: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprise, which hee imputed to Meleager; abandoning the surest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, vntill the King by offering to resigne his estate vnto them, renued out of their pittie that fauourable affection, which had moued them to set him vp at the first.

Perdiccas hauing now joynded himselfe with Leontatus kept the fields, intending to cut off all prouision of victuals from the Citie. But after sundrie Embassies passing betweene the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to haue the Authors of sedition giuen vp into their handes; the King, that Meleager might bee joynded with Leontatus and Perdiccas, as a Third in gouernement of the Armie) things were compounded according to the Kings desire. Meleager should haue done well to consider, that such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to giue him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treacherie lurked vnder their great facilitie. General peace was renewed, and much loue protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had bene in Alexanders time: but no longer now did the same heart giue it life; and windie spirits they were which moued in the arteries. False reports were giuen out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his owne disgrace, but in such termes as might seeme to haue proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drilt, but not all, tooke it as an iniurie done to himselfe; and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such authors of discord might bee punished. Perdiccas (as a louer of peace) did well approve the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should bee made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receiue their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Armie. The plot was mischieuously laied: Had Meleager giuen way to seditious rumours, he must needs haue incurred the generall hatred of all, as a fower of dissention; and thereby with publike approbation might haue bene cut off, as hauing often offended in that kinde: his Prince being too weake a Patron. Now seeking redresse of these disorders, hee hatened his owne ruine, by a lesse formall, but more speedie way. This kinde of Muster was very formeless, and practised with many ceremonies, as for cleansing of the Armie. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries, were each according to their qualitie set in array, a-part from others, as if they had bene of fundrie sorts, met at aduenture: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to direction of their severall Capitaines. But at that time the great battaile of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disadvantage; and the countenance of the horse and Elephants beginning to giue charge vpon them, was such, as discovered no jealousing pallme nor good intent. Kings were alwaies wont to fight among the horse-men: of which custome Perdiccas made great vse that day, to the vtter confusion of his enemies. For Aridaus was alwaies gouerned by him, in the presence of the present had him in possession. Two or three daies before hee had fought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas vp and downe about the foot-men, commanding them to deliuer vnto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were cast vnto the Elephants, and by them slain, in the presence of the King, who should haue defended them, and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when hee disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especial friends. Hauing therefore kept himselfe quiet a while, as unwilling to giue offence to them which had the aduantage; when hee saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they fent and slew him.

The Armie being thus corrected was led into the Citie, where a new Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, diuided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves, leauing to Aridaus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funeralls of Alexander thought vpon; whose bodie hauing bene seuen daies neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Egyptians: no signe of poison appearing, how great fouler the suspicion might bee. The charge of his buriall was committed to Aridaus: one of the Capitaines, who was two yeares preparing of a great and costly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laied; many coarces of his friends being laied in the ground, before before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria, a Citie of his owne building in Egypt.

§. III.

The beginning of the Lamiar Warre.

WHilest these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principall Noble-men, and inferiour to none of Alexander's followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were banished in Greece with a Warre, which the Athenians more brauely than wildly had begunne in Alexander's life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, vpon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greekes (few excepted) should be reitorred vnto their former places. Hee knew the factious qualitie of the Grecian Estates, and therefore thought so to provide, that in euery Citie hee would haue a sure partie. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he wanne by this proude injunction. His pleasure indeede was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyrannye. The Athenians greatly decayed in estate, but retaining more, than was needfull, of their ancient spirits, forbad the execution of this decree in their Dominions; so did also the Ætolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them tooke Armes, but seemed to beare themselves, as men that had done no more then they might well iustifie by reason: neuertheless to prevent the worst, the Athenians gaue secret instructions to Leophanes a Capitaine of theirs, willing him to leaue an Armee, but in his owne name, and to keepe it in a readinesse for their vse. This was no hard thing for Leophanes to doe: great numbers of Greece Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian Warre in poore estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Capitaines. Of these he had gathered vp eight thousand, when the certaine newes were brought of Alexander's death: at which time the Citie of Athens declared it selfe, and more honorably than wisely, proclaimed open Warre against the Macedonians, for the libertie of Greece. Hereupon Leophanes drew in the Ætolians, and some other Estates, gaue battaile to the Boeotians, who sided with Antipater, and ouerthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and so strong in Adherents; That Antipater (arming in all haste, yet suspecting his owne strength) was faine to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vaine than the feares and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their destinies a farre off, which deuide all mortall wisdom, euen when they seeme neare at hand. One month was scarcely past, since nothing so heauily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the returne of Craterus into Macedon; which hee then feared as death, but now desired as the most likely assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured vnto him, was sent into Macedon to conuenge home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) and to succede Antipater in the gouernement of Macedon and Greece. The suspicions were strong that hee had a priue charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published sound much better; which was, That Antipater should bee sent vnto the King, as Capitaine of the yong Souldiers, newly to bee leauied in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would sometimes giue out speeches testifying his owne ieioualouy and hatred of him; but yet he strove to smother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexander's Lieutenants had escaped with life: most of them indeede were meane persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) remoued to make place for their betters. But if the Kings ri-

gour was such, as could finde rebellious purposes (for so hee interpreted euen lewd gouernement) in bafe persons; little might Antipater hope for, who hauing sitten Piercy ten yeares in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Maister, and the enuie of a Court, wherein they had beene his inferiours, which would now repine to see him their equall. Therefore whether his feare drew him to preuention, working first the Kings death by poison, giuen by his Son Julius, Alexander's cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth vntill opportunitie had changed it into the passion of reuenge, which was cruelly performed by his Sonne Cassander: great cause of much feare he had, which I note in this place as the ground of effects to be produced in very few yeares.

At the present Craterus was sent for, and all the Capitaines of companies lying neare, solicited to make halt. Not without cause. For in Macedon there could not at that time be raised more than thirteene thousand foot, and sixe hundred horse; which Muster was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Countrie being emptied into Asia. The Thesalians indeede who had long stood firme for Philip and Alexander, who also were the best horse-men of Greece, furnished him with very braue troupes, that might haue done great seruice, had their faith held out, which they changed for the libertie of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Thessalie trie the fortune of a battaile with Leophanes; rather (as may seeme) fearing the increase of his enemies power and rebellion of the Greekes, (were they not checkt at the first) than presuming on his owne strength. For Leophanes had of Athenians, Ætolians, and Mercenaries, two and twentie thousand foot, besides the assistance of many petty Signories, and of some Illyrians, and Thracians: of horse hee brought into the field about two thousand and five hundred; but ouer-strong he was that way also, when once the Thesalians had revolted vnto him. So Antipater lost the day: and his losse was such, that he neither was able to keepe the field, nor to make a safe retreat into his owne Countrie: therefore he fled into the Towne of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well provided of all things necessarie to beare out a siege. Thither did Leophanes follow him, present him battaile againe, and vpon the refusal clove vp the Towne with earth-works, and a wall. There will wee leaue him for a while, travelling in the last honourable enterprife that euer was vnder-taken by that great Citie of Athens.

§. IIII.

How Perdiccas employed his Armee.

KING Aridaus living vnder the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his owne Prouince, kept a naked Court: all his greatnesse consisting in a bare title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make vife of him. Perdiccas had no Prouince of his owne peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom hee should visit in his Gouernement. A stronger Armee then any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that vnstedfast condition of things to make better worth to him than many Prouinces could haue been. The better to accomplish his desires, he closely sought the marriage of Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander; yet about the same time hee either married Nicea the Daughter of Antipater, or made such loue to her as blinded their eyes, who did not somewhat narrowly search into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, and tenth King of that Countrie, had continued faithfull to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his forefathers, euen from Pharnaces the first that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Atossa sister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancesters had (indeede) beene oppressed by the Persians; but what Fortune tooke from them at one time, Vertue restored at an other, and their faithfull Princes had much increased all: But now in the fatal Period of so great an Empire, with much wisdom, and (Perdiccas being slaine) with sufficient honour, he might haue acknowledged the Macedonian in the Perfians room. This hee did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with greater cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater business, to entertaine his Armie, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take in that in-land Kingdome, surrounded with Prouinces of the Macedonian conquest; and for his owne particular, to haue one opportune place of sure retreat, vnder the gouernment of a steadfast friend. Therefore he entred Cap-pas, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirtie thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse (a strong Armie, had it not incountred a stronger, and better trained); wanne the victorie; and thereby the whole Kingdome. But with much crueltie did he vie the victorie: for hauing taken Ariarathes prisoner with many others; hee crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light vpon: and so deuiered that Prouince to Eumenes, whom of all men liuing he trusted most.

An other part of his forces he had committed to Pythion; rather as to the most honourable of such as remained about him, than as to the most assured. Pythion was to subdue the Greekes, rebelling in the high Countries of Asia. Abooue twentie thousand foot, and three thousand horse they were, (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous Nations, were soone wearie of their vnpleasant habitations, and the rude people, among whom they liued: and therefore tooke advantage of the present troubles to seeke vnto themselves a better fortune. Against these Pythion went, more desirous to make them his owne, than to destroy them: which intent of his Perdiccas discovering, did both giue him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giuing the spoiles of them to his Souldiers, and further enjoyed it vnno Pythion Captains (his owne creatures) that they should see this command executed. These directions for vie of the victorie might haue proued needlesse; so vn certaine was the victorie it selfe. A Captaine of the Rebels commanding ouer three thousand, corrupted by Pythion, did in the heat of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire without needlesse to a Hill not farre off. This dismayed the rest, and gaue the day to Pythion: who being farre enough from Perdiccas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting vnto them their liues and libertie vnder condition of laying downe their armes; and hereupon he gaue them his faith. Being master of these companies hee might well haue a good opinion of his owne power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himselfe as free Lord of any Territorie. He had thirteene thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needlesse feare without great losse had caused to leaue the field: but in true estimation all the greatest whereof Pythion might thinke himselfe assured, was (and soone appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Pythion, leauied; the Rulers of the Prouinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enjoined to giue assistance to that business: and by vertue of the precept giuen vnto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in peeces all those poore men who had yielded themselves; leauing Pythion as naked as hee came forth to returne vnto his great Master.

Now was Perdiccas mightie aboue the mightie, and had faire leisure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himselfe Lord of all: but this must be secretly carried for feare of opposition. How it succeeded will appeare, when the Lamian warre taketh ending.

§. V.

§. V.
The processe of the Lamian Warre.

WE left Antipater hardly besieged, wanting meanes to free himselfe without succours from his friends in Asia. Those help not appearing so soone as he expected, he came to parle with Leophanes, &c. would haue yielded vnto any termes of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victorie doe feldome limit their desires. Leophanes would him without further circumstance to submit himselfe to discretion. This was too much for him that had once commanded ouer them, who now required of him such a dishonorable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremities, from which as yet he was far enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Towne, which felt great want of victuals. In this lingring war, the Asians (whether wearie of sitting still at a siege, or hauing business which they pretended at home) tooke their leave, and returned into their owne Countrie. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found meanes to fillie out vpon his enemies to their great losse: for many were slaine, and Leophanes himselfe among them, ere he could be repulled into the Towne. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved; their victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deale with the Greekes in open fight. Craterus was long in coming, Lysimachus who was nearest at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his owne leading no more than 4000. foote, and 2000. horse, against Scuthas the Thracian King, who brought into the field aboue foure times that number; and though Lysimachus not without losse, had gotten one victorie, yet the enemy abounding in multitude felt not the blow so much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leonatus was earnestly solicited by Antipaters friends, to make all hast to the rescue. He had the gouernment of Phrygia the lesse, and was able to raise an Armie of more than 20000. foot, and 2500. horse, whether leauied out of his Prouince, or appointed vnto him out of the maine Armie, it is vn certaine. Certaine it is, that he was more willing to take in hand the iourne into Greece, than Antipater was to haue him come.

For Cleopatra had written vnto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chief Citie of Macedon, and very kindly offering her selfe to be his wife; which letters he kept not so close as had bene requirte, and therefore brought himselfe into great suspicion, that soone ended with his life. Antipater, chosen General by the Athenians in place of Leophanes, hearing of his approach forooke the siege of Lamia, and tooke the readie way to these great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to giue them an euill welcome home, before Antipater and they should ioyne in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Asians) the advantage of Leonatus in horse, by the odds of 2000. Thessians; in other things he was equal to him; in cause he thought himselfe Superior in the fortune of that day he proued so: for he was a great victorie (chiefly by vertue of the Thessians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who fighting valiantly was driuen into a marish pece of ground, where hee found his death, which desperately he had fought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home not far from the place of his natiuitie. He was the first of Alexanders Captains which died in battell, but all, or most of the rest, shall follow him the same way. After this day the Athenians did neuer any thing furtable to their ancient glorie.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weak to renew the fight, & too proud to flee. They tooke themselves to high grounds, vnfit for seruice on horse-back, and so abode in sight of the enemy that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their camp, and tooke the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seeke to determine the matter quickly by an other battaile. But still Antipater kept himselfe on ground of aduantage: which gaue more than reasonable confidence to the Greekes, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemy to be vanquished. This rechelesse (incorrigible in an Armie of voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians labouring to haue made themselves once againe Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatal captiuitie of Greece came on, of which shee neuer could be deliuered vnto this day. Craterus with a strong Armie hauing made great marches from Cilicia, passed ouer into Europe, and coming into Thessalie joynd himselfe with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus, being joynd in one, contained fortie thousand waighly armed, three thousand light-armed men, and fiftie thousand horse; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thousand and fise hundred in horse, in four eighteen thousand. Carefully therefore did Antipater labour to auoide the necessitie of a battaile, vntill such time as the Townes confederate should retorne vnto the campe those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in coming, and Antipater so virgent vpon the Greekes, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more helpe they had carried away the victorie: for the Thessalians had the vpper hand, and held it, vntill such time as they perceived their battailes (ouer-laid with multitude) retire vnto the higher grounds, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, hauing little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of a hundred and thirtie men, they had purchased only the death of some fise hundred enemies. Yet herof was great vse made. For the Greekes, as not subject vnto the full command of one General, and being euerie one desirous to preferue his owne estate, and Citie; concluded to make a treatie of peace with Antipater; who being a subtile artificer, & well understanding their aptnesse to diuision, refused to hearken to any generall composition, but willed euery Citie to deale apart for it selfe. The intent of his deuise was so apparent, that it was rejected; the Greekes chooing rather to abide the coming of their Assailants, whose vnreasonable carelesnesse betraied the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging & winning some townes in Thessalie, which the armie of the Confederates wanted meanes & courage to relieue, wearied that Nation from attending any longer vpon other mens vnlikely hopes, with their owne assured and present calamitie.

§. VI.

Of the peace granted to Athens by ANTIPATER. Of DEMOSTHENES his death.

He Thessalians falling off, all the rest soone followed senerally, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions giuen to the most forward inuiting such as were slack. Only the Athenians and Acetians held out. Little fauour could they hope for, hauing bene Authors of this tumult; and their feare was not great; the feare of the warre being farre from them. But the celeritie of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who sate still at Athens, deuling vpon courtes of prosecuting the Warre to come, which came to their dores, before their consultation could finde issue. He was readie to enter vpon their Frontiers; they had no abilitie to resist, and were as heartlesse as friendlesse. All that remained was to send Embassadors desiring peace vpon some good termes: necessitie enforcing them to haue accepted euen the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassage; Phocion as the most Honorable; Demades as a strong Perswader; (both of them well respected by Antipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisdom, grauitie of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of lesse regard, when their admiration was to cost much in reall effects.

Antipater calling to minde the pride of Leosthenes, required of the Athenians that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to desray the charges of the warre past, to pay a fine, and entertaine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the the government of the Citie to those of most wealth, depriving of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a conuenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was giuen; a number great enough to retaine the name and forme of a Democrasie. But the rascall multitude of beggarly persons, accustomed to get their liuing out of the common troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giuing their voices, cried out that this was a mere Oligarchie, the violent usurpation of a few inroaching vpon the publike right. These turbulent fellowes (of whom King Philip had bene wont to say, That warre to them was peace, and peace warre) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gaue them lands to manure; leaving as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfiing his owne suspitions and hatred) hee caused Demosthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with some others to bee laine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, bene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well haue passed for very milde: whereas now all such, as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or haue furthered their judgements to Authors iustly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that euer did speake and write, condemne him vtterly, calling him a bloudy tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all ciuill Nations, that the euill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soeuer otherwise it be, or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuary in the Temple of Neptunus, in the Isle of Calauris; there did Archus (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) finde him, and gently perswade him to leaue the place, but not so preuaile he threatened violence. Then Demosthenes, entreating a little respite as it had bene to write somewhat, secretly tooke poison which he had kept for such a necessitie, and so died; rather chooing to doe the last execution vpon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable, perhaps, in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battaile, how soeuer valiant in perswading to enterprises, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. Hee loued monie well, and had great summes giuen him by the Persians, to encourage him, in finding worke for the Macedonians at home. Neither did hee ill (me thinke) in taking from the Persians which loued not his Countrey, great rewards, for speaking such things as tended to his Countreys good; which hee did not cease to procure, when the Persians were no longer able to giue him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can indure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) beleuee Lucian, who tells vs, That it was Antipaters purpose to haue done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a steadfast enemy to the Macedonians; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chiefe command was left in the handes of Phocion, a vertuous man, and louer of his Countrey, yet applying himselfe to the necessitie of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the Citie much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grievous to free-men, yet fauourable to the vanquished) hee endeouored carefully to perserue.

§. VII.

How CRATERUS and ANTIPATER were drawn from their Ætolian Warres into Asia. The grounds of the first ciuill Warre betweene the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they strengthened their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Philis, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife. Shortly after they went against the Ætolians, whose pouertie was not so easily danted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had bene. Their Countrie was rough and mountainous, hauing many places of great fastnesse, into which they conueied such of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for warre: with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and so abode the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully resisted. With great obstinacie did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had shut vp all passages, and vterly debarred them of reliefe; then were they put to a miserable choice; either to descend from their strong holds, and fight vpon equal ground, with vnequall numbers; or to endure the miseries of hunger and cold, against which they could make no long resistance; or to yield themselves to the Macedonians: who incensed by the losse of many good Souldiers, were not like to leave so stubborn enemies in places, which might giue confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremitie, much finess of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger commonly doth more hurt, than a blunt consideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Ætolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies daily molested them: wherefore as yet they thought vpon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For such newes came out of Asia into the Macedonian campe, as made Antipater and Craterus thinke euery houre a moneth, till they had rid their hands of these Ætolians, giuing them whatsoever conditions they would aske; yet with purpose to call them to seuerer account; yea, to roote them out of Greece by death, or by captiuitie, when once they should haue settled the affaires of Asia; as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is the disposer: in whose high Councell it was ordained, that this poore Nation should continue a troublesome barre to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Prouinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so farre from taking effect, that it serued merely as an introduction to all the ciuill warres ensuing.

The grounds of the Asiaticke expedition, which did set the World in a vpror, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captaines the mightiest in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedencie, and the present rule which he bare in the parts of Europe: The other, as of all men the best beloved, and most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Armie. Next vnto these had Perdiccas bene; whom the advantage of his presence at the Kings death did make equall, or superiour, to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiccas were, to haue consorted with these two, and to haue bene with them a third partner in the gouernment of all: to which purpose hee entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in short space the strength of that gale of winde which bore him vp, he began to take wing and soare quite an other way. Ardeus was a very simple man, yet serued well enough to weare the tie of that Majestie, whereof Perdiccas being Administrator, and hoping to become proprietarie, the practise was more seuerer than had bene in the daies of Alexander.

answer: the desire to seeme terrible, being very familiar with weake Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other meanes of preferring themselves from content, and of giuing such a fire lustre to their actions, as may dazzle the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poore Greekes in the higher Asia were all put to the sword; and how tyrannously the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath scarce bene thowed. The Phrygians were the next who felt the wrath of these counterfait Alexanders. One Citie of theirs was vterly razed; the children sold for slaues, and all the rest massacred. The Isaurians by this example growne desperat, when after two or three daies triall they found themselves vnable to continue the defence, lockt themselves into their houses and set the Towne on fire, into the flame whereof the yong-men did throw themselves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the walls.

These exploits being performed, the Armie had no other worke than to sift the ashes of the burnt Citie for gold and siluer; but Perdiccas had lininge of greater importance troubling his braines. Nothing was more contrarie to his ends, than to sit still without impliment: letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whilst others grew great, and tooke deepe roote in their seuerall Prouinces. Hee purposed therefore to transport his forces into Europe, vnder pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the seate of his Ancestors, and head of the Empire. The Kings presence would make the offices of his Vice-oyes (during the time) actually void; Antipater with Craterus being once in case of priuate men, and yet Perdiccas holding authoritie, the match with Cleopatra might easily bee made. So should greatneesse meete with a good tide; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the power of Ptolomie might giue, who held Egypt, well fortified with men, but much better with love of the people; yet if the businesse prospered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomie would follow of himselfe, or bee driuen to cometo reason. Antigonius likewise then governing in Phrygia, a busie-headed man, and ill affected to the side, was to bee looked into, and made away, for feare of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas; and was deceiued in so thinking. Antigonius was as good a man of warre, of as deepe a judgement, as high a spirit, and as great vnderstanding, as any of Alexanders Captaines. His impliments had bene lesse than some of theirs, which made him also the lesse respected. But his thoughts were as good as theirs: for, he valued himselfe by his owne worth, not by the opinions of other men; with carefull attention had hee watched Perdiccas, and sounded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discouer. For Perdiccas hauing with a jealous eye pried into the demeanour of Antigonius, and finding him not to be his friend, caused him to be charged with such accusations, as might suffice to take away his life, especially by a Iudge that sought his death. This deuise Antigonius would not seeme to perceiue, but prepared himselfe in shew to make answer; indeede, to make escape, which easily he did, putting himselfe and his sonne Leontius aboard of some Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with such tidings, as finished the Ætolian warre before mentioned.

As the coming of Antigonius made Craterus and Antipater manifestly perceiue that owne danger: so his flight gaue Perdiccas to vnderstand that his intentions were laid open, and must now be justified by the sword. Therefore hee prepared as fast as hee could not only for defence, but (as hauing on his side the Kings name) to meet with them at home, who were nothing slack in providing to encounter him. Ptolomie being aduertised of these proceedings, and considering how nearly they concerned him, sided with Antipater. To his gouernment of Egypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without consent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the midst of these garboiles he celebrated the funeral of Alexander with great solemnitie, purchasing thereby to himselfe much good will and many partakers, notwithstanding the terrible report of the Kings Armie coming against him.

PERDICCAS his courage into Egypt, and his death.

PERDICCAS, vncertaine which way to bend his maine power, at length resolved to set vpon Ptolomie; leauing Eumenes to keepe to his vie, against Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Asia bordering vpon Europe.

It may seeme strange, that hee did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Ptolomie could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quick end with Ptolomie; or belicued that Craterus would not be readie for him soone enough. Sure it is that he tooke a bad course, and made it worse with ill handling.

Ptolomie by his sweet behaviour allured many to his partie, without helpe of any bad arts. Perdiccas contrariwise was full of insolencie, which neuer faileth to be rewarded with hatred; that is truly defined. An affection founded vpon opinion of an vnjust contempt. The whole storie of his proceedings in Egypt is not worth relating: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilfull man) tired his followers, and walled them in hard enterprises without successe. His most forcible attempt was vpon a little Towne, called the Camels Wall: thither hee marched by night, with more haile than good speede; for Ptolomie preuenting him, did put himselfe into the place, where behauing himselfe not only as a good Commander, but as a stout Souldier, hee gaue the foile to Perdiccas, causing him to retire with losse; after a vehement, but vaine, assault continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made another iourne, (which was his last) and came to the diuisions of Nilus, ouer against Memphis. There with much difficultie hee beganne to passe ouer his Armie into an Iland, where he meant to incampe. The current was strong, the water deepe, and hardly foordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants about the passage, to breake the violence of the streame, and his horse-men beneath it; to take vp such as were carried away by swiftnesse of the water. A great part of his Armie being arriued on the further banke, the channell beganne to waxe deepe; so that whereas the former companies had waded vp to the chinne, they who should have followed could finde no footing. Whether this came by rising of the water, or flitting away of the ground; (the earth being broken with the feet of so manie Men, Horse, and Elephants) no remedie there was, but such as had passed multirepasse againe, as well as they might: for they were too weak for the enemie, and could not bee relieved by their fellows. With great confusion therefore they committed themselves to the Riuer, wherein about two thousand of them perished, a thousand were deuoured by Crocodiles; a miserable spectacle euen to such as were out of danger; such as were strong and could swimme recovered the Campe; many were carried downe the streame, and driuen to the contrarie banke, where they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Souldiers against their Generall, giuing libertie to their tongues which long time had concealed the euill thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, newes came from Ptolomie; which did let them in an vp-rose. Ptolomie had not only shewed much compassion on those who fell into his hands aliue, but performed all rights of funerall to the dead carcases, which the Riuer had cast vpon his side; and finally, sent their bones and ashes to bee interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not only moue the common Souldier, but made the Captaines fall to mutinie, thinking it vnreasonable to make warre vpon so vertuous and honorable a person, to fulfill the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, vling them like slaues. The sedition growing strong wanted only a head, which it quickly found. Pythion was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the disgrace which hee had suffered by his procurement, after the victorie vpon the rebellious

Greekes.

Greekes. Pythion had liued in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the diuision of the Provinces made Gouernour of Media; hee had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equall to him, had neuerthelessse becom scornfully vsed by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captiues, and a good part of the horse, which consisted of the Gentrie, (the foot-men hauing declared themselves before) he entred the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumstance they all ranne vpon him, and slew him. Such end had the proud misgouerning authoritie of Perdiccas. Hee might haue liued as great as any, could he haue suffered any as great as himselfe; yea, peraduenture master of all, had he not bene too masterly ouer those which were a readie his.

The next day Ptolomie came into the campe, where he was joyfully recciued; he executed himselfe of things past, as not hauing bene Author, or giuen cause of the Warre, and was easily beleecued: the fauour of the Armie being such toward him, that needes they would haue made him Protector in the roome of Perdiccas. But this hee refused. It was an office fit for one, that would seeke to increase his greatness with his trouble. Ptolomie was well enough already; wherefore, for his owne quiet he forbore to accept it, and for their well-deseruing of him hee procured that honourable charge to Pythion, and to Avidant the Captaine, who hauing had some companies of Souldiers, to furnish with their attendance the solemnities of Alexander's Funerals, did with them adhere to him against Perdiccas.

In the middle of these businesse came newes of two great victories obtained by Eumenes; which newes, had they arriued two or three daies sooner, had bene entertained with joyfull acclamations; and would haue giuen such reputation to Perdiccas, as had caused both his priuate maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to haue accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings coming in ill time, when death had stopped the eares which would haue giuen them well come, found bad acceptance, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Victories of EUMENES in the lower Asia.

BEFORE wee proceede in the relation of things, happening about the person of the King, it is meete that wee speake of those businesse in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexterity, which Perdiccas was occupied in the Egyptian warres. Alextas, the brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had recciued command from Perdiccas to be assistant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alextas made flat answere, That he would not; alleging the backwardnesse of his men to beare armes against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make faire shew, but inwardly he repined at the Precedencie giuen to Eumenes, as thinking himselfe the better man. Eumenes discouraging, through the counterfaited lookes of Neoptolemus, the mischief lurking in his heart, wisely dissembled with him, in hope to winne him by gentle behaviour, and sweet language, that commonly are lost, when bestowed vpon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himselfe, that hee might stand vpon his owne strength, he raised out of the Countries vnder his iurisdiction, about fixe thousand horse, giuing many priuileges to such as were seruiceable, and training them well vp. Not without great neede. For when vpon aduertisement of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Hellepont) for the inuasion of his Provinces, hee willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power, Neoptolemus did (indeede) aduance, but in hostile manner, though vnprovoked, presented him battaile. Neoptolemus had secretly covenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conquest of Asia, which now intending to performe, he was shamefully disappointed. For though his foot-men, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and prevailed farre vpon Eumenes's battailes; yet were his horse driven out of the field, and himselfe compelled, with a few of them, to runne away, leaving naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men, to bee charged by Eumenes, who forced them in such wise, that calling downe their Pikes they cried for mercie, and gladly tooke their oath to doe him faithfull seruice. Antipater and Craterus endeavored with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their societie, who contrariwise offered himselfe, as a meane of reconciliation, betwene Perdiccas and Craterus, whom hee dearely loued; professing withall his hatred to Antipater, and constant faith to the cause which he had vntaken to maintaine.

Whilest these negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crew to Antipater, and his Associates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a scourge (at which foolish railing they laugh) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well hee might) with high commendations; assuring them, that if Craterus did but once appeare, or that his voice were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes's Campe, the victorie was wonne, for they would all forth-with resuolt vnto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to giue him aide against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might haue the leading of the Armie to be sent. Their owne affections did easily leade them to condescend to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might prouaile as much, as the force which hee drew along. For he had in the middle of Alexanders vanities, when others (imitating their King) betooke themselves to the Perjian fashions of garments, and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian forme of behaviour, and apparrell; whereby hee became verie gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new tricks of Asia, with discontented eyes, as reproachfull and derogatorie to the manners of their native country. So Antipater tooke the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to ioyne with Ptol. mico. Craterus vsed great coleritie, to haue taken Eumenes's scuffling (as he hoped) according to the common fashion of Captaines after a great victorie. But hee had a wiser and well aduised enemy to encounter, who kept good cspiall vpon him, and with much wisdom toreflaw all that was to bee feared, and the means of preuention, which his courage did not faile to execute.

Eumenes was not ignorant, that Craterus was able to defeat him without battaile, yea without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Armie following him: (yet the Armie following him was such as much exceeded his owne in footmen, but was inferiour in horse-men) and thought it more vncleane to keepe the Macedonians from resuolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon hee tooke in hand a strange piece of worke, which deperation of all courses else taught him, and wise managing, prosperously accomplished. Hee gaue out reports that Neoptolemus was returned with such companie as hee could gather together, and had gotten Pierres (a Captaine of no great estimation, who lay not farre off) to ioyne with him. Having animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom hee knew to be despised and hated among them, (as haue been vanquished by some of them, and forsaken others in plaine field, whilst they valiantly fought in his qumrell) he tooke great care to keepe them from receiving any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded, that no Messenger nor Trumpetter should bee admitted; and not here-with satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would haue regarded him had hee bene knowne: but Thracians, Cappadocians, and Perfians, vnder the leading of such as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas and himselfe. To these also he gaue in charge, that without speaking or hearkening to any word, they should runne vpon the enemy, and giue him no leisuire to say or doe any thing, but fight. The directions which he gaue to others, hee did not faile to execute in his owne person: but placing himselfe in the right wing of his battaile, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as hee vnderstood) conducted the left wing on the contrarie side, hee held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and ready to charge charge the enemy as soon as the distance would giue leaue. A rising peece of ground lay betwene them, which hauing ascended, the Armies discouered each other: but that of Eumenes euery way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long journeyes, which over-hastily they had made; seeking the deceitfull issue of fruitlesse hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (hauing failed in surpring them as enemies) to discouer himselfe to his old friends and fellow-fowldgers; of whom hee could see none. Phenix a Troian, and Artabacius a Perfian, had the leading of that side, who mindfull of their instructions beganne to giue vpon him, with such countenance as told him his error; which to redeme, hee bad his men fight and winne 10 the day; and take the spoile to themselves. But the Beare whose skinne hee sells is not yet caught. The ground whereon the battaile was fought gaue most advantage to the horse, who encountered very roughly on all parts; especially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus, who as soon as they had discouered one another could not containe themselves, but with great rage met bodie to bodie, and letting loose their bridles grappled to and fro only together, that their horses ranne from vnder them, leaving both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first vp, but Eumenes had his sword first drawne, where-with hee hauged the other; causing him to fall downe and fight vpon one knee. In this conflict they received many wounds, but Neoptolemus giuing slight ones tooke such as were deadly, by which hee died in the 20 place, and was there (being halfe-dead halfe-alive) stripped by his mortal enemy, whose reuilings hee required, lying euen at the last gaspe; with one wound in the groin, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to runne away vpon the spurre, and seeked shelter behind the battailes of their foot. They were nothing holty pursued. For Eumenes pained himselfe to carrie succour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed, but found accompanied with the same fortune, that had assisted him when he fought in person. Craterus had gallantly borne himselfe a while, and sustained the impression of Artabacius and Phenix, with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when hee was charged by men of little estimation or note. Otherwise it is not unlikely, that he might haue either carried the day, or preserved himselfe to a better aduerture by giuing ground as the rest (when he and Neoptolemus were slaine) did. But whilst he fought to preferre his reputation, he lost his life by the fall of his horse, or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound received; vpon which accident hee was trampled vnder foot by many that knew him not, and so perished vnkowne, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes comming to the place where hee lay made great lamentation, as haueing alwaies loued and honoured Craterus, of whose death hee was now become the instrument. The vanquished Armie entertained a Treatie of peace with Eumenes, making them of willingnesse to become his followers; but their intent was only to refresh themselves, which (by his permission) haue done, they flie away by night, and fled toward Antipater.

This battaile fought within ten daies of the former wanne to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his owne Souldiers tooke the death of Craterus heauily, and the Armies lying further off were enraged with the newes. But other matters there were which incensed men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof it manitely appeared, that hee was as sorrie as any that pretended greater heauinesse. His Armie wanted pay. This was a great fault; which hee wisely amended, by giuing to them the spoile of such Townes as were ill-affected to him. So hee re-deemed the loue of his owne men, who of their meere motion appointed vnto him 30 a guard for defence of his person. Others were not so easie to be reconciled. They who had bene Traitors to Perdiccas hated him for his faithlesnesse, as greatly, as they thought that he would hate them for their faithfulness; neither found they any fairer way of excusing their late resuolt, than by accusing and condemning the side which they had forsaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor; and con-condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to giue that sentence, than to put it in execution.

p. X.

Quarrells between Eurydice the Queene, and Python the Protector.

Python resignes his office, into which Antipater is chosen.

PYTHON and Arideus being chosen Protectors of King Arideus, and the children of Alexander, tooke the way to Asia the lesse, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of these two Python was the greater in reputation, yet faire too weak to sustaine so important a charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Arideus, was come to her husband, a Ladie of a masculine spirit, well vnderstanding what shee was or should be, and thinking her selfe able to support the waight which Fortune had laied vpon her foolish husband, being due to her owne title. Her Mother Cyna, sister to Alexander by her father King Philip, was married (as hath bene shewed) to Amyntas, who was right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the only sonne of King Perdiccas, Philips elder brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman; shee had led Armies, and (as a true sister of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Ceria Queene of the Phrygians, a Virago like vnto her selfe, had slain her. Shee brought vp this Eurydice in the same vnwomanly art of warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brooke her curious intermeddling in his charge. Whether it were so that Python had some purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome; (as once he had sought to doe) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intent, or whether only desire of rule caused her to quarrell with him; quarrell shee did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Armie hauing shaken off such a ranke-rider as Perdiccas, would not afterward be reined with a twined thread. Python bearing himselfe vpon his office took vpon him to giue directions in the kings name, which the Queene did oftentimes controul, vsing the same name, with more authoritie, and better liking of the Souldiers. Python, seeing this, would needes resigne his office, whether vpon wearinesse of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queene into enuie, it is vncertaine. Perhaps he thought, that now being the faire worthiest man in the Campe, he should be intreated to retaine the place, and haue his authoritie confirmed, or (as might be) increased, were it but for want of a fit Successor. Eurydice was nothing forrie at this course; for now shee thought to manage the affaires of the Empire at her owne will, being freed from the troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Python, of their contrarie expectations: choosing Antipater, the only powerfull man of Alexanders Captaines, then liuing, into the roome of Python. Hereat the Queene fretted exceedingly, and beganne to deale earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord save only the King their Soueraigne. Yet shee failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may seme) by three things: the apparent weaknesse of her husband: the growth of Alexanders children, who (though borne of outlandish women) were bred in the Macedonian campe; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Armie neare at hand arrived in few daies at the campe, and enforced Eurydice to hold her selfe content. Antipater was of such power that hee needed not to worke by any clofe deuises, as Perdiccas had done; he had no concurrents; all the Gouvernours of Provinces that remained aliuie acknowledged him their better; yea, many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their rooms. This done, he tooke the King, Queene, and Princes along along with him into Macedonia, leauing Antigonus Generall of the Royall Armie: to whom for his good seruices done, and to be done against Eumenes, hee gaue the rule of Syria, besides his former Prouinces, and committed into his hands the government of Asia during that warre.

p. XI.

ANTIGONVS Lieutenant of Asia, winnes a battaile of EUMENES, and beseegeth him in Tora: He vanquisheth other followers of PERDICCAS.

ERE begins the greatnesse of Antigonus, whose power in few yeares ouergrowing the rest wanted little of spreading it selfe ouer the whole Monarchie. Hee was to make warre vpon Eumenes, Aleuas the brother, and Attalus the brother in-law to Perdiccas: worke enough to keepe his Armie employed in the publike seruice, till such time as hee might find occasion to make vse of it in his owne buisnesse. The first of these which he undertooke was Eumenes, with whom Aleuas and Attalus refused to ioyne, hauing vnreasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chiefe place. Eumenes had an Armie strong in number, courage, and all needfull prouisions; but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all wayes of corrupting his Souldiers, tempting first the whole Armie with letters: which practise failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made thew as if hee himselfe had kattered abroad those letters to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captaines, as hee thought most easie to be wonne. Of these Captaines one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any helpe was neere him, yet looking so carelesly to himselfe, that he and his were surpris'd, when he thought his enemies farre off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in companie with Antigonus) kept his treacherie secret, reseruing it for the time of execution. Vpon confidence of the treason which this false man Apollonides had undertaken, Antigonus presented battaile to Eumenes; in the heate whereof Apollonides, Generall of the horse to Eumenes, fled ouer to the contrarie side, with such as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose companie he desired not. Eumenes, perceiving the irrecoverable mischiefe which this traitorous practise brought vpon him, pursued the villain, and cut him off before he could thrust himselfe into the troups of Antigonus, and boast of his treacherie. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the losse of that battaile, which disabled him vtterly to keepe the field, and left it very hard for him to make a safe retreat. Yet one thing he did which much assisted his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victorie to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilst Antigonus held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compasse returned to the place where the battaile had been fought; there he burned (according to the maner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and allies of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart, raising vp heapes of earth as Mountaines ouer them, and so went his way. As this bold aduerture bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their campe) great admiration of his braue spirit: so the newes which Alexander (who was set to looke vnto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to loue him as their honourable friend. He had found Menander in an open Plaine, carelesse, as after an assured victorie, and loaden with the spoiles of many Nations, the rewards of their long seruices; all which he might haue taken: but fearing least such a purchase should proue a heauie burthen to him, whose chiefe hope consisted in swift expedition, he gaue secret warning to Alexander to flie to the mountaines, whil实现 he detained his men (whom authoritie could not haue restrained) by this sleight, setting them to baite their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtesie, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborne when it lay in his power to strippie them out of all their wealth, and make their children slaues, and to rauish their wiues: but Antigonius told them, that he had not forborne to do this out of any good wil to them; but out of meere subtiltie had auoided those precious letters, which would haue hindered his speedie flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not onely thinke all carriages to be ouer-burdenfome; but the number of his men to be more troublefome than auaileable in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him, as fast as he could, wilthing them to shift for themselves; and retaining onely hue hundred horse, and two hundred foote. When hee had wearied Antigonius awhile in following him vp and downe, he came to Nora: where againe, keeping no more about him, than necessitie required to make good the place, he louingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little Fortresse in the borders of Lycanis & Cappadocia, so strongly situated that it seemed impregnable, and so well victualed and stored with all necessities, that it might hold out for many yeares. Thither did Antigonius followe him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in warre. To this purpose he entertained parlee with him, but in vaine. For whereas Antigonius offered him pardon, and his loue; Eumenes required restitution of his Prouinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed vps where Antigonius leauing sufficient strength for continuance of the siege,ooke his iourne into Pisidia against Alextas and Attalus, with whom hee made short worke. He came vpon them vnexpected, and seized on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Capitaine as Eumenes, to haue defended them. Alextas and Attalus, as they had bene too secure before his coming, so were they too aduenturous in fighting at the first sight, vpon all disadvantages; and their folly was attended with futable euent. Attalus with many principall Capitaines was taken, Alextas fled to the Citie of Termessus, where the loue of the yonger fort was toward him so vehement, that stopping their cares against all perswasions of the ancient men, they needes would hazzard their liues and their Countie in his defence. Yet this auailed him nothing. For the Gouvernours of the Towne, hauing secretly compounded with Antigonius, caused the yong men to fall out; and vning the time of aduantage, they with their seruants did set vpon Alextas, who vnable to resist slew himselfe. His dead body was conuied to Antigonius, and by him barbarously torne was call forth without buriall. When Antigonius was gone the yong men interred the carcase with solemne funerals, hauing once bene minded to set on fire their owne towne; in reuenge of his death. Such fauour had hee purchased with courteous liberalitie: but to make an able Generall, one vertue, how great soeuer, is insufficient.

§. XII.

PTOLOIEMENNES Syria and Phœnicia. The death of ANTIPATER.

Whilest these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enioy their Governments for the present, than to confirme or enlarge them. Onely Ptolome looking abroad, wanted all Syria and Phœnicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkable for any circumstance in the manning. He sent a Lieutenant thither with an Armie, who quickly tooke Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may seeme) without any great strength of Souldiers, farr from assistants, and vainly relying vpon the authoritie which had giuen him that Prouince, and was now occupied with greater cares than with seeking to maintaine him in his Office.

Antipater was old and sickely, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonius pursue the dispatch of those busineses in Asia. Hee had with him Polyperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Capitaines, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had stirred in quarrell of Perdiccas, preuailling farr at the first, but soone loosing all that they had gained, whilest Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Polyperchon, Antipater did repose great confidence; so farr fourth, that (suspecting the youth of his owne Sonne Cassander of insufficiencie in so great a charge) hee bequeathed vnto him on his death-bed the Government of Macedon and Greece, together with his Office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being foure-score yeares old, hauing alwayes traualled in the great affaires of mightie Princes, with such reputation, that Alexander in all his greatnesse was ialous of him, and the successours of Alexander did either quietly giue place vnto him, or were vnfortunate in making oppositions. In his priuate qualities he was a subtle man, temperate, frugal, and of a Philosophicall behauiour, not vnlearned, as hauing bene Scholler to Aristotle, and written some Histories. He had bene much moued by Olympias, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Sonne hee compelled to abstaine from comming into Macedonia, or entremedling in matters of estate: yea, at his owne death he gaue especial direction, that no woman should be permitted to deale in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soone forgotten; and yet, ere long, by sorrowfull experience approued to haue bene found and good.

§. XIII.

OF POLYSPERCHON who succeeded vnto ANTIPATER in the Protectorship. The insurrection of CASSANDER against him.

POLYSPERCHON was very skillfull in the art of warre, hauing long time bene Apprentice in that occupation; for other qualities, requisite in so high an Office as he vnder-went, either Nature had not giuen to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his businesse more formally, then wisely, as a man of a second wit, fitter to assist, than command in chiefe. At the first entrance vpon the stage hee called to counsaile all his friends, wherein, for waightie considerations (as they who weighed not the contrarie reasons held them) the Queene Olympias was reuoked out of Epirus into Macedon; that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For the condition of the times requiring, that the Gouvernours of Prouinces abroad should keepe greater Armies, than were needfull or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Count should be filled with all maiestie, that might giue authoritie to the Iniunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard containe within the bounds of ductie such as could not by force haue bene kept in order, being strong, and lying too farr off.

Such care was taken for preuention of imaginarie dangers and out of sight, whilest present mischiefs late vnregarded in their bosomes. Cassander the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to discouer that great sufficiencie in Polyperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could hee discern such odds in the qualitie of himselfe and Polyperchon, as was in their fortune. Hee was lesse Capitaine of one thousand, which Office by practise of those times was of more importance, than the title now seemes to implice. He should thereby haue bene as Campe-master, or Lieutenant generall to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himselfe the better man. Therefore hee began to examine his owne power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relied on his Father were his owne assured, especially such as commanded the Garisons bestowed in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principall authoritie, in those Common-weales, whose formes had bene corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and drawe in many partakers: it concerned these men in their owne particular to adhere vnto the Captains by whom their faction was vp-held; and by whom the rascall multitude, couetous of regaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised ouer the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Besides all these helpes, Cassander had the secret loue of Queene Eurydice, who had in priuate rendered him such courtie, as was due only to her husband. But neither the Queenes fauour, nor all his other possibilities, gaue him confidence to breake out into open rebellion; because hee saw Polyperchon much reuenced among the Macedonians, and strong enough to suppress him before he could haue made head. Therefore he made them of following his pleasures in the countrey, and calling many of his friends about him, vnder pretence of hunting, aduised with them vpon the safest course, and most free from all suspition. The necessitie 10 was apparant of raising an Armie, before the businesse were set on foot; and to doe this, opportunitie presented him with faire meanes. Ptoleme had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his gouernement of Egypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus vpon the first newes of Antipaters death, beganne to lay hold vpon all that he could get, in such sort that hee manifestly discouered his intent of making himselfe Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stood in neede of a ciuill Warre; which 20 Cassander well noted, and presumed withall, That the friendship which had passed betwene his Father and them, would auail him somewhat. Wherevpon hee secretly dispatched messengers to them both; and within a little while conuened himselfe on a sodaine ouer the Hellespont, that he might in person aduance the businesse with greater speede. Much persuasion is neede in winning a man to what he desireth. Antigonus coueted nothing more, than to finde Polyperchon worke by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly presse him, by the memorie of his Father, and all requisite con-

 30 jurations, to assit him in this enterprise; telling him that Ptoleme was readie to declare for them, and vrgeing him to a speedie dispatch. Antigonus on the other side repaid him with the same coine; saying, That for his owne sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearely loued, hee would not faile to giue him all manner of succour. Hauing thus scuffled one another with words, they were nothing slack in preparing the common meanes leading to their fueral ends.

§. XIII.

The vnworthie courses held by POLYSPERCHON, for the keeping downe of CASSANDER.

Great necessitie there was of timely prouision. For Polyperchon needed no other instructions to informe him of Cassanders drift, than the newes of his departure. He was not ignorant of the readie disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptoleme, to the strengthening of rebellion; and well hee knew that one principall hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Greecian Estate. Therefore (loosing to work circumspectly) he called an other Councell, wherein it was concluded, That the Popular forme of gouernment should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawn; and that all Magistrates and principall Men, into whose 40 handes Antipater had committed the supreme authoritie, should forthwith bee either slaine or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassanders friends, and to raise vp many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an vnthankefull nature in Polyperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For how could he be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the Sonne went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose only boundie had inabled him to doe it? or what could bee said in their defence, who sought to destroy many

many worthe men, friends to the State, by whom the Greekes were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians; and in opposition to their priuate Enemie, gaue the rule of things to bale Companions, and such as naturally maligned the Empire: But as in mans bodie, through finewes newly issuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next Neighbour, than by any displeasure in the contrarie hand: so in bodies politique, the humours of men, subdiuided in faction, are more iraged by the disagreeable qualities of such as curbe them in their nearest purposes, than they are exasperated by the generall opposition of such as are diuided from them in the maine trunk. Hereby it comes to passe, that contrarie religions are inuited to helpe against Neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawne in; to take part in ciuill warres; and ancient hatred called to counsaile against inuious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guiltie; since hath taught the art to offer it selfe vnto manifest losse in defence of the head: they are deprauid 10 actions, which render men sensible of their owne particular, and forgetfull of the more generall good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greekes were presented with a vaine shew of libertie, ranne vnder the Kings name; but so, as one might easily discern, that Polyperchon had guided his pen. For the maine point was, That they should follow such directions, as Polyperchon gaue, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the rest it 20 contained such a deale of kindnesse, as proceeding on a sodaine from those who had kept them in hard subiection, might well appeare to haue come from other root than the pretended good will; and was of it selfe too bale and vnfit for a King to vse toward his conquered Subjects, and often-subdued Rebels:

§. XV.

Of the great commotions raised in Athens by POLYSPERCHONS decree,
 The death of PHOCION.

Neuerthelessse the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, and sought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captaine of the Garrison, which kept one of their Hauens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Towne, would needes take longer time of deliberation, than was 30 pleasing to their hasty desires. Nicanor, as a trustie follower of Cassander, was by him thrust into the place, and Menelaeus (that was Captaine there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His comming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who soone after hearing the newes of Antipaters death, cried out vpon Phocion, saying, That he 40 had sufficient intelligence of that accident, and might by aduertising them in due time haue put into their hands a faire opportunitie of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Farre more grieuouly would they haue bene offended, had they knowne the instructions, which Cassander had giuen to Nicanor, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not only retain Munychia, any injunction to the contrarie notwithstanding; but that hee should finde meanes to thrust some Companies into Praxus, and fortifie that also, which was the principall Hauen, against the high Towne. How to accomplish this he rather wanted some reasonable 50 pretence, than good abilitie. But the Athenians were not long in giuing him sufficient cause to doe that, which he would haue done without any cause giuen. They desired him to come vnto their Councell, assembled in the Praxus, there to consider of the Kings Proclamation; whither vpon Phocians word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the warre which was readie to breake forth. Contrariwise they vrged him first of all, to make them Masters of their owne, which how to vse they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to confelend vnto the others demand; the Athenians (who did alwaies measure iustice by profit, yet seldom thrived by that course) practised with Dercyllus, a Captaine to loving Polyperchon, and then lying neare at hand, that he should enter into the Towne, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Phocion who then governed in Athens, a man very vnlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a trick of politike dishonestie, did quietly suffer him to depart and leave himselfe.

Nicanor hereupon beganne to devise vpon taking Piræus; not as following now the project of Cassander, but prosecuting his owne iust revenge. He leaued as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piræus, tooke it, and intrenched himselfe therein: to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Hauen, saw him now Master of both. Alexander, the sonne of Polyperchon, came thither shortly after with an Armie. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recouering all, and addressed themselves vnto him; who made faire shewes, intending meere mischief, which they perceived not, being blinded with the vaine Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queene. Olympias taking vpon her to command, before shee durst well adventure to returne into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which hee held: but hee would first consider more of the matter. Polyperchon had further ordained, that the Isle of Samos should berendred vnto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeede) so farre from purposing to let them haue Samos that as yet he did not thoroughly intend to let them haue themselves. The commoditie of their Hauens was such, as he would rather get into his owne handes, than leave in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs, than in Cassanders. His sonne Alexander not ignorant of this, made faire shew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labour, to entermeddle with the buisnesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew jealous, and the displeasure they conceived against him they powred out vpon Phocion depriving him of his Office. This was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers, thrusting themselves into the assembly of the Citizens, who distracted with sundrie passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought euerie one that best could imagine against thinges past, a most likely man to finde some remedie for the euill threatening them. In this hurle burlie was Alexander deuiling how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor, and held much priue conference with him; which he could not so secretly carrie, but that his negotiation was discovered, whereby the vp-rore in the Towne was so farre increased, that Phocion with many of his friends were accused, and driven to seeke sauaguard of their liues by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gaue them his letters of commendation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Polyperchon was in the Countrie of Phocis, readie to enter with an Armie into Attica. Thither came Phocion with his Companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their owne deserts, (hauing alwaies bene friends to the Macedonians, as farre as the good of their Countrie gaue leaue) should be enough to get patronage to their innocencie. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polyperchon's familiar friend, went along with them, (in an euill houre) who promised to himselfe and them great fauour by means of his acquaintance. But Polyperchon was an vnstable man, very earnest in what he tooke in hand, yet, either for want of iudgement in following them, or of honestie in holding the best of them, easily changing his intended courses, and doing thinges by the halues, which made him commonly faile of good success. For feare of Cassander, he had offered wonderfull kindnesse to the Athenians; this had caused them to loue him: out of their loue hee gathered hope of deceiuing them, which made him to change his minde, and seeke how how to get into his owne handes thole keyes, with which Cassander held them fast lockt vp; finding himselfe disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false dishonourable man, hee stood waivering betweene the contrarie allurements of profit and reputation. To keepe the Athenians perforce at his deuotion, would indeede haue done well: but the effecting of this beganne to grow desperate; and many Townes of importance in Greece beganne to call their eies vpon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore hee thought it the wisest way to redeme their good opinion, by giuing all contentment vnto the popular fiction, which then was growne to be Matter of that Citie. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenians 10 Embassadors come, treading (as one may say) vpon Phocion's heeles, whom they were sent to accuse. These had solenne audience giuen to them in the Kings presence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for ostentations sake was glorified with all exteriour shewes of majestie; yet all too little to change Aridæus into Alexander: for hee did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as hee saw others doe. For beginning of the buisnesse Polyperchon commanded that Dinarchus should be tortured and flaine: This was enough to testifie his heartie affection to the Commonwealth of Athens, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their sake; whose Embassadors he then bad to speake. When their errand was done, and answer to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the rest 20 were pronounced guiltie of treason; but to giue sentence, and doe the execution vpon them, was (for Honours sake) referred vnto the Citie of Athens, because they were Burgeses. Then were they sent away to Athens, where the rascall multitude, not suffering them to speake for themselves, condemned them to die. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocion, a man in very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to be of the lesse regard. Fieue and fortie times had hee bene chosen Gouvernour of the Citie, neuer suing for the place, but sent for when he was absent: so well was his integritie knowne, and so highly valued: euen of such as were no pretenders to the same vertue. Hee was a good Commander in Warre, wherein though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, 30 and neuer vnfortunate. Neuer did the Citie repent of hauing followed his counsaile: nor any priuate man of hauing trusted his word. Philop of Macedon highly esteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signes of his loue) sent him two hundred talents of silver, and offered to bestow vpon him of four Cities in Asia any one which hee would chioose. But Phocion refused these & other gifts, how soeuer importunately thrust vpon him; resting well contented with his honest pouertie: wherein he liued about fourescore yeares, and then was compelled by the vnjust iudgement of wicked men to drinke that poison, which by iust iudgement of the righteous God, so infected the Citie of Athens, as from that day forwards it neuer brought forth any wortheie man resembling the vertue of their 40 Ancients.

§. XVI.

OF POLYSPERCHON his ruine expedition against CASSANDER.

10 Ot long after these thinges were done, Cassander with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Piræus; which newes drew Polyperchon head-long into Attica, with a great Armie, but so ill victualled, that he was faine to depart without any thing done. Only hee had giuen some impediment to the enemy; who not contented with defending what he held beganne to looke out, and make new purchases abroad. Finding therefore himselfe vnable to driue Cassander out of Athens, hee left his sonne Alexander, with such number of men, as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withstand his further incroaching. The greatest part of his Armie he carried in to Peloponnesus, to make the Countrey sure to himselfe, wherein Cassander had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponnesus were such, as they had beene in other parts of Greece. First, he beganne to fight with Edicts, retorning the Democritie, or Popular forme of gouernement. He commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater beene made Rulers, should be either slaine, or driuen into exile. This decreetooke immediate effect in most places: the vulgar sort being very ready to scale the Charter of their freedom and authoritie, with the blood of those who had kept them in subjection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chiefe Citizens; and many which would well to Cassander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polyperchon meant to inflict an exemplarie punishment of disobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fittene thousand seruicable men, well furnished of necessaries, and resolu'd to endure the worst. And neede there was of such resolution. For Polyperchon comming thither with all his power did so much, that he ouerthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall betwene them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came vpon to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised vpon an inner wall, to beare out the next assault. The Assaultants hauing failed to carrie the Towne at the first attempt, tooke much paine to cleare the ground, and make faire way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to ouerthrow all that came in their way. But the townsmen perceiving their drift prepared boards driuen through with long nailes, which they vsed as gall-thrups, bellowing them slightly, couered with the points vpwards, in the way by which the beasts were to passe. Neither did they set any to encounter them in front, but appointed certaine light-armed men to beat vpon their sides with Arrows and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Warres. Of these prouitions they made happie vse in the next assault. For by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemie chiefly trusted) either sorely hurt, or driuen back vpon the Macedonians, whom they trampled vnder feet. Polyperchon came as ill furnished for long abode to Megalopolis, as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such kisnes as was requisite, hee forooke the siege, with some losse, and much dishonour, leaving some part of his Armie to lie before the Towne for his credit.

After this he sent Clitus, his Admirall, to Sea, to ioyne with Artemus; that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemie out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole Fleet vnder Nisæus, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where hee fought with Clitus, and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the ouerthrow gathered together the ships that were escaped, and manning them very well sent out Nisæus againe, assuring him of the victorie, as well he might. For hee sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom hee had caused to bee waited out the Straights in small Vessells by night; these before day-light setting vpon Clitus, draue his men, that lay securely on the Land, head-long into their ships; in which tumult Nisæus arriving did assaile them so lustily, that few or none escaped him.

This losse at Sea, together with his bad successe by Land, brought Polyperchon into great contempt. He had a good facilitie in penning bloudey decrees; but when the execution was referred to his owne sword, he could finde the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiving that he had left them to shift for themselves, and was not able to giue them protection against the enemie which lay in their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a Gouernour of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the partie of Cassander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly revolted vnto him; as to an industrious man, man, and likely to preuaile in the end. Thus was the whole Countrey set in a combustion, vntill it to be quashed; which presented vnto Antigonus an opportunity, that he neglected not, of making himselfe Lord of Asia.

§. XVII.

ANTIGONVS seeks to make himselfe an absolute Lord: and thereupon treaties with EUMENES, who disappoints him. Phrygia and Lycaonia wonne by ANTIGONVS.

ANTIGONVS had in Antipaters life time a firme resolution, to make vnto himselfe the utmost benefit that hee might of the Armie committed to his charge. And in faire season for aduancement of his purposes came the newes of Antipaters death; euen then, when all the buisines in Pisidia was dispatched, and no more employment for the Armie remaining, saue onely the continuance of the siege of Nora; a small thing of it selfe, but as hard a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutabilitie, to which the present estate was manifestly liable, would in continuance of some yeares (which hee might abide) worke more for him, than his enemies in that space could worke against him. His most care was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men and horses might grow sickly and vnsuicible: which made him to practise many deuises of keeping them in health and lustie. But when he had continued shut vp in this manner about a yeare, his hopes came to good passe, and he was eased of his cares by Antigonus himselfe, whose forces held him besieged.

Antigonus, knowing the great insufficiency of Eumenes, and considering his fidelitie shewed vnto Perdiccas, thought that he could not find in all the world a fitter man than him, to employ in manning those high designs, wherein hee doubted not that hee should be withstood by the mightiest Princes of the Empire. Hee sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a greater Lord than euer hee had beene, and the next man to himselfe, if things fell out as hee desired: in regard whereof hee required onely his friendship, and thereupon sent him an oath to take; which done, hee might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora, and enioy his perfect libertie. Eumenes perusing the forme of the oath perceived the meaning of Antigonus; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the blood, rather to keep as the Decorum, than vpon any loyall intent; the binding words and summe of all that theret were such, as tied him fast onely to Antigonus, omitting all reuerence of dutie to the King or any other. This he liked not, holding it vncomely to become a sworn man to him, with whom hee had fought for the mairtie, and being assured that his voluntarie assistance, which way soeuer hee gaue, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would he not therefore breake off the negotiation, and waite for some better occasion of enlargement which might perhaps be long in coming: but seeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, hee prepared to giue vp his Holde and depart. As for the oath it selfe, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemne enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in re-affirming their Allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nora, liked his wordes, and gaue him leave to put in Olympia, and the children of Alexander, binding himselfe to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he departed.

Antigonus had taken vpon him, as soone as hee came downe to the Sea-side, to remoue remove some of the Gouvernours of Provinces, behaving himselfe according to the authoritie which hee had received of Antipater, to exercise in the time of warre. Neither did hee want sufficient pretence whereby to iustifie his proceedings. For if Polyperchon might lawfully hold the Protectorship, which the old man doing on his death-bed bequeathed vnto him, as a legacie, without consent of the Princes or Souldiers; why might not hee himselfe as well retaine the Leutenantship of Asia, that was granted vnto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordaine what should seeme convenient whilst hee liued, nor to dispose of things that should happen after his death? To give a faire colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, he had three score thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, and thirrie Elephants in a readinesse to answer them.

The first that perceived his drift, and provided to resist him, was Arideus Gouvernour of Phrygia, who fortified the Townes of his owne Province, and sought to haue wonne Cyzicus, a faire Haven Towne, and seated very conveniently for him, but was faine to goe away without it. Hereupon Antigonus tooke occasion to command him out of the Countrie. Arideus was so farre from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieue Eumenes. Neuerthelesse finding that he was vnable of himselfe to make long resistance, he tooke such companies as hee could draw along with him, and so passed ouer into Europe, to complaine at the Court. The like fortune had Citus, who ruled in Lydia, and sought the like remedie of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good wordes) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already bene declared.

§. XVIII.

ANTIGONVS pursues EUMENES, EUMENES hauing authoritie from the Court raiseth great warre against ANTIGONVS in defence of the Roiall house.

ANTIGONVS hauing thus gotten into his hands all, or most of Asia thelesse, was able to haue entred Macedon, and seized vpon the Court; which that he forbore to doe, it proceeded (as may seeme) for some of these reasons. It would haue bred as much ialousie in Cassander, as feare in Polyperchon, which might haue brought them to tearmes of reconciliation; It would aske more time then hee could spare; and the enuie which followed the Protectorship was such, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to shunne, then to pursue. Besides all this, it was 40 manifest that Eumenes would not only refuse to take his part, but would make war vpon him in defence of the Roiall house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well affected. Against him therefore hee bent his course, and with an Armie of twentie thousand foote, and foure thousand Horse, made great hast toward Cilicia, hoping to suppress him before hee should bee able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithfull to their deade master, which being well knowne in the Court, hee had commission sent vnto him from thence to raise an Armie, and make warre vpon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as hee should neede. Other letters also there were directed to all the Gouvernours of Provinces, requiring them to giue assistance to Eumenes, and bee ordered by his direction: especially to the Captaines of the olde Souldiers, called the Argyrsides, or silver sheelded bands, commaundement was giuen to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and five hundred hundred horse, before this authoritie was giuen him: but now he purposed with all the strength which hee could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Roiall blood. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring helpe to her and her Nephew the sonne of Alexander; and in the meane time to giue her his aduice, in that which Polyperchon required of her: for shee was desirous to returne into Macedon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawfull bounds. Eumenes therefore counselled her to remaine in epirus, till such time as he could bring the warre to a good issue; which done, hee promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the seed of Alexander.

10 Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire scarce any one could bee found among the Noble-men, in whom Alexanders mother, wiues, and children, might repose firme confidence, sauing onely this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedonian blood, borne at Cardis, a Citie of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his owne vertue had made it; his followers obeyed at their owne discretion; and compelled hee was to trauaile as farre as Persea, to gather together an Armie sufficient, to resist the enemies that pursued his heels.

§. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. OLYMPIAS takes ARIDEVS and EURYDICE, whom shee cruelly puts to death.

NOW, so far as much as in this present warre all the Rulers of the Provinces did intermeddle; and great alterations happened, not onely in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it selfe, which brought a new face vnto the State, by the extirpation of the roiall house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it conuenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the warre it selfe, to shew briefly how the great ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawne into those courses, which ouerthrew most of them, and out of their ruines built the greatnesse of a few: as likewise to what extremitie the faction brake out in Macedon it selfe, about the maine controuersie of title to the Crowne, whereupon all other quarrels were or should haue bene depending.

Arideus the King, being simple and fearefull, did onely what hee was bidden.

Polyperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome, and become Gouvernour to a King 40 of his owne making.

Eurydice the Queene discouering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing lesse than to let her husband serue as a Stale, keeping the throne warme, till another were growne old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turne.

Cassander held fresh in mind, the danger wherein his family had bene through Alexanders malice, together with the indignitie offered to himselfe by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall, for deriding one, that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure herof, and the pleasure which hee tooke in the amorous Queene, made him resolute, both to suppress the linage which hee hated, 50 and to maintaine his beloued mistress, either by supporting her weake husband, or by taking her to be his owne wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who reigned ouer all, so as they might reigne in their severall Countreies, and establish their authoritie in such wise, that it might not be taken from them.

Among

Among these, Protonie and Antigonis were well enough already, if their ambition would have suffered them to see it.

Philo and Selenus lying farre off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach vpon their neighbours. Against these, Peneestes and some others with much ado hardly made resistance, vntill such time as Enmenes came to them; who propounded to himselfe great matters which he liued not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queene (as it is common with stepdames) had the children of her husband by his other wives. It was thought that shee had giuen payson to Aridous, which failing to take away his life had much impaired both his bodie and wittes. Now the considering, that Enmenes was too full of businesse to come home, so soone as the wished that he should; and that Cassander daily preuailed in Greece, thought it the best way to ioyne with Polyperchon, and set vp, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the sonne of Roxane, remouing Aridous before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent the procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and so tooke her way towards Polyperchon, who ioyning with her entred into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these newes wrote verie earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set aside all other businesse, and come to succour her. Shee herselfe by entreatie, gifts and promises, drew to her partie as many of the Macedonians as shee could, vntill shee thought her owne side strong enough; and then taking her husband with her went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polyperchon.

These two Queenes met armed, as if the matter should have been determined by their owne hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the reuolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soone as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to mind her former Estate, and the victorious reignes of her husband and sonne, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding herselfe thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted and made prisoner with her husband.

Olympias hauing obtained this victorie without bloud, thought that all things would succeed as easily, and that vpon the same considerations for which they had refused to beare Armes against her, the Macedonians would not stick to maintaine her, whatsoeuer her proceedings were. Hauing therefore shut vp Aridous and his wife in a close room, where they could scarce turne round, shee fed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head, (for feare lest the people should haue commiseration of him, that had reigned almost fixe years and a halfe) to put them to death. So she deliuered Aridous to some barbarous Thracians, who tooke away his life by cruel torments: to Eurydice shee sent a sword, a halter, and a cup of payson, willing her to choose the instrument of her owne death, who praying that shee like presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yielded her necke to the halter, hauing spent her last curies not in vaine. Nicanor the brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chief of his friends, did Olympias then choole out, all whom shee commanded to be slaine. His brother Solus that was already dead and buried, shee accused of payson giuen to Alexander; and thereupon caused his Tombe to be throwne downe, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this fure, began to condemne themselves, and the folly of Polyperchon, who had quite contrarie to Antipaters charge giuen on his death bed, called this outrageous woman to the gouernment of the Empire.

How CASSANDER was reuenged vpon OLYMPIAS.

† I.

The great expedition of CASSANDER. OLYMPIAS shuts her selfe in to Pydna, where CASSANDER besiegeth her. ACACIDES King of Epirus, coming to succour OLYMPIAS, is forsaken, and banished by his owne Subjects.

CASSANDER at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponnesus; whither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, he neuer failed to take the Citie, nor to giue order for the State of things in that Countie, (though Alexander the sonne of Polyperchon were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, hee willed his associates to looke to themselves as well as they could, till his returne, and so in all haste heooke his iourne toward Macedon, carried heading with the greedy desire of iust reuenge. The Atolians had taken the Straights of Thermopylae, in fauour of the Queene and Polyperchon, to hinder his passage, but he, not willing to mispend any time in dealing with them, got together as many ships as he could, great and small, with which hee transported his Armie into Thesalie. There hee diuided his companies, appointing some vnder Callias, a subtle Captaine, to hold Polyperchon buied, who then lay incamped neare to Perbabis; with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. Shee, hauing once preuailed by the respect giuen to her dignitie, tooke more care now to appeare Maiesticall, than to make herselfe strong. To this end shee made a solemne progresse to Pydna, a Sea-towne, and well fenced, hauing in her companie all the flowre of the Court, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her yong sonne Alexander, heire to the great Alexander, by his grandmothers designation: who, during his minority, kept the Soueraigne power in her owne hands. But all this pompe serued to little vse, against the violence of the enemy, that soone presented himselfe before the wals, onely it fed the besieged with a vaine hope of succour, that would from all partes arrive, to rescue persons of their qualitie. And hereof there soone appeared faile likelihood, which as soone vanished, and went away in smoke.

For Acacides King of Epirus, made great haste to bring succour to Olympias, his cousin, with whom Deodamia his daughter was also shut vp. Neuertheless, his Subjects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certain passages taken in the way by Cassanders men, they called vpon him to retire, and quit the enterprise. The Kings importunitie vrging them to proceed and the obtinate refusal of the Armie, brake out at length into such termes, that when hee had raged in vaine against the multitude, his authoritie, with which he thought to haue preuailed vpon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forsake his Kingdome, and to wander vp and downe in forraine Countries, a banished man; his people ioyning with the enemy, against whom he had led them forth to warre.

Pydna in the meane time was closed vp straightly, both by Sea and Land, so that neither any could issue out of the Citie, nor any reliefe be conuied into it; but it held out as long as any food was left, no memorabie seruice being done there; whilst great actions were manag'd abroad.

†. II.

A continuation of OLYMPIAS her storie. POLYSPERCHON defeated. Extreme famine in Pydna. OLYMPIAS yields to CASSANDER.

NOW, though order of time require it, that wee should rehearse the doings of Eumenes and Antigonus in this place, leauing Olympias yet a while to the hower of her destinie, which growes the faster vpon her, because shee may discern it com-ming; yet that we may not bee compelled to interrupt the course of our narration, by inserting her Tragedie in the midst of things, not manifestly coherent with it, we will heere (as elswhere wee haue done and elswhere must) continue to an end one Historie, that we may not bee therewith distracted, when wee shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the beleiged, remaining in Polyperchon, was in like manner disappointed, as their former trust had bene, which was reposed in the succours of the Egypt. For Cadmus, who was sent against him, found the meanes to conspire the greatest part of his Armie with monie, leauing him within a little while so slenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other bulwark of warre, than a swift retrait. When famine had so farre preuailed in the Citie, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many men feeding on the dead carcasses of their fellowes, and sawdust being giuen to the Elephants for prouender; some of the souldiers obtaining the Queenes leaue; (who could not denie it) others, without asking leaue, yee-ded themselves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieued, and sent abroad into the Countrie. The newes of the Queenes affaires, disperfed by these men, did so afright her well-willers, that such as had reserved themselves to the euent, came in a pace and submitted them to Cassander. At length, when the mortality was so great in the Towne, that the liuing were euen poysoned with the noy some sent of the dead;
Olympias bathought her selfe of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that shee had; wherein her successe was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Towne, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to bee vnto her as a house of torment, and a lake out of which shee should not bee deliuered, but vnto an euill death. Being therefore utterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her and the other Ladies, unaccustomed to so wretched a kinde of life, shee offered composition; and with much labour hardly obtained of Cassander (who hauing fetcht her Gally out of the Hauen, accounted himselfe as good as master of her bodie) a graunt of her owne life. Immediately vpon her apprehension, Pella, the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome, was yee-ded to Cassander. Amphipolis did stand out: for Aristonous, to whom Olympias had gi-uen charge of such forces as were left abroad in the Countrie, taking courage from the successe of some pettie seruises wherein hee had preuailed, beganne to promise himselfe great vnlikelihoods. But Olympias, to winne Cassanders fauour, very earnently required him vpon his faith to her, that he should giue it vp. Hee did so; and presently after was killed by his priuate enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly hated him vpon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seeke in-nouation.

†. III.

The death of OLYMPIAS, and her Condition.

WHEN Olympias had now heard sorrowfull tidings of all her friends, shee her selfe was called into question, and accused in an assembly of the Macedonians, for the murders (they were so stiled in her affliction, which in time of prob-peritie shee called iustice) by her committed. There was shee, (being not heard nor called to speake) condemned to die. The suite was commenced and proce-deth.

ted against her, by the kindred of those whom shee had slaine. But it was at Cassan-ders mitigation; who (to haften the execution) sent her word that he would furnish her with a ship and other necessities, to saue herselfe by flight: which when she refused, saying that shee would plead for herselfe, and tell her owne tale; hee dissembled no longer, but sent vnto her such men as hated her most, who tooke away her miserable life. Shee was daughter and sister vnto two Kings of Epirus, wife and mother vnto two the mightiest Kings of that or many other ages, a stout Ladie, and of vnreproachable chastitie; but her ambition was boundlesse; her hatred vnappeasable, and her furie in reuenge most vnwomanly. Her peruerse conditions made her husband seeke other wiues and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him, and them. Shee was thought priuie to her husbands death; after which, very cruelly she slew his late wife Cleopatra, hauing first murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beastly furie broiled the other aliuie in fire, in a copper bason. For these things, her sonne Alexander (otherwise louing her well) forbade her to meddle in the gouernment of Macedon. But God, more seuerer vnto cruell Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to liue and fulfil the rest of her wickednesse; (which was his iustice vpon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others) after all which hee rewarded her malice by returning it vpon her owne head.

CASSANDER celebrates the funeral of ARIDEVS and Eurydice; and seekes to make himselfe King of Macedon.

AFTER her death, Cassander gaue honourable buriall to Arideus and Eurydice, among their Progenitours, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his own possibilities of greatnesse, he married the Ladie Theffalonica, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the daughter of King Philip by an other of his wiues; that by her hee might haue some title to the Crowne. For the same end he committed Roxane, and her young sonne, to close prison, removing thereby some part of his impediment.
And, the better to increase his fame, and purchase loue, hee built a Citie, called by his owne name Cassandria, that soone grew to be very great and powerfull. He reedified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it vnto the old inhabitants, after it had laine twentie yeares wast, being vtterly razed by Alexander. By these meanes, especially by the restauration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that few remained enemies vnto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leauing him therefore daily preuailing in Greece, we will returne to them, who contended in Asia for lesse titles, but larger Prouinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONVS got in Asia.

§. I.

The iourne of EVMENES into Persia. His wife dealing with those that rayned with him.

EVMENES, having ioyned vnto his companie the Argyrasides, made halt into the Easterne parts, to take possession of those Countries, according to his commission, and strengthen himselfe against Antigonus. He tooke his iourney through Calesyria and Phœnicia, hoping to reclaim those Provinces, vsur-ped with the rest of Syria (as hath beene shewed) by Ptolome, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his halt of his passing forward was too great, his Armie too little, and the readinesse of the people to returne to their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconvenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the lesse effectuell. The Captaines of the Argyrasides were so froward, that they scorned to repaire to him, and take his directions; and their hidetie was so vntheadie, that he might haue more easily dealt with open Traitors. It was not expedient, that he, being Generall, should weaken his authoritie by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keepe them in order by compulsion. Therefore hee fained, that Alexander had appointed vnto him in a dreame, a place for their meeting, namely in a rich pavilion, wherein an emptie throne was placed, as if Alexander himselfe had beene present at their consultations. Thus hee fired himselfe from their vaine pride; but of their faith he could haue no assurance. Yet when Ptolemie requested them, & Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So hee marched on, sending before him the Kings warrant, which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey, not as reiecting the Kings authoritie, but excepting against the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Armie, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to relie upon their assistance, who stood otherwise affected than his affaires required, and were not to bee dealt with by perswasion, sought passage by strong hand, through the Countie of Babylon, in such wise, that Seleucus, having in vaine assaid to hinder him, by opening the sluices of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be ridde of him. Thus he came to Peucestes and the rest of the Easterne Lords, who were glad of his companie, because of the differences betwene Pytho, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiortie, grew very hot among them; euery one finding matter enough, to feed his owne humour of selfe-worthinesse. But the former device of assembling in one pavilion, made all quiet; the conclusion euery being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giuing aduice, and best able to reward, by means of the authoritie giuen him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these means hee wonne to himselfe many of those, who had most power to doe good or hurt.

§. II.

§. II.

How ANTIGONVS, comming to set vpon EVMENES, was diuised off with lesse.

ANTIGONVS, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Prouince of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and drue him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soone as he had made himselfe strong enough, he remoued out of Mesopotamia, where hee had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, hee marched directly against the enemies, with intent to giue them battaile. Eumenes had fortified the Cattle of Susa, and was retired backe toward Persia, keeping the Riuer of Tigris betweene him and his pursuers. The passages of the Riuer were well garded, and good espiall kept vpon Antigonus, to obserue which way he tooke. Before he came to Tigris: it felte, he was to passe ouer Coprates, a great Riuer, and not foordable, which he sought to doe by small vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Armie had gotten ouer, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge vpon Tigris, came with a thousand horse, and foure thousand foote, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and drave them headlong backe into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned, verie few escaping with life, except foure thousand that yeeld themselves prisoners, in sight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieue them. This losse made Antigonus glad to fall off; and the heate of that Countie in the dog-daies, breeding diseases in his Armie, by which many perished, caused him to remove as farre as into Media. So he tooke Pytho with him; (leauing Seleucus to besedge the Castle of Susa) and seeking to goe the nearest way, passed through sauage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arriue in Media, with his troups that were quite heart-broken.

§. III.

Of EVMENES his cunning. A battaile betwene him and ANTIGONVS.

AFTER his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their businesse. Faine he would haue had them to enter vpon those Provinces, which Antigonus had left behind him; to which also the Captaines of the Argyrasides or Silver-shielders were verie inclinable, as desiring to draw nearer to Greece. But Peucestes, and the rest, whose Dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their owne particular Estates, and would needs march Eastward. These carried it; for the Armie was not strong enough to diuide it selfe into parts.

When they came into Persia, Peucestes, ruling there, feasted them royally, and fought by all means to win the Souldiers loue to himselfe. Eumenes, perceiving wherunto those doings tended, suffred him awhile to keepe good cheare, till the time of warre drew nere. Then did he faigne an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes, Governor of Armenia, to Peucestes himselfe: The purport whereof was, that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and sent ouer a great Armie vnder Polyperchon, to ioine with Eumenes. These newes as they filled the Campe with vaine ioy, so they wrought in all mens mindes a great willingnesse to obey Eumenes, by whom was the likeliest apparence of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, hee being farre the most sufficient Commander, as they found soone after. For when Antigonus, comming out of Media, drew nere vnto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sicke, and faine to be carried in a litter, the Armie marched in verie bad array, and was likely to haue bene forced to take battaile in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Capitaines were amazed, was carried about the Armie in his litter, and vpon the sodaine did cast his men into so good forme, that Antigonus, perceiving him a farre off, could not reframe from giuing him delerued commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Capitaines, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiuing him, hee came to the triall of a battaile. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwile, hee was inferior in number both of horse and foot by a third part. The battaile was fought with variable success, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the victorie was vncertaine. For Eumenes could not force his men to lie farre from their carriages: by which meanes Antigonus (who had a more absolute command ouer his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; which was accounted the signe of victorie, for he buried his owne, and gaue leaue to his enemies, crauing it, to doe the like. But a greater signe of victorie had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and nor onely buried his men verie honourably, at great leisure, but held the Countrey round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (hauing tarried but one day) to beale away by night, and returne into Media, from whence he came.

§. III.

Of diuerse stratagems practised by ANTIGONVS, and EVMENES, one against the other.

THUS did the warre continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greater length, each part hauing stout Souldiers, and skilfull Generals; but the side which had hitherto preuailed, being hindered by the equall authoritie of many, from pursuing all aduantages to the best. Antigonus grew daily weaker in men and reputation, so that to repaire himselfe hee could find no way safer, than to put all to aduenture. He knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered farre asunder, so that if he could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distress. Betweene him and them, the way was not long, being onely nine dayes journey, but very bad, through a rough drie wilderness, hardly passeable. Another way, fairer, and leading through a Countrey well peopled, but requiring twentie fiue dayes journey, hee forsooke, partly for the length, partly and chiefly, because hee would come vndiscouered. So therefore taking his journey in the dead of Winter, he forbade vnto his men the vse of fire by night, because he would not haue them desired a farre off. This commendement had bene well obserued foure or fiue dayes, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bolde to cherish themselves, being neare to their wayes end. The light of these fires gaue notice of their coming; which being reported to Penceles, and other Capitaines, they were so astonished with the sodaine danger, that in all hast they betooke themselves to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to hearten his affrighted companions, promising to make Antigonus march leasurely, and willing them to abide, and draw vp their mentogether. They could scarce beleue him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as hee appointed, who failed not in making his word good. Hee tooke with him some companies of the readiest men, wherewith hee occupied certaine toppes of mountaines, looking toward the Campe of Antigonus: there he chose a conuenient ground to incampe vpon, and made great store of fires in sundrie places, as if the whole Armie had bene present. This was a sorrowfull spectacle to Antigonus, who thought himselfe preuented of his purpose; and began to feare least hee should be compelled compelled to fight, whilst his men were tired with a long and painefull journey. Therefore he refused to turne aside, & take the way to such places, as might better serue to refresh his Armie. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how readie Eumenes would be vpon all aduantages. But after a while, considering that no enemy stirred about him, he began to pause, and thinke in himselfe, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some inhabitants of that desert to be taken, and brought before him, of whom hee learned, that they had seene no other Armie than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on the hill-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to finde that hee had bene so deluded. Therefore hee went against these troupes with great furie, meaning to take sharpe vengeance on them, for hauing so deceiued him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arrived there, which could not bee forced without much businesse, and long stay. All the Armie was come, saue onely Eudamus, Captaine of the Elephants, who, besides those beastes, had no more than foure hundred horsemen in his companie. Antigonus hearing of this supply comming to his enemies, sent about two thousand horse, and all his light-armed footmen, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger, was faine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and so to defend himselfe as well hee could; for his horsemen, overlaid with multitudes were quickly broken, and driuen to runne away vpon the spur. Neither knew they, who fate vpon the Elephants, which way to turne them; for on all sides they receiued woundes, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremitie there appeared braue troupes of horse and foot, that came vnspected to their rescue; and charging the assaillants vpon the backe, draue them to seeke their owne safetie by speedie flight. These were sent by Eumenes: who though hee knew not what his aduersarie meant to doe, yet hee knew very well what was fittest for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games himselfe, prouided the remedie.

§. V.

The conspiracie of PEVCESTES and others, against EVMENES his life.

BY these meanes Eumenes wanne great honour, and was by the whole Armie acknowledged a most expert Generall, and well worthie of the chiefe command. But Penceles, and the other Capitaines, guiltie of their owne much insufficiencie, were so transported with enuie, that they could now no longer containe their vile thoughts, but held communication, as vpon a necessarie point, how they might finde meanes to murder him.

Surely, it is great iniustice to impute the mischiefe, contriued against wortheie men, to their owne proud carriage, or some other ill deserring: For, though it often happen, that small vices doe serue to counterpoise great vertues; (the sense of euill being more quicke and lasting, than of good) yet hee shall bewray a verie foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonie, will thinke it a part of wisdome, to find good reason of the euills, done to vertuous men, which often times haue no other cause than their vertue it selfe. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of singular courtelie, of a very sweet conuersation among his friends, and careful by all gentle meanes to winne their loue, that seemed to beare him any secret ill affection. It was his meere vertue that ouertrew him, which euen they that sought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that hee should not bee slaine, before the battaile were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safetie, to be gouerned by his directions. Of this reason, son, he was quickly aduertised by Endamius, to whom hee had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom he vsed to borrow monie when he needed not, to the end that they should be careful of his good, for feare of loosing their owne. Considering therefore, and discouering with himselfe of the villanie intended against him, hee made his last will, and burnt all his writings that contained any matter of secret: which done, hee reuolued many things in his minde; being doubtfull what course were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royall blood, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number, than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedonia and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to seeke their helpe, that needed his. To make his owne peace with Antigonius, had bene against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may bee thought, that hee forbore, either to loose the battaile willingly, or to flee into Cappadocia, and make shift for himselfe among his old friends. At length hee refused to doe his best against the common enemy, and afterwarde to looke to himselfe as well as he might.

§. VI.

The last battaile betwene ANTIGONIUS and EUMENES.

THe Souldiers, especially those old bandes of the siluer-shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victorie, but onely to bring them into the field, and set them in arraie, for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacritie was generally found in the common Souldiers faces, but the chiefe Commanders were so mischeiuously bent against him, that they could not endure to thinke vpon being beholding to him for the victorie. Yet hee ordered the battaile so well, that, without their owne great fault, they could hardly faile of getting the vpper hand.

Before the Armies came to joyning, a horseman from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice to the followers of Antigonius, That their wickedness, in fighting against their owne fathers, would now bee punished, as it well deserved. This was not spoken in vaine. For the Siluer-shields were men of threescore or seauentie yeares olde, strengthened more by continuall exercise, than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as hauing passed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that fight. Therefore Antigonius his men (who had often bene beaten by them, and were now to trie their last hope with these resolute warriors, the most Auncient and best regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew verie peniue, and aduanced heauily, suspesing their owne cause, and fearing that the threatnings vttered would proue true.

Antigonius was now againe farre the stronger in horse, which gaue him cause of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plaine leuelled field. Placing therefore himselfe and his sonne Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Pithon, he did set forward courageously against the enemies, that were readie to giue him a sharpe entertainment.

Eumenes tooke vnto him Peucestes, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his battaile, in the face of Antigonius, meaning both to prevent the Traitors, his Companions, of all meanes to make head against him on the sodaine, and (withall) to giue proofe of his owne valour, which perhaps he should no more doe, in the face of all his enemies. In the right wing, opposite vnto Pithon, hee bestowed the weakest of his horse and Elephants, vnder one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight light, and make a leisuable retreat, expecting the euent of the other side.

So they joyned verie fiercely; Antigonius, labouring to make himselfe master of all Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to winne such a victorie vpon his open enemies, as might giue him leisure and opportunitie to deale with his false friends.

The footmen of Antigonius, being, euen in their owne opinions, farre interior to those whom they must encounter, were at the first burnt presently discontent by the Siluer-shields, who slew about fife thousand of them, looting of their owne, not one man. But in horse, Eumenes was so ouer-matched, that he could not repel Antigonius, who pressed him very hard, but was faine to stand wholly vpon defense. Yet his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the enemy could not winne one foot of ground vpon him, vntill such time as Peucestes, with one thousand fife hundred horse, withdrew himselfe out of the battaile, leauing his companions fighting to defend his backe.

Then did Eumenes desperately rush amongst his enemies, labouring to breake open the way vnto Antigonius himselfe. And though hee failed of his purpose, yet with great slaughter hee did so beate vpon them, which came in his way, that the victorie hung a long time in suspence, vncertaine which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a slight sandie mould, through the trampling of horses, men, and Elephants, did cast vp such a cloude of dust, as hindered the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Antigonius finding this aduantage, dispatched away some companies of horse, that passed undiscovered beyond Eumenes his battailes, and came to his carriages, which lay about halfe a mile from the place of fight, slenderly garded, (for that the whole bodie of the Armie lay betwene them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Peucestes retired himselfe no further than vnto the carriages, he might not onely haue defended them, but peraduenture haue surprisid those which came to surprisid them, & so haue done as good a peece of seruice as a better man. But he was gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the euent: and Eumenes was so ouer-laboured both in bodie and minde, that he could not giue an eye to every place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonius had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himselfe enery way ouer-charged, began to giue backe, and withdrew himselfe and his companys in good order; to the other side of the battaile, where Philip (as hee was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from losse. The Antigonians had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were well contented to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come againe; as faine he would haue done.

The losse of the carriages was reported vnto him, as soone as he had any leisure to heare how things went, whereupon hee presently ordered his men for a fresh charge, and sent for Peucestes that was not farre off, requesting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby hee trusted, not onely to recover their owne goods, but to enrich themselves with the spoiles of the enemies. Peucestes not onely refused to joyne with him, but immediately withdrew himselfe into a safer place, where he might be further from such dangerous temptations.

By this the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to returne into their Campes. Yet Antigonius conceived hope of doing somewhat more; and therefore taking halfe his horsemen, he waited vpon Eumenes a part of his way homewardest, but found no opportunitie to offend him: the other halfe he committed to Pithon, willing him to set vpon the Siluer-shields in their retreat, which yet hee forbore to doe, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battaile ended; wherein Antigonius had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in foot: but the spoile which hee got, by surprisid his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other losses.

§. VII.

§. VII.

How EUMENES was betrayed to ANTIGONVS, and slaine.

V MENES, coming into his Campe, and finding the Siluer-shields extremely discontented with their misfortune, began to chere them vp, and put them in hope of recouering all with aduantage. For their braue demeanour that day had so cruſhed the enemy, that hee had no power left wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much leſſe able to draw their Cartes after him, through that great Wildernesse, our the high mountaines.

But these persuasions auailed nothing. Penceſtes was gone; the other Captaines would needs returne into the high Countries; & the Souldiers had no desire either to flie or to fight, but onely to recouer their goods. Wherefore Tentamus, one of the two Captaines of the Siluer-shields, (who had in former times readily consented vnto traitorous motions, in hope of game, but was letted by his partner Antigonus) finding, as he thought, a fit occasion of making himselfe great, and winning the loue of those bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to restore vnto those old Souldiers their goods, which he had taken, being the onely reward of their seruices in the warres of Philip, and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a subtle man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with a little entreatie performe a great deale more than they promised; and therefore he iouingly entertained the messengers, filling them with hopes of greater matters than they desired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make warre against him. This answer pleased them so well, that they forth with deuised how to deliuer him aliuē. Wherefore coming about him, as at other times, to doe their dutie, and pretending more joy of their victorie, than sorrow of their losse, which they said they would redeeme by another fight in the middelt of this goodly take they leapt vpon him, caught hold of his sword, and bound him fast. So they halld him away; and stopping their eares against all persuasions, would not yeeld so farre, as to loosen one of his handes and let him kill him selfe, but brought him aliuē (that was their owne Generall, vnder whom they had obtained many victories) as it had beene in triumph, into the Campe of their enemies.

The presse of men, running out of the Campe to see him, was so great, that Antigonus was faine to send a garrd of horsemen and Elephanes, to keepe him from being smothered, whom he could not sodainly resolue either to kill or saue. Verie few they were that sued for his life; but of these, Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus was one; the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly, thinking belike, that if hee were slaued, he would soon be the chiefe in great reputation, for his great abilitie. So after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded, that it was the safest way to put him to death, which intending to haue done by famine (perhaps because he would keepe it awhile in his own power to reuerſe the sentence, as desiring (if it might be) to haue him liue his friend, haſt of other businesse made him doe it by the sword.

To this end came all the traualles of the worthie Generall, Eumenes; who had with great wisdom, fidelitie, and patience, laboured in vaine, to vphold the family which God had purposed to cast downe. He is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutabilitie, but more notable was his gouernment of himselfe in all her changes. Aduersitie neuer lessened his courage, nor Prosperitie his circumspection. But all his vertue, industrie, and wir, were cast away, in leading an Armie, without full power to keepe it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered by Gaspar de Coligny, Admiral of France, in our dayes, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soone after in the massacre of Paris, That rather than to leade againe an Armie of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus himselfe gaue to the body of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deferred vengeance. One chiefe Captaine of the Siluer-shields he burnt aliuē; many of the other Captaines he slew; and to the whole multitude of the Siluer-shields, that had betrayed so worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader, that should carie them into farre Countries, vnder pretence of warres; but with a priue charge, to consume them all, as periuied wretches, letting none of them returne aliuē vnto his friends and kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas, that beate vpon the shoares of Greece and Macedonia.

§. VIII.

How ANTIGONVS slew PITHON, an occupied MEDIA. How hee removed Generourns of Provinces, and made himselfe Lord of Persia, carrying away PEUCESTES.

HE two Armies being ioyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter; the common Souldier idly, the principall men intently bent vnto the businesse ensuing. Pithon began to consider his owne deservings; for that the whole warre had bene chiefly maintained by the strength and riches of his Province. Besides, he thought himselfe as good a man as Antigonus, inlesse it were in the souldiers opinion, which he iudged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to assay them with great liberaltie. But in following this course, hee was driuen by necessitie to trust many, of whom he stumbled vpon some, that were vnſeruet, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose discovered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Pithon) dissembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of diſſention betwene him, and his honourable friend, vnto whom hee meant to commit the Gouernment of all those Countries: his owne businesse calling him into the lower Asia. These reportes, coming daily to his eares, did finely delude Pithon. By his greatnesse with Alexander, his authoritie in that Province where they lay, whereof he was Gouernour; and the loue of the souldiers which he had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintaine, euen an offensiue warre. But what neede had he to vse the sword, when hee was likely without contention, to obtaine more than his owne asking? Therefore he came as soone as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to diuide the Provinces with him, that meant nothing lesse than to yeeld to any such diuision. As soone as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and slaine out of hand. For Antigonus, hauing begunne with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old acquaintance, from cutting downe indifferently all that stood in his way: but swamme carelessly through the blood, wherin at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this businesse was ended, he appointed a new Gouernour in Media, to order the Province; and a Captaine, to suppress all commotions: thinking belike, that the power and authoritie, so diuided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were deriued.

After this, he marched into Persia, where he was entertained, as absolute Lord of Asia. There began he to shew how well he vnderstood his owne mightinesse. For he placed and displaced, at his pleasure, Gouernours in all Provinces; leauing none in Office, that were not his owne creatures, excepting such as lay too farre off to bee dislodged easily.

Penceſtes, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheare to redeeme old offences; but was deceiued; hauing to doe with one, that could not be taken with such baits: he was caried away, and sealed with goodly words of promise, that neuer tooke effect. Thus he, that enuid the vertue of his friend, was driuen to flatter (in vaine) the the fortune of his enemies; after which he liued a contemptible life, till hee died ob-scurely a man forgotten.

How SELEVCUS was chased out of Babylon, by ANTIGONVS. The great riches of ANTIGONVS.

SELEVCUS was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good-will to Antigonvs, and now gaue proofe of his heartie affection toward him, by making the Captaine of the Cattle of Susa to meete him on the way, rendering vnto him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonvs (though having in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleue it; but vsed him with excessive kindnesse, for teare so good a moode should change. In that Cattle he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Perſian Kings, which, added to his former store of money, made vp twentie five thousand talents. Having all this, he might well account himselfe a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the mark at which he aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent, to leaue no Countie behind his backe, that should not acknowledge him for Soueraigne Lord.
Comming to Babylon, he was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of loue, and honoured with presents, beſeeming the maiestie of a King. All this he accepted with great grautie, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the reuenues of that Prouince. This demand Seleucus held vnreasonable, saying, that it was not needfull for him to render vnto any man an account of that Prouince, which was giuen vnto him, in respect of his many good seruices to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonvs was power-full; who vrged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessitie, moued Antigonvs to presse him thus, but only the desire to picke matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that he should find such issue, as Pithon and Peneſter had done. Therefore taking with him onely fiftie horse, he conueied himselfe away, and fled into Ptolomes Dominions; desiring him to protect him from the violence of such a man, as went about to opresse all, that in former times had bene his betters, or at least his equals. Antigonvs was glad of his flight; for now all those Countiees were yeelded vnto him without battaile, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them hee wanted all pretences and to kill him it was not his desire, hauing receiued many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any iniuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldeans brought a strange prophetic to Antigonvs, bidding him looke well to himselfe, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, hee should recouer Babylon, yea, winne all Asia, and kill Antigonvs in battaile. Easie believers may giue credit to this tale. Had it bene true, methinkes, Antigonvs rather should haue hanged those Chaldeans, for giuing him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that he did) after him, whome the destinies preferred for so great purposes.

When hee had ſetled things at Babylon, he tooke his iourne into Cilicia, where he wintred. There he tooke vp ten thousand talents more of the Kings treasures, and caſting his accounts, found his yearly income to amount vnto cleauen thouſand Talents.

§. I.

The combination of PTOLOMIE, CASSANDER, and others, against ANTI-GONVS. Their demands and his answer.

HIS great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonvs dreaded, enuied, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new War. Ptolomie, Casſander, and Lysimachus, had priuily combined themſelues together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason, than of his owne accord he ſeemed like to yeeld vnto. Of their practiſes hee had ſome notice; the good entertainment giuen vnto Seleucus, giuing him ſufficient cauſe of miſtruſt. Therefore he ſent Embaſſadors to them ſeuerally, entreating them to continue firme in their loue toward him, that would be ready to requite them with the like. The cold an-ſweres which they made, occaſioned his haſty preparation againſt the moſt forward of them, which was Ptolomie; it being likely that a good armie ſhould preuaile more than a faire meſſage. Therefore, as ſoone as the ſeaſon of the yeare would permit, he tooke the way toward Syria, and was encountred by Embaſſage from them all.
Theſe told him, that their Lords did much reioyce at his victorie, obtained againſt Enmenes their common enemy, and the honor that he had thereby gotten. In which war, ſo far as much as they being his Confederates muſt haue endured great loſſe, with hazard of their whole eſtates, if the contrarie faction had preuailed; they held it very iuſt, that all ſhould be partakers in the fruits of that voiage, wherein they had bene all aduenturers. Wherefore they deſired him, that making betweene them all an equall diuiſion, of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing calfe to be done) he would alſo take ſome conuenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchaſes. This might beſt bee to euery ones liking, if hee would make ouer Cappadocia, with Lyſia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering vpon the Hellespont, to Lysimachus; ſo that whereas his own Dominions were ſo much extended Eaſtward by his late victorie, he might well ſpare ſome of thoſe weſterne Prouinces, to thoſe that were ſeated in the Weſt. As for Ptolomie, he would not craue any new addition, but reſt contented within his owne Territories. Provided alwaies, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be reſtored to his owne, out of which hee had bene driuen ſo iniuriouſly, that all of them were forced to take it deeplie to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly conſent vnto their demands, which otherwiſe they muſt labour to obtaine with armed hands.

Antigonvs knew, that after many loſſes receiued, hee ſhould yet be able to re-deeme peace when ſoever he liſted, with theſe, or perhaps with eaſier conditions.
Neither was he ſo weak, to giue away quietly any part of his ſtrength into the hands of ſuch be-ſet friends, for ſcare onely, leaſt it ſhould be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he ſhould be able to find them worke, more than enough to de-ſend their owne. Therefore, he roundly answered the Embaſſadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profits of that victorie, which he alone without other mens helpe had obtained. Though indeede they had alreadie ſufficiently gained by him, if they could ſee it, hauing by his meanes kept

their

their governments, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polyperchon, and the council of estate in Macedon. But what meruaile was it, if they considered not how he had faued them, seeing one of them had forgotten the time, when coming to him as a fugitive, and begging succour, he was by his meere bountie relieued, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (saide he) in those daies command me to surrender Prouinces, and giue him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers sake) desired me to pittie him, and help him against his enemies: which I did; by lending him an Armie, and Fleet, on confidence whereof hee now presumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, how can he complaine of wrong, that durst not stay to please his right? I did vse him well, but his conscience told him that he had deserued ill: else he would not haue fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their owne, which some of them can hardly iustifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings; and after him to deale with others, if they continue to prouoke me.

§. III.

The preparations and beginnings of the Warrs.

WHen the Embassadors were dismisht with this answer, nothing was thought vpon but warre. Antigonus perceiving that he should bee invaded from Europe, as loon as hee were entered into Syria; left his Nephew Ptolome to guard the Sea-coasts, and hinder Cassander from landing in Asia: giuing him also in charge, to driue out of Cappadocia some that were already sent out to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cyprus, not vnfruition of monie, to draw friends to his side, and raise vp troubles to his enemies. Especially he laboured to make himselfe the strongest by Sea; to which purpose he rather hastened, than forelloved his iourne into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanus, which alforded many excellent commodities for building of a Nauie. Therefore, hauing erected Beacons, and laid post-horles throughout all Asia, to giue swift aduertisement of all occurrences, hee invaded Syria, that was not held against him by any power sufficient to maintain the field.

Ptolome lay in Aegypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloved and honoured of the people as their naturall Lord: his other Prouinces hee kept with a few Garrisons, better seruing to containe the people within obedience, than to confront a forraigne enemy. So Antigonus tooke many Cities, and Places of that Countrey, and begane to let great numbers of Artificers on worke in making ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these buisnesses hee consumed a yeare and three months; not idly. For he tooke Ioppe, and Gaza, which were yielded vnto his discretion, and well vld. The strong Citie of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end, by famine, to render it selfe vpon compulsion, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Armes; which was permitted.

Ptolome was not asleepe, whilst these things were in doing, though he kept himselfe within the bounds of Aegypt, as indeede it behoued him to doe. His forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plaine field, but likely they were to increase, which made him willing to protract the time. Neuertheless by Sea (where his enemy was as yet vnready) he sent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chiefe command.

Seleucus passed with an hundred saile along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Armie, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then gouerned by many petty Lords; of whom the greatest adhered to Ptolome; the rest were, by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Aegyptian with sharpe Steele.

The same commoditie of saide by Sea encouraged the President of Caria (called also also Cassander, but not the sonne of Antipater, howsoever by the painefull and learned writer Reinerus Reinecius, he is by some ouer-light, counted for the same) to declare for Ptolome, and his Confederates, and busily employ in their quarrell all his forces, which hee had hitherto kept in good neutralitie, and thereby enioyed rest; but now hee threw himselfe into dangerous warre, choosing rather to vndergoe trouble at hand, than to fall vnder certaine ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would haue ouerwhelmed him, if Antigonus had braten all the rest.

§. III.

How each partie sought to winne the assistance of Greece. ANTIGONVS his declaration against CASSANDER. ALEXANDER the sonne of POLYSPERCHON reuolseth from ANTIGONVS, who had set him up.

IN the meane season all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure vnto them the people of Greece, whose aide which way soeuer it inclined was of great importance. Herein at the first Antigonus sped so well by large cession of his treasure, that he drew to him the Lacedaemonians, and other Peloponnesians, of whom hee waged eight thousand, and caused Polyperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowle himselfe againe, and taking vpon him the title of Captaine of Peloponnesus, to make head against Cassander.

These hopeful beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kinde. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, hee called together both his owne Souldiers, and all the Greekes and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, That Cassander had very cruelly slaine Olympias, mother to the great Alexander; and not herewith contented, had shut vp in close prison the poore Ladie Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his sonne begotten on her bodie. That all this proceeded from a desire to make himselfe King ouer the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Ladie Thessalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match vnto for a man of no greater Parentage than he, to ioyne with him in marriage. That in meere despight of those dead Princes, Philip, and Alexander, hee had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new Citie by him built, and called by his owne name Cassaneria; and had reedified the Citie of Thebes, which for the great treason of the Inhabitants, was leuelled with the ground by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons hee required them to make a decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute libertie the Ladie Roxane, and her sonne; and should yeeld obedience to the Lord Lieutenant General of the Empire (by which name Antigonus himselfe was vnderstood) or else should be reputed a Traitor, and open Enemy to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should be restored into freedome, this he did, not because he was carrell of their good, but for the neede which he had of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not only the Greekes would adhere vnto him, as to their louing Patron, and fall off from Cassander; but that the Rulers of Prouinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing, but his owne benefit, would correct their opinion, and thinke him the most faithfull of all others to the Roiall blood. But concerning his loyalty to the young Prince, the world was too wife to be deceiued with vaine shewes. His vnder-taking for the libertie of the Greekes was more effectuall, and got eadie beliefe, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet herein also Ptolome strove to be as earnest as he, making the like decree, in hope to winne to himselfe that valiant Nation, which alforded men farre more seruicable in warre, than were to be found in any Prouince of the Empire.

And this indee was the point, at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all sure, deceiued himselfe, not without great cost. For he gaue to Alexander the sonne of Palsiparchon five hundred talents, willing him to set the warre on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appeare, that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus, Cassanders men had, with much bloud-shed, grievously afflicted the contrarie faction; and he himselfe perceiving, that they were more easily spoiled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way, to make what use he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiving that Alexander came furnished with plenty of gold, wherewith he was able, not only to winne the doubtfull, but to corrupt such as might seeme best assured: hee thought it a good part of wisdom, to surrender vpon faire conditions, that which he could not assure himselfe to hold any long time by force. Therefore, he sent one to deale with Alexander, about the matters in controuersie, letting him know, that Antigonus was very skilfull in setting men together by the eares, not caring who prevailed, but only desiring to haue them wearie themselves, whilst he was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might finde oportunitie to set vpon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keepe in his purse the five hundred Talents which he had, and without stroke bricken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus; it should be freely put into his hands by Cassander. Provided, that hee should from thenceforth, renounce all confederacie made with Antigonus, and enter into a sure and faithfull league with Ptolemie, Cassander, and the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise, hee might well perswade himselfe, that the Countrie which his Father could not keepe, when he was indeede the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste be wonne by him, that was only the Factor of a proud injurious man, forsaking himselfe, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had liued a while with Antigonus since the beginning of these wars; among whose followers it was not hard to discouer the intent, (which hee did not carrie verie secret) of making himselfe absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soone entreated to accept of good an offer; and did not stick to enter into that league, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subiect vnto no mans controll.

Howbeit this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together, by treason of the Sicontians; who thinking thereby to haue made themselves free, were soone after vanquished in battaile by Cratesipolis, Alexanders wife, a discreet and valiant Ladie. Shee in reuenge of her husbands death crucified thirtie of the Citizens taken in fight; and hauing by severitie taught them obedience, did afterwards containe her Armie in good order, and governed those places that hee held, with the loue and commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

§. IIII.

The Aetolians rise against Cassander in fauour of ANTIGONVS, and are beaten. A fleet and land-armie of ANTIGONVS, utterly defeated by PTOLEMIES Lieutenant. In what termes the warre stood at this time. ANTIGONVS drawes nearer to Greece.

ANTIGONVS, when he found, that with so much monie he had only bought an enemy, beganne to raise troubles to Cassander and his other aduersaries, in Greece, by stirring vp the Aetolians against them; Likewise he laboured to winne to his partie, the Ilans in the Greeke Seas, by whose assistance he might bee the better able to deale with Ptolemie, that greatly prevailed by reason of his strong fleet. But neither of these attempts had the successe which he expected. The Aetolians, a fitious Nation, and alwaies enuying the greatnesse of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their gaires equalled not their losses. Cassander wanne some of their owne Countrie, fortified the Acarnanians against them, and compelled Glauces, King of the Ilyrians, whom he vanquished in battaile, to forsake their tide, and binde himselfe to beare no armes against Cassanders friends.

On the other side, as many petty Ilands were drawne to ioyne with Antigonus: so the Fleet of the Rhodians vnder Theodatus, who was Admirall to Antigonus, passing along the coast of Asia toward Cyprus, with an Armie vnder conduct of Perilaus marching on the shore for mutuall assistance, was quite ouerthrowne by Ptolemies Nauike. Polyctus, who in Ptolemies behalfe had bene sent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding no neede of his seruice in that Countrie, because Alexander was come ouer to their tide, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom hee very cunningly surpris'd. Hee rode with his Fleet behinde a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces hee placed in ambush, whereto Perilaus falling, was taken prisoner, with many of his men, and many were slaine, making little resistance. Theodatus the Admirall perceiving this, made all halt to helpe his fellowes that were on Land; but whilst hee with all his Fleet were intentie only to that business, Polyctus appeared at their backs; who as soone as he perceived their disorder, hastened about the Cape, and charging them behinde suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings caused Antigonus to deale with Ptolemie about some composition. First, hee sent Embassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld vnto the demands of Ptolemie: so the parlie was vain.

Hitherto each part seemed to haue indifferently sped in the Warre, and thereby to haue equal cause of hope and feare. This late victorie with the good successe of his affaires in Cyprus, did seeme to make amends to Ptolemie for his losses in Syria. Likewise the rebolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equal the Confederacie made betweene the Aetolians and him; as also those petty skirmishes, that had bene in Asia the lesse, to Antigonus his aduantage, were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but aduerser to him; and by the troubles brought vpon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the losse of his men, monie, and ships, no other wise than as the pating of his nailes, that were left long enough, and would easily grow againe; but the enlargement of his Territorie by addition of Syria, he priz'd at a higher rate, as if thereby hee had fed vpon a limbe of Ptolemies his enemy, and strengthened the bodie of his owne Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoize the bad, he meant to proceede as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no monie.

That which most molested him was the attempts of his enemies vpon Asia the lesse; wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to feare, lest the people, being tied vnto him by no bond of allegiance, might vpon small occasion reuolt from him, to men of as honorable reputation as hee himselfe. To prevent this, and to be nearer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be therein person, where his affaires did seeme to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Armie in Syria, vnder his sonne Cnemertus, to whom, being then but two and twentie yeares old, he appointed many ancient Captaines as assistants, or rather as Directors: the rest he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

§. V.

How LYSIMACHUS and CASSANDER vanquished some enemies, raised against them by ANTIGONVS. The good successe of ANTIGONVS in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against CASSANDER.

THe coming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the procelle of his businesse therabouts. For his enemies had short leisure to thinke vpon molleling him in Asia: they themselves were held ouer-hardly to their owne worke on Europe side. Seuthes a King of the Thracians, ioyning with some Townes that rebelled against Lysimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrell. All these relied vpon Antigonus, who was to helpe them with monie, and other aide. The Asiatians likewise tooke courage, and rose against Cassander, hauing Acidies, lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistant. But Lysimachus gaue vnto his Rebels no time to confirme themselves. Hee sodainly presented himselfe before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by feare to returne to their dutie. He fought a battaile with the Scythians, and wild Thracians, and draue them out of the Countrie. Finally, he ouer-came Seuthes; and following the heat of his victorie, slew Pausanias in battaile, whom Antigonus had sent ouer with an Armie; and all his men he did either put to ranfome, or fill vp with them his owne Bands. The like successe had Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Asiatians. For he wasted their Countrie; fought with the Epiriotes, that came to helpe them; and after the victorie, fought againe with their forces ioyned in one, ouerthrowing them, and killing Acidies that vnfortunate King. Finally, hee draue the Asiatians out of most of their Countrie, and forced them to seeke their safetie among the wild Mountaines. Of the Epiriotes he sent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present Warre.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his aduerfaries with painefull trauaile; after which they remained only fauers. Antigonus himselfe at faire leisure wanne all Caria the whilet, and sent Armies into Peeloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing libertie vpon all the Cities he tooke out of Cassanders hands. The whole Countrie of Peeloponnesus (excepting Sicion and Corinth) with the Ile of Euboea, and many places of the firme Land were by these meanes wonne to be his in true and vehement affection, readie to doe or suffer any thing for him, that had made so euident a demonstration of his readinesse, to giue them the libertie indeede, which others promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefit, would faine haue shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassanders Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if he would passe ouer into Macedon, by which terror he forced Cassander to repaire thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leauing many good Townes of Greece to weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to helpe themselves, if any forraigne succour appeared. The aide which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenants of Antigonus, taking the aduantage of Cassanders departure, entered the Countrie; draue his Garrisons out of diuers Cities; forced the Governour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wanne the Citadell of Thebes, and let the people at libertie. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before beene raised out of her old ruines by the meere power of Cassander; of which act hee was accused by Antigonus, as if it had beene some heinous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the Citie, and the loue of the Inhabitants, only by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thanke the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to looke forward vpon those hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward vpon their miserable nullitie, that held them vncapable of being any thing.

§. VI.

Victories of PTOLOMIE by Sea. A great battaile at Gaza, which

PTOLOMIE and SELEUCVS wanne, against DEMETRIUS, the Sonne of ANTIGONVS.

AS the presence or nearnesse of Antigonus gaue life to his affaires in the lower Asia, and Greece, so the designs of his enemies, taking aduantage of his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great works in the Easterne parts, wherewith in the yeare preceeding hee had ouertopped them. The Ile of Cyprus, whose Princes wauered betwene contrarie affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their covenant with Ptolomie, was visited by an Egyptian fleet, wherewith Ptolomie, in his owne person, easily reduced them to a more settled order, putting some to death, carrying others away prisoners, and leaving a Lieutenant of his owne appointment, Governour of the whole Countrie. With the same fleet he ranne along the Sea-coasts, wasting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the spoiles of which he enriched his followers, and returned laden to Cyprus. Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherewith his Fathers Subjects were oppressed, made all halt out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his Horse and light-armed foot with him, because the businesse required expedition. But in vaine did he tire himselfe and his followers, in halfe seeking of one, that by lanching out into the deepe could in a few minutes deliue the labour of so many dayes, if neede had forrequired. Answerable to the vanie of this expedition, was the successe. For Ptolomie was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certain, whether hauing lightened his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, hee would returne vpon those maritime Countries, or make toward Syria, where his coming was expected. Hee was indeede gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a royall Armie, which helmed with all conuenient speede, for the recovery of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore hee was faine to choose out of vncertainties the most likelyhood, and returne the way that hee came, with all his companies, which were fitter for seruice in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. Hee had scarce refreshed his Men and Horses in Syria, when the newes arrived of Ptolomies coming with a puissant Armie, to giue him battaile. Hereupon he called to counsaile his principall friends, who aduised him to giue way to the time, and expect some better oportunitie in the future: being a young man, and weakly furnished with meanes to resist such ancient and famous Generalls, as Ptolomie and Seleucus. This counsaile seemed rather to proceede from the cold temper of those aged men, than that they gaue it, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering himselfe to bee the sonne of Antigonus, and now Generall of his Fathers Armie, thought his owne title weightie enough to bee laid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found hee much reason that should moue him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, and promised as much as could be required. Therefore perswading himselfe, that such odds of number, and of great fame, would rather serue to adorne his victorie, than hinder him in obtaining it, hee resolved to put the matter to triall, without expecting the aduantage of more helpe. So animating his Souldiers with hope of spoile and rewards, hee abode the coming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soone as they had finished their wearisome iourne ouer the Deserts of Arabia.

Ptolomie

Ptolome and Seleucus tising out of so rich a Province, as Aegypt, came so well provided of all necessaries, that their Armie felt no any great grievance of the cill way, when battaile was presented thm, which confidently they vnderooke. In all things else they had the ods of Demetrius; of Elephants they were wterly vnprouided. But how to deale with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kinde of Palisado, latched together with chaines, and sharpened in such manner, that the Elephants could not seeke to breake vpon it, without receiuing much hurt. The rest of their forces, which (besides that they had aduantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate seruices, by them performed that year, whilst the enemies had wearied themselves, either with vaine iournies, or long and dulling expectation, they disposed in such order, as best answered to the forme, wherein Demetrius was embattailed. The fight beganne, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time, each part struing more to winne honour, than to satisfie any other passion, as hauing little cause of hatred, or reuenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who vpon no needefulle would needes fight a battaile with disadvantage, beganne to appere by his losses. Hee had committed himselfe to Fortune, hauing more to loose by her than he could get: but in this fight thce was idle, and lett all to be decided by strong hands; vnlesse it may be said, that the terror brought vpon his men, by the losse of his Elephants, was bad luck. Those beasts were in that kind of warre hardly to be relied on plaine ground, and therefore at the first they made great spoile amongst Ptolomies men. Afterward seeking to breake through the Palisado, they were forcibly hurt, and euery one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horsemen of Demetrius to flint. They had laboured hard, and prouailed little, till now perceiuing that all must lie vpon their hands, who were ill able to make their owne places good, they beganne to shrink, and many of them to prouide for their safetie by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had throuen so long in vaine to make his men abide, that hee himselfe was likely to be lost; he was faine to giue place to the stronger, making a violent retreat as farre as to Asotus, which was about thirtie miles from the place of battaile. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his companie turned aside, hoping to saue such goods, as in hast they could pack vp. This foolish couetousnesse was their destruction, and the losse of the Towne. For whilst they forgetfull of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter Horses, and cloied vp the gates, thronging, some to get in and tereh, others, to carrie out what they had already laden. Ptolomies Armie brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods and the Citieal together.

This victorie restored vnto Ptolomie the best part of Syria, a Province more easie in those times to get, than to keepe; and opened the way vnto all the greatnesse of Seleucus. For between Gaza and Phœnicia no place offered resistance. In Calestria and Phœnicia, some townes held out a while, but were soone taken in by Ptolomie. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was giuen vp by the Inhabitants; Tyrrus by the Garrison, falling to mutinie against their Capitaine; who trusting to the strength of it, had made grear vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomie, and honorably entertained, in respect of his fidelitie.

¶ VII.

How SELEVCVS recovered Babylon, and made himselfe Lord of many Countreies in the higher Asia. The REA of the Kingdome of the Greekes, which beganne with this Dominion of SELEVCVS.

While Ptolomie followed his businesse with such prosperitie, Seleucus tooke leaue of him, and went vp to Babylon, to trie his owne fortune; which hee found so fauourable, that recouering first his owne Province, hee came at length master of the better part of Alexanders purchases.

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of vnliklihoods. His traine of no more then eight hundred foote, and two hundred horse, a number too small, to haue bene placed as Garrison, in some one of those maine great Cities, against which he carried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needfull, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the walls. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found so good a Gouvernour, that none of them would finde courage to resist him; but lest that worke to Antigonus his owne men, wishing them, ill to speede. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of warre, which by calic compulsion they left off, and followed new Enligens. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselves ioyfully to Seleucus. In a defection so generall, it was not a safe course: for euery man of them should haue bene troubled with daily enemies, in his owne lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and trie the matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who reuolted to the enemy, with more then a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismayed the rest, that they did no more than seeke to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hottages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his securitie in those quarters. This Cattle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly tooke it; and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had bellowed in Media and Persia, forces conuenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the vtmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his owne great Armie lay betweene them and all enemies. Therefore when the victorie at Gaza, had opened vnto Seleucus the way into those parts; he found little impediment in the rest of his businesse. Hauing now gotten what he fought; it behoued him to seeke how he might keepe his gettings: for his owne forces were too small and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not doe for him; his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Armie in Media, ioyning vnto himselfe, out of Persia and other Countries, all needfull helpe, came with ten thousand foote, and seuen thousand horse, either to saue all from being lost, or to driue Seleucus out of that which he had wonne.

Against this power, Seleucus had only foure hundred horse, and somewhat about three thousand foot, wherewith to oppose himselfe: his large conquest of vnwarlike Nations hauing yeelded him many louing subjects, but few souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were neare to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himselfe from the place where his resistance was expected into certaine marishes not farre off; where he lay secretly waiting for some aduantage. Nicanor thought that hee had bene fled, and was the lesse carefull in fortifying his campe. In recompence of this vaine securitie, his campe was taken by surprize, the first night of his arrival; the the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Perſia, together with ſundrie of the Captaines, were ſlaine, he himſelfe was driuen to flee for his life into the Deſerts; and the whole Armie yeelded vnto Seleucus: whoſe gentle demeanour, after the victorie, drew all Media, Suſians, and the Neighbour Prouinces, to acknowledge him their Lord, without any further ſtroke ſtricken.

This victorie of Seleucus gaue beginning vnto the new ſtile, of The Kingdome of the Greekes, an accompt much vſed by the Iewes, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in thoſe parts. I will not make any long diſputation about the firſt yeare of this Æra. The authoritie of that great Altrologer Ptolomie, from which, there is no appeale, makes it plaine, that the ſixe hundred and nineteenth yeare of NABONASSAR, was the fourſcore and two yeare of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needleſſe, than that note of the learned GAVRICVS, That the firſt of theſe yeares was reckoned compiet, at Babylon, together with the end of ſoure hundred thirtie and eight yeares after NABONASSAR. With the obſcuration of the Saturne, recorded by Ptolomie, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Buning; finding the ſame Planer to haue bene ſo placed in the ſigne of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had obſerued it, in the ſame yeare; which was from Nabonaſſar the five hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourſcore and two yeare; and the laſt of the hundred thirtie and ſeuenth Olympiad. Theſe obſervations of the Ceſtiall bodies, are the ſureſt markes of time: from which he that wiſely varies, is inexcusable. As for ſuch occurrences in Hiſtorie, and the yeares of ſucceeding Princes (that are not ſeldome ambiguous, by reaſon of vnmembred fractions) if they ſeeme to be here-againſt, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthe of note; that theſe yeares of the Greekes, were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one yeare, that is found betwene actions, related by ſeuerall Authors of the two Bookes of the Machabees, who follow diuers accompts. He that ſhall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomie, may apply the other ſupputations therunto, as being no farther from it, than a yeares diſtance.

§. VIII.

How PTOLOMIE loſt all that he had wonne in Syria. What the cauſes were of the quiet obedience, perſonne vnto the Macedonians, by thoſe that had bene ſubjected vnto the Perſian Empire. Of diuers petite enterprizes, taken in hand by ANTIGONVS and DEMETRIVS, with ill ſucceſſe.

N A happie houre did Seleucus adventure, to goe vp to Babylon, with ſo few men as his friend could then well ſpare: for had he ſtaied longer vpon hope of getting more ſouldiers, Ptolomie could haue ſpared him none at all, Demetrius the ſonne of Antigonus, hauing loſt the battaile at Gaza, receiued from Ptolomie all his owne goods, his Pages and Seruants, in free gift, and therewithall a courteous meſſage, to this effect: That no perſonall hatred was the ground of this Warre, which hee and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but only termes of honour, wherein they would ſecke to right themſelues after ſuch manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, ſhould not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomie, did kindle in Demetrius an earneſt deſire, of requiting him, with ſome as braue liberalitie. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troups; drew as many as could be ſpared, out of the Garrifons in Cilicia, or other Prouinces thereabouts; and aduerting his Father of his miſfortune, beſought him to ſend a new ſupply, wherewith he might redeeme his honour loſt. Antigonus, vpon the firſt newes of this ouerthrow, had ſaid,

That

That the victorie which Ptolomie wanne vpon a beardedleſſe Boy, ſhould bee taken from him by bearded men: yet vpon deſire that his ſonne, whom hee tenderly loued, ſhould amend his owne reputation, He was content to make a ſtand in Phrygia. Ptolomie hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did neuertheleſſe follow his owne buſineſſe in Celeſyria; thinking it enough, to ſend part of his Armie vnder Cilles his Lieutenant, againſt the remnant of thoſe that had bene already vanquiſhed, when their forces were entire. His peraduenture would haue bene ſufficient: had not Cilles too much vnderualued the power of ſuch an Enemy. Hee thought that this young Gallant, hauing lately ſaued his life by flight, would now bee more careful of hauing a faire way at his back, than aduenturous in ſetting further forward, then vrgent reaſon ſhould prouoke him. In this confidence he paſſed on without all feare, as one that were already Maſter of the field, and ſhould meete with none, that would iſſue out of their places of ſtrength, to make reſiſtance. When Demetrius was informed of this careleſſe march; he tooke the lighteſt of his Armie, and made his iourne with ſuch diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came vpon Cilles vnexpected, and was on the ſuddaine, without any battaile, Maſter of his Campe: taking him aliue, with his ſouldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit ſerued not only to repaire the credit of Demetrius, which his loſſe at Gaza had almoſt ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bounty of Ptolomie, with equall fauor, in reſtoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich preſents. But neither was Ptolomie ſo weakened by this loſſe, nor Demetrius ſo emboldened by his victorie, that any matter of conſequence there-vpon enſued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Ptolomie; and therefore he fortified himſelfe in places of aduantage: Ptolomie on the other ſide was loath to engage himſelfe in an enterpriſe, wherein he might perceiue, that if the coming of Antigonus found him entangled, he ſhould either be driuen to make a ſhamefull retreat, or a dangerous aduenture of his whole eſtate, in hope of not much more than already he poſſeſſed.

Antigonus, in deede, was nothing ſlow in his way towards Syria; whither hee made all haſte, not ſo much to relieue his ſonne, as to embrace him. For hee rejoyced exceedingly, that the young man had ſo well acquitted himſelfe, and being left to his owne aduice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increaſe the reputation of this late victorie, he brought ſuch forces, as might ſerue to reconquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all, ſhould be referred vnto the good foundation, laied by his ſonne; whom from this time forwards, he imploied in matters of greateſt importance.

Ptolomie had now leſſe reaſon, to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming to haue aſſailed the Campe of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of conſultation; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captaines aduiled him to retire into Egypt; alleging many good arguments, to that purpoſe: which they might well perceiue to bee agreeable to his owne intent, by his propounding that counſel; not without remembrance of the good ſucceſſe againſt Perdiccas, in the like deſenſiue warre, So he departed out of Syria, preſeruing his honor; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any ſuddaine paſſion of feare: and he departed at faire leiſure, not only carrying his treaſures along with him, but ſtaying to diſmantle ſome principall Cities, that he thought moſt likely to trouble him in the future. All the Countrey that he left at his back, felt preſently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by peeces: ſo eaſie was it in thoſe times, for the Captaine of a ſtrong Armie, to make himſelfe Lord of a great Prouince.

We may juſtly wonder, that theſe Kingdomes of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations, (which the victorie of Alexander had ouer-runne, with ſo haſtic a courſe, as gaue him not leiſure to take any good view of them) were ſo eaſily held not only by himſelfe, but by the Captaines of his Armie after him. The betentions for superiortie betweene the King of Israel, and those of Damascus; betweene Egypt, and Babylon; Babylon, and Nimue; the Perfians, and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to haue once bene in those people; which are now so patient of a forraigne yoke, that like Sheepe or Oxen, they suffer themselves to be distributed, fought for, wonne, lost, and againe recovered, by contentious Masters; as if they had no title to their owne heads, but were borne to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appeare the more strange, if wee shall consider, how the severall States of Greece (many of which had neuer possessed so large Dominion, as might cause their Spirits to (well beyond their abilities) did greedily embrace all occasions of libertie: and how these proud Conquerors were glad to offer it, desiring to haue them rather friends than seruants, for feare of further inconvenience.

It muſt therefore be noted, that moſt of theſe Countries, had alwaies bene ſubject vnto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords; whom the Babylonians and Perfians long ſince had rooted out, & held them in ſuch bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraigne Maſters. This had vterly taken from them all remembrance of home-borne Princes, & incorporated them into the great body of the Perſian Empire: ſo that wanting within themſelves all ſoueraign power, or high authority, the life and ſpirit of euery Eſtate; then lay aſ dead, and were bereaued of motion, when that Kingdome fell, whereof they lately had bene members.

Why the Perſian Satrapa, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captaines, after the death of Alexander, ſtrive to lay hold vpon thoſe Prouinces, which had many ages bene ſubject vnto them, and ſcarce foure yeares in quiet poſſeſſion of their enemies; or why at leaſt they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did ceaſe to aſſright them) to get their ſhares among his followers, if not wholly to diſpoſſeſſe them of their new purchaſes: it is a queſtion, wherein, who is not ſatisfied, may finde no leſſe reaſon to ſuſpect the Hiſtorie, than authoritie to confirme it. For wee ſeldome reaſe, that any ſmall Kingdome, preuailling againſt a farre greater, hath made ſo entire a conqueſt, in the compaſſe of ten yeares, as left vnto the vanquiſhed no hope of recouerie, nor meanes to rebell; eſpecially when ſuch diſorders, or rather vter conuulſion hath enſued, by the furie of ciuill warre among the Victors.

The cauſe why the Macedonians held ſo quietly the Perſian Empire, is well ſet downe by Maſchiuſell, and concerneſ all other Kingdomes, that are ſubject vnto the like forme of Gouvernement: the ſumme whereof is this. Whereſoeuer the Prince doth hold all his Subjects vnder the condition of ſlaues; there is the conqueſt eaſie, and ſoone aſſured: Where ancient Nobilitie is had in due regard, there is it hard to winne all, and harder to keepe that which is wonne. Examples of this are the Turkiſh Empire, and the Kingdome of France. If any Inuader ſhould preuaile ſo farre vpon Turkie, that the great Sultan and his Children (for brethren hee ſeeth not to ſuſſer alie) were taken or ſlaine: the whole Empire would quickly be wonne, and eaſily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Baſſas, how great ſoueray they may ſeeme, are mere ſlaues; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whoſe perſonall regard could get the people to follow him in ſuch an attempt, where in hope of priuate gaine, ſhould not counteruaile all apparent matter of feare. Contrariwiſe, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conqueſt, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though hee further got the better part of the Countie, and were by farre the ſtronger in the field. For, beſides the Princes of the Roiall blood, there are in the Kingdome ſtore of great men; who are mightie in their ſeueral Countries, and haue certaine Royalties and Principalties of their owne; are able to raiſe Warre, in all quarters of the Realme; whereunto the remembrance of their owne ancient Families, and long continued Nobilitie, will alwaies ſtirre vp and inflame them, ſo that vntill euery one peace were wonne, and euery one (an endleſſe worke) of the chiefe Nobilitie, brought brought vnder or deſtroyed, the victorie were not compleat, nor well aſſured. It is true, that ſuch power of the Nobilitie, doth often-times make way for an Inuader; to whom the diſcontentments of a few can eaſily make a faire entrance. But ſuch aſſitants are not ſo eaſily kept, as they are gotten: for they looke to bee ſatiſfied at full, in all their demands; and hauing what they would, they loone returne to their old allegiance, vpon condition to keepe what they haue, vntill they be deadely hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to pleaſe one man, without offending another as good as himſelfe. The Turks, on the other ſide, needes not to feare any perill, that might ariſe from the diſcontented ſpirits of his principall men. The great miſchiefe that any of them could worke againſt him, were the betraying of ſome frontier Towne, or the wiſfull loſſe of a battaile: which done, the Traitor hath ſpent his ſting, and muſt either ſlie to the enemy, whereby he looſeth all that he formerly did hold, or elſe, in hope of doing ſome further harme, he muſt adventure to excuſe himſelfe vnto his Maſter, who ſeldome forgives the Captaine, that hath not ſtriven by deſperate valour, againſt miſfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers againſt the great Sultan, and ſo joining themſelves vnto any Inuader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them haue any followers or dependants at all, other than ſuch, as are ſubject vnto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commiſſions. Now as this baſe condition of the principall men, doth leaue vnto them no meanes, when by to oppoſe themſelves againſt the flouriſhing eſtate of their Prince; ſo would it weaken both their power and their courage in giuing him aſſiſtance, if aduerſitie ſhould make him ſtand in neede of them. For there is ſcarce any one among the Turkes Baſſas prouinciall Gouvernours, that knowes either from whence he was brought, or from whom defended, nor any one among them, that by the loſſe and vter ruine of the Turkiſh Empire, can looſe any foot of his proper inheritance, and it is the proper inheritance of the ſubject, which is alſo a Kingdome vnto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart againſt the Conquerour, who hath no other deuice painted on his Eniigne, than the picture of ſlauiery.

As is the Turkiſh Empire, ſo was the Perſian, void of libertie in the Subjects, and vterly deſtitute of other Nobilitie, than ſuch as depended vpon mere fauour of the Prince. Some indeede there were of the Royall blood, and others, deſcended from the Princes that joyned with Darius, the Sonne of Hystaſpes, in oppreſſing the Magi: theſe were men of reputation in Perſia; but their reputation conſiſted only in their Pedigree, and their ſuſtice in not meddling with affaires of State, which made them little eſteemed. In what ſmall capacity theſe Perſian Princes were held, it may appeare by this, that the Kings Vnclis, Coſin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and ſo did ſtile themſelves, in ſpeaking vnto theſe great Monarchs. That vpon euery light occaſion of diſpleaſure they were handled as ſlaues; it is eaſie to be diſcerned, in that example of crueltie, practiſed by Xerxes vpon his owne brother Masſiſtes, which hath bene formerly noted, in place more conuenient. As for the Satrapa, or Gouvernours of the Prouinces, it is needleſſe to cite examples, proving them to haue bene mere ſlaues: it may ſuffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of thoſe Women and Eunuchs, by whom the King was gouerned.

To this want of Nobilitie in Perſia, may be added the general want of libertie, conuenient among the people: a matter no leſſe auailable, in making eaſie and ſure the conqueſt of a Nation, then is the cauſe aligned by Maſchiuſell. For as Aeſop his Aſſe, did not care to runne from the enemies, becauſe it was not poſſible, that they ſhould loade him with heavier burthens, than his Maſter cauſed him daily to beare: ſo the Nations, that endure the worſt vnder their owne Princes, are not greatly fearefull of a forraigne yoke; Nor will be battie to ſhake it off, if by experience they finde it more light, then was that whereunto they had bene long accustomed. This was it that made the Gaſcoignes beare ſuch faithfull affection, to the Kings of England; for that they governed more mildly than the French: this enlarged the Venetian iuriſdiction in Lumbardie; for the Townes that they wanne, they wanne out of the hands of Tyrannous oppreſſors: and this did caule the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had bene ſubject vnto the poſteritie of Alexanders followers, to ſerue the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were caſed of many burthens, which had bene impoſed vpon them by their owne Kings.

So that of this tamenefſe, which we finde in thoſe that had bene ſubjects of the Perſian Kings, the reaſons are apparent. Yet ſome of theſe there were, that could not ſo eaſily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeede bene abſolutely conquered by the Perſian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such alſo were the Arabians bordering vpon Syria: againſt whom Antigonus ſent part of his Armie; thinking therewith to bring them vnder; or rather to get a rich bootie. The Captaine that hee ſent fell vpon the Nabathians, at ſuch time as they were buſied in a great Mart, wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrrhe, Frankincenſe, and other ſuch commodities. All, or moſt of theſe rich wares, together with five hundred talents of ſilver, and many priſoners, the Macedonians laid hold vpon: for their coming was ſuddaine, and unexpected. But ere they could recouer Syria, the Nabathians ouer-tooke them, and finding them wearie with long marches, made ſuch a ſlaughter, that of ſoure thouſand foot, and fixe hundred horſe, only fiftie horſe eſcaped. To reuenge this loſſe, Lemetrius was ſet out with a greater power: yet all in vaine; for he was not reſiſted by any Armie, but by the natural defence of a vaſt Wilderneſſe, lack of water, and of all things neceſſarie. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein hee loſt not much honor: for they craued it, and gaue him preſents. Returning from the Nabathians, hee viewed the Lake Aſphaltites, whence hee conceiued hope of great profit that might be raiſed, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandrie of his ſonne, Antigonus was well pleaſed, and appointed men to the worke: but they were ſlaine by the Arabians, and ſo that hope vaniſhed.

Theſe petty enterpriſes, with the ill ſucceſſe accompanying them, had much impaired the good advantage againſt Ptolomeus: when the newes of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marred all together. For neither was the loſſe of thoſe great and wealthy Prouinces, a matter to be neglected; neither was it ſafe to tranſport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Aſia ſhould haue bene expoſed, to the danger of ill affected Neighbourſ. A middle courſe was thought the beſt; and Demetrius, with fifteene thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, was ſent againſt Seleucus. Theſe forces being ſent away, Antigonus did nothing; and his ſonne did leſſe. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themſelves from neceſſitie of fight; ſome places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without letting in Garriſon more men than he could ſpare; neither did hee get much; and therefore was faine to ſet out the brauerie of his expedition by burning and ſpoiling the Countrie; which hee did thereby the more alienate, and as it were acknowledge to belong vnto his enemy, who thenceforth held it as his owne aſſured.

Antigonus had laid vpon his ſonne a peremptorie commandement, to returne vnto him at a time prefixed: reaſonably thinking (as may ſeeme) that in ſuch an vnſetled ſtate of things, either the Warre might bee ended, by the ſurie of the firſt brunt; or elſe it would bee vaine to ſtrive, againſt all difficulties likely to ariſe, where want of neceſſaries ſhould fruſtrate the valour, that by length of time was like to become leſſe terrible to the Enemy. Demetrius therefore, leauing behinde him five thouſand foote, and a thouſand horſe, rather rather to make thew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himſelfe, with greater forces, could doe little more than nothing, forooke the enterpriſe, and went back to his Father.

§. IX.

A general peace made and broken. How all the houſe of ALEXANDER was deſtroyed.

THEſe ambitious heads, hauing thus wearied themſelves with vneſſual trauaile, in ſeeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them ſhould hold quietly, that which at the preſent he had in poſſeſſion. As no priuate hatred but meere deſire of Empire had moued them to enter into the warre; ſo was it no friendly reconciliation, but only a dulneſſe growing vpon the flow aduancement of their ſeueral hopes, that made them willing to breath a while, till occaſion might better ſerue to light againe.

Besides that in mine point, Of reſigning the Prouinces which euery one held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gaue a faire, but a falſe colour, to the buſineſſe: That the ſonne of ALEXANDER by ROXANE, ſhould be made King, when he came to ſo full age; and, That all the Eſtates of Greece ſhould be ſet at libertie. The aduancement of yong Alexander to his Fathers Kingdome, ſeemes to haue bene a matter, forceably extorted from Antigonus; in whom was diſcouered a purpoſe, to make himſelfe Lord of all. But this, indeede, more nearly touched Caiſſander. For in his cuſtodie was the yong Prince and his Mother: neither did hee keepe them in ſort as ſeruable to their degree; but as cloſe priſoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had ſcene the old Queene Olympias taken and murdered, that fought to haue put them in poſſeſſion of the Empire. The mutuall hatred and feare betwene them, rooted in theſe grounds, of injuries done, and reuenge expected; vpon this conſequence of peace, grew vp ſalter than any time before, in the heart of Caiſſander: who ſaw the Macedonians turne their laudourable expectation, towards the ſonne of their later renowned King.

All this, either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The yong Prince muſt firſt haue poſſeſſion of Macedon: whereby Caiſſander ſhould be reduced to his poore office, of Captaine ouer a thouſand men, if not left in worſe caſe. As for them that held Prouinces abroad, they might either doe as they had done vnder Antians; or better, as being better acquainted with their owne ſtrength. Hee in the meane time, by his readineſſe to acknowledge the true Heire, had freed himſelfe from that ill-fauoured imputation, of ſeeking to make himſelfe Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like advantage had hee in that Article, of reſtoring the Greekes to their libertie. This libertie had hitherto bene the ſubject of much idle diſcourſe; but it neuer took effect. Antigonus held ſcarce any Towne of theirs, Caiſſander occupied moſt of the Countrie: which if he ſhould ſet free; he muſt be a poore Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell againſt him, as againſt a Diſturbor of the common peace.

In the meane ſeaſon, the Countries lying betwene Euphrates and the Greece ſeas, together with a great Armie, and monie enough to entertaine a greater, might ſerue to hold vp the credit of Antigonus, and to raiſe his hopes, as high as cuer they had bene.

With much diſadvantage doe many men contend, againſt one that is equal to them

them all in puffiance, Cassander's friends had left him in an ill case; but he could not doe withall: for where euerie one mans helpe is necessarie to the warre, there may any one make his owne peace; but no one can stand out alone, when all the reit are wearie. The best was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becoming Subjects vnto any man; much lesse to the sonne of an Asiaticke woman, of whom they had long since refused to heare mention. Therefore he tooke a short course and caused both the Child and his Mother to be slaine: freeing thereby himselfe in a trice, from the dangerous necessitie of yielding vp his gouernement, which he must haue done when the child had come to age. Roxane was a Ladie of singular beautie, which was perhaps the cause, why Perdiccas desired to haue her sonne, being as yet vnborne, proclaimed Heire to the great Alexander. Immediately vpon the death of Alexander, she had vsed the fauour (if it were not loue) of Perdiccas, to the satisfying of her owne bloudie malice, vpon Statira, the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewise married, according to the custome of those Countries, wherein pluralitie of wiues is held no crime. For hauing by a counterfeit letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poore Ladie into her hands, shee did, by assistance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Sister, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled vp with earth. But now, by Gods iust vengeance, were shee and her sonne made away, in the like secret fashion; euen at such time, as the neare approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer vnto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander, was not so much detested in outward shew, as inwardly it was pleasing vnto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords, of all that they had vnder them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of warre, wherein euerie one perswaded himselfe of successe, rather better than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Lysimachus and Seleucus, that had worke enough at home) beganne to rowze themselves: as if now the time were come, for each man to improve his owne stock. Antigonus his Lieutenants were bulie in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: while their Master was carefull in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the libertie of Greece: yet did the same argument minister vnto Ptolemie, matter of quarrell, against both him and Cassander. Ptolemie complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrison into some Townes, which ought, in fairedaling, to be set at libertie. Vnder colour of redressing this enormitie, he sent an Armie into Chilica; where he wan foure Townes, and soone after lost them, without much labour of his owne or his Enemies.

After this, putting to Sea with a strong fleet, he ranne along the coast of Asia, winning many places: and in that voyage alured vnto him a Nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requitall of his seruices) who finding shortly, as false to himselfe, as he had bene to his owne Vncle, hee was faine to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greekes at libertie, appeared not so plaine, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered, by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the loue of that valiant Nation, He made at the last an expedition into Greece itselfe: where hauing set free some little Islands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised so great an expectation, of finishing the long desired worke, that Cratespolis, the Widow of Alexander, Polyperchon's sonne, gaue vp into his hands the Townes of Sicion and Corinth.

Ptolemie had conceived a vaine beleefe, that the Greekes emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart, and rise vp in armes: whereby with little labour, their libertie might be gotten; and hee bee acknowledged as Author of this immortal benefit. But long seruitude had well-nere extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recouer recouer freedome, had so tired their spirits, that they would no more stirre in pursuit thereof; but sat idly till, as wishing it to fall into their mouths.

The Lacedaemonians, about these times, beganne to fortifie their Towne with walls; trusting no longer in their vertue (for both it, and the discipline that vpheld it, were too much impaired) that had beene a wall to their Towne & Territorie.

The Athenians were become as humble seruants as they had been, in times past, insolent Masters: erecting as many statues in honor of Demetrius Phalerens, as there were dayes in their yeare. This Demetrius was now their Gouernour; and he gouerned them with much moderation: but in spite of their hearts, as being let to ouer them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principall Cities, it is easie to gather, how the rest of the Countrey stood affected. Ptolemie could not get them, to set their helping hands, to their owne good; and to furnish them with the promised supplies, of monie and vittuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliuer them from thraldome; as judging the commoditie, that would arise by annexing them to his partie, a matter of more weight, than the losse that Cassander should receiue thereby, who could hardly retaine them, if once Antigonus tooke the worke in hand. But when he found such difficultie in the buisnes, he changed his purpose: and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sicion and Corinth in his owne possession.

Before the coming of Ptolemie into Greece, Cassander had bene held occupied with very much worke. For (besides his paines taken in warres among barbarous Princes) he found meanes to allure vnto him selfe, the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: making his owne advantage of their discontentments. By the like skilfull practice, Hee freed himselfe from a greater danger: and made those murders which he had committed seeme the lesse odious, by teaching his enemies to doe the like. Old Polyperchon, that had made so great a stirre in the raigne of Aridaus, did after the death of Roxane and her Child, enter againe vpon the Stage: leading in his hand another sonne of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this young Prince was Hercules: hee was begotten on Barsine, the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian; but had bene lesse esteemed than the sonne of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or else perhaps, in regard of the fauour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did beare vnto Roxane. At this time, the death of his brother, had moued such compassion, and regard of his being Alexanders only liuing child, had procured vnto him such good will, that the demand which Polyperchon made in his behalfe, was deemed very iust and honorable. There were indeede more hearts then hands, that joynd with this young Prince: yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him, that least ought, had not bene moit faine. Cassander had raised an Armie, to withstand his entrie into Macedon: but little trust could he repose in that Armie, whole wishes he perceived to be with Hercules. Therefore he assaid Polyperchon himselfe, with gifts and promises; wherewith at length hee prevailed so farre, that the old Villaine was contented to murder his Pupill, chooling rather with many curses, and fowle dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnesus and Commander of an Armie; than to purchase a Noble fame with dangerous trauaile, in maintaining his faith, vnto both his dead and liuing Soueraignes.

Antigonus had notall this while benee a sleepe; though his losses were hitherto the chiefe witness, of his hauing benee a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present, to retaine his owne: and therefore tooke order for the recouerie of those places, which Ptolemie had taken paines to winne. As for the rest, it no way grieved him, to see Cassander incurre the generall hatred of men, by committing those murders, of which the profit was like to redound vnto him, that was the most powerfull: or to see Polyperchon and Ptolemie sweat, in a busie warre against Cassander. If they would haue continued their quarrells, he could well haue afforded them leisure, and haue thought the time well spent, in beholding their contentions. For he was thoroughly perswaded, that when the rest had wearied themselves in vaine with long strife, his armies and treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all vnder. According to these haughtie conceits, he demeaned himselfe among his followers; looking bigge vpon them, and like a King before his time. T his was it that caused so many of them, to revolt from him; but it was no great losse to bee forsaken by those that looked with enuious eyes, vpon that fortune, whereon their owne should haue depended. Against this cruell of his owne men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedie, such as was like to giec him a goodly title, to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra, Sister vnto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes; whom he had a great desire to take to wife. T his his desire was not without good hope: for howsoeuer these discovered much willingnesse thereunto, yet was shee in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it only for feare of being enforced. But it was not his purpose, to get her by compulsiue means: either because his fancy being an old man, was not ouer violent; or rather because his ambition, wherevnto all his affections had reference, could haue made small vse of her, by doing such apparent wrong. Shee had bene married vnto Alexander King of Egyptus, after whose death shee came to her brother in Asia; hoping, belike, to finde a new husband in his Campe. But neither any of those braue Capitaines, that were, in times following, so hot in loue with her, durst then aspire vnto her marriage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himselfe with providing her of an husband. Shee therefore, being a luttie widow, suffered her bloud, so farre to preuaile against her honour, that shee supplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Parramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a jest: saying, that shee was his sister, and must be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death, the Empire lay, in a manner, void, and the portion due to her therein, grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had bene: then did many seeke to obtaine her, while thee her selfe desired only a proper man, with whom thee might lead a merie life. To this purpose did thee inuite Leontatus vnto her; who made great haste; but was cut off by death, ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, thee had her choise of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Ptolomeus, Lysimachus, and Cassander, being all her earnest wooers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had wives already, Ptolomeus had many wives, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wives, being noted of too much dotage in that kinde. T his hindred not his sute: peradventure it aduanced it; by giuing to Cleopatra, some hope of mutuall collation. To him therefore thee bequeathed her selfe, and was taking her iourne from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citie, made her to stay, vntill his Masters further pleasure should be knowne. Antigonus had now a Woolfe by the eares: he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her goe. Shee would not be his wife; he had none honest pretence to force her; and to keepe her prisoner, had bene the way, by which he might haue incurred a general hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Ladie lesse respected than Alexanders owne sister) did well testifie. T herefore he thought it the wisest way, to procure her death: for to let any other enioy the commoditie of so faire a title to the Kingdome, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Gouverneur of Sardes; willing him in any case to doe it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certaine women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as mischieuous conspirers, against the life of that good Ladie. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least, in his owne opinion: but the world was lesse foolish, than to bee so deluded. How the murther was detected, we neede not aske: for seldom is that bloudie crime vnreuealed; and neuer so ill smothered, as when great persons are the Authors.

This was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the Great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought vpon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods iustice, due vnto the crueltie, of these powerful, but mercilesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, vpon so wicked foundations of innocent bloud, were soone after cast downe, ouerwhelming themselves or their children, with the ruines, as the sequele will declare.

§. X.

How DEMETRIUS, the sonne of ANTIGONUS, gaue libertie to Athens, expelling the Garrisons of CASSANDER out of those parts. The immoderate honors decreed by the Athenians to ANTIGONUS and DEMETRIUS.

NONE being left alieue, that had any title to the Kingdome; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledged no Superior, should freely profess themselves Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill becommed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbear it: neither seemed it conuenient in the iudgement of Antigonus, to crowne his last action with such a title, as if he had attained vnto greatness by that foule murder, the infamie whereof he was carefull how to discharge from his owne head. He purposed therefore to undertake a plausible enterprise, euen the libertie of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such honor as would not only downe all bad reports, but make him be thought equall to any name of roialtie, whereof in seeming modestie, hee was not conuous. To this purpose, hee delingred a strong Armie, with a Naue of two hundred and fiftie saile, and liue thousand talents of moneie, vnto Demetrius his sonne: willing him to beginne at Athens, and thence to proceede, in setting all the Countrie free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: so that without resistance he entred the Hauens; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolomeus, Cassanders good friend, had bene arriued. But when it was knowne, both who he was, and what was the cause of his coming; the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations; Demetrius Phalerus forooke the Towne, and withdrew himselfe to Thebes, vnder safe conduct; only the Garrison in Munychia stroue to make good that piece, which after a while was wonne vpon them by force. During the siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Aegara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the Citie to libertie.

I thinke it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seeme no better than meeke trifles: for euen by trifles, are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly straine themselves, to the obstruance of generall commended rules; in lesser things they follow the current of their owne Natures. T he Ladie Cratesipolis lay in Patras, and had a great desire to see Demetrius, hoping, belike, that he might, by his means, better her estate, and recover her Townes of Sydon and Corinth, detained by Ptolomeus (to whose Lieutenant, in those places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered monie for the surrender of them. Yet the only builnesse pretended was loue. He being aduertised hereof, left his forces in the Countie of Aegara, and taking a companie of his lightest armed, for guard of his person, made a long iourne to meeete with her. T his troupe also, he caused to lodge at great way from his Tent, that none might see her when she came. As closely as the bulineſſe was carried, ſome of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceiued good hope, that the diligence of a very few men, might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus, and bring him to any termes of reaſon, by taking his deare ſonne priſoner. Their project fell but a little ſhort of the effect. For they came to ſuddenly vpon him, that he had no better ſhift, than to muſſe himſelfe in an old cloake, and creepe away diſguiſed; leaving them to ranſack his Tent. There was in this Prince a ſtrange medly of conditions; eſpecially an extreme diſſoluteſſe in wanton pleaſures, and a painefull induric in matter of warre. He was of a moſt amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; excellent in deuiling Engines of warre, and curious in working them with his owne hands. He knew better how to reforme his bad fortune, then how to rule his good. For aduerſitie made his v. l. our more actiue; proſperitie ſtupified him w. th an ouerweening, wherein he thought, that he might doe what he liſted. His fortune was as changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her wheele, till ſhee had wound vp the thread of his life, in ſuch manner as followeth to be ſhewed.

Returning to his Campe, and finiſhing his buſineſſe at Aegara; he reſolued no longer to attend the iſſue of a ſiege, to aſſaile Munychia by force, that ſo hee might accompliſh the libertie of Athenes: which, vntill it was fully wrought out, he reſuſed to enter into the Citie. Munychia was ſtrongly fortified: yet by continuance of the aſſault, the multitude without, through helpe of their Engines that ſcoured the walls, preuailed vpon the reſolution of thoſe that lay within it, and wanne the place in two daies. The wails, and all the defences of that peece againſt the Citie, were leuelled with the ground and ſo was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withall was giuen their libertie, with promiſe to aide them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lowder, than of any other victorie, gotten by Demetrius with greater ſkill and induric. For the Athenians, hauing forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make vp that deſect with their tongues: conuerting to baſe flatterie, that eloquence of theirs, which the vertues of their Anceſſors had ſuted vnto more manly arguments.

They decreed, vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, the name of Kings; they conſecrated the place, in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when hee entered their Citie, and built there an Altar, calling it of DEMETRIUS the a-lighter; they called them by the Names of the Gods their Sautours, ordaining that euery yeare, there ſhould be choſen a Prielt of theſe Gods; and further, that ſuch as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of theſe two Princes, ſhould not be called Embaſſadors, but Theori, or Conſulters with the Gods; like as were they, whom they ſent vnto the Oracle of Iupiter or Apollo.

It were a fruituouſe diligence, to rehearſe all their flatteries; theſe being ſo groſſe. Hereby they not only corrupted the yong Prince; but made that acclamation, which beſt would haue pleaſed the old man, to be of no vſe. For he could not handſomly take vpon him the name of King, as impoſed by the Athenians; vnleſſe hee would ſeeme to approue their vanitie, in loading him with more than humane honors. Yet was he ſo tickled, with this their fine handling him, that when their Theodari, or Conſulters, came ſhortly after, deſiring him to relieue them with Corne, and Timber to build ſhips; he gaue them almoſt a hundred thouſand quarters of wheat, and matter ſufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his firſt Oracle: or rather, ſo weake is great power in reſiſting the aſſaults of flatterie.

§. XI.

The great victorie of DEMETRIUS againſt PTOLOMIE in Cyprus. How ANTIGONVS and DEMETRIUS tooke vpon them the ſtile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

From this glorious worke, Antigonus called away Demetrius, vnto a bulineſſe of greater difficultie: meaning to imploy his ſeruiſe againſt Ptolomie in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed, to eſtabliſh a generall Counſaile; that ſhould treat of matters, concerning the common good of the Countrie. About the ſame time, Antigonus withdrew his owne Garrillon out of Imbras, committing their libertie entire, into the peoples hands: whereby it might appeare, that as he would not permit any other, to oppreſſe the Greekes, ſo would he be farre from doing it himſelfe. This was enough, to hold his reputation high, among theſe new purchaſed friends: it followed, that he ſhould conuert his forces, to the winning of ground vpon his Enemies.

A pittifull Tragedie had lately happed in Cyprus; through the indifferencie of Menelaus, Ptolomies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Iſle. Nicoles, King of Paphos, was entered into ſome praſtiſe with Antigonus: yet not ſo farre that he thought himſelfe paſt excuſe; by which confidence, he was perhaps, the more eaſily detected. To cut off this negotiation, and the falſe hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was ſent thither: who ſurrounding Nicoles his houſe with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies name, to haue him yeelded to the death. Nicoles offered to clear himſelfe; but Menelaus told him, that die he muſt, and ſo had him come forth quietly. This deſperate neceſſitie, cauſed the vnhappy King, to rid himſelfe of liſe: and his death ſtrooke ſuch an impreſſion into his wife, that ſhee not only flew her ſelfe, but perſwaded the wiues of her husbands brethren, to doe the like. Alſo thoſe brethren of Nicoles, vnto whom Ptolomie had intended no ill, being amazed with the ſuddaineſſe of this calamitie, did ſhut vp the Palace, and ſetting it on fire, conſumed it, with all that was in it, and themſelues together.

What ſo euer the crime objected was; Nicoles perished as a man innocent, becauſe he was not ſuited to make his anſwere. Of this ſad accident, though Menelaus deſerued the blame, for his rigorous proceeding; yet is it to bee thought, that much diſlike, fell alſo vpon Ptolomie: as men that are grieued, caſt an ill affection, euen vpon thoſe, that gaue the fartheſt remoued occaſion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power ſufficient, againſt any oppoſition that Ptolomie was like to make. The Cypriots did liſe or nothing againſt him: either becauſe they had ſmall ſtrength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being ſure that they ſhould not themſelues haue the rule of their owne Countrie. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrifons, drew forth an Armie, and fought with Demetrius. But hee was beaten, and driuen to face himſelfe within the walls of Salmis; where he was ſo hardily beſieged, that without ſtrong ſuccour hee had no likelihood to make good the place, much leſſe to retaine poſſeſſion of the whole Iſland. His greateſt helpe at the preſent, was the fidelitie of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could winne from him, nor good vſage (when any of them were taken priſoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keepe from returning to him, with the firſt opportunitie. Moſt of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Aegypt, which was enough to keepe them faithfull. Yet could not this their reſolution haue ſtood long, againſt the odds of number, which Demetrius had of men as reſolute, and againſt his terrible Engines of batterie, if Ptolomie had not halted to the reſcue.

Ptolomie brought with him, a hundred and fortie Gallies, beſides two hundred ſhips ships of burden, for transporting his Armie and Carriages. This fleet made a terrible thew, when it was decried a farr; though more than halfe of it, was vntil for seruice, in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadfull, Ptolomie sent vnto Demetrius, a threatening message: willing him to be gone, in lesse he would be ouerwhelmed with multitudes, & trampled to death in a throng. But this yong Gallant, repaid him, with words of as much brauerie, promising to let him escape, vpon condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Siegon and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more then one hundred and eghteen Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Ptolomie, better stored, with weapons fit for that seruice; and very well furnished with Engines in the prowes, to beat vpon the Enemie. Neuerthelesse he stood in great doubt, of three score Gallies, that lay in the Haven of Salamis, least Menelaus with them should set vpon his back; in which case, it was likely that all should goe very ill with him. Against this mischiefe, hee bellowed ten of his owne Gallies in the mouth of that Haven, to keepe Menelaus from issuing forth, and setting his horse-men on the shore, to giue what assistance they could, he with the rest of his fleet, puts to Sea against Ptolomie.

The fight began early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtfull success. The Generalls were not ranged opposite one to the other; but held each of them the left wing of his owne fleet. Each of them preuailed against the Squadron wherewith he encountered; but the success of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victorie in one part was such, as caused others to fall out of order, and finally draue all to betake themselves vnto speedie flight. As for Ptolomie, he was faine to leaue his advantage vpon the enemie in one part of the fight, that he might relieue and animate those of his owne which needed him in another. Wherein hee found his losse ouer-great, to be repaired, by contending any longer, against the fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured only to saue himselfe, in hope of better euent, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battaile, no vnusuall accident; yet was the victorie greater then could haue bene expected. The occasions whereof were, partly the great skill in Sea-seruices, which the Greekes and Phanicians, that were with Demetrius, had, about those which followed Ptolomie: partly the good furniture of the Ships, wherein consisted no lesse, than in the qualitie of those with whom they were manned. Further, we may reasonably iudge, that the two hundred ships of burthen, carying the strength of Ptolomies Armie, did not more encourage his owne men and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight; than breede in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the fight, they fell out, and stood aloofe. For though it were fitting, that they should so doe; yet a multitude, prepossessed with vaine conceits, will commonly apprehend very slight occasions, to thinke themselves abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation, that Menelaus issuing with his fleet out of Salamis, should charge the enemies in sterne, was vtterly frustrate. He was kept in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to barre vp the mouth of the Haven: which they manfully performed, as a great necessitie required.

Such disappointment of expectation, doth much abate the courage of men in fight; especially of the assailants: whereas on the contrary, they that finde some part of their feares vaine, doe easily gather hopefull spirits, and conceiue an opinion of their owne abilitie to doe more than they had thought vpon, out of their not suffering the harme that they had imagined.

Whatsoever the causes of this victorie were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolomie had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the rest of his fleet was either taken or sunke. Neither did Menelaus any longer stirre against the violence of Fortune; but yielded vp all that hee held in Cyprus, together with his Armie, consisting of twelue thousand foot, and a thousand and two hundred horse, horse, and those Gallies in the Haven of Salamis. The same dejection of Spirit, was found, in the common Souldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had serued the Egyptian by Land: none of them repoying any more confidence in Ptolomie, but willingly becoming followers of a new Lord, whose Armie they now increased.

It was generally beleued, that much more depended on the euent of this fight, than the Ile of Cyprus; for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking euery day a yeare, till he were aduertised of the issue. In this moode Aristodemus found him, a notable flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured, with the Message of these good newes. Aristodemus had betought himselfe of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his ioyfull errand: He caused his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore; he himselfe landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediately back to the ship; and so all alone, he went forward, looking very sadly that no part of his tidings, might appeare in his countenance. Report of his arriual (for it was knowne where he had bene) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messenger after Messenger, to meet him on the way, and bring speedie word how all went. But neither any answer, nor so much of a looke, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be wonne from this demure Gentleman. Thus marched he faire and softly forward, with a great throng at his heeles (that serued well to set out his Pageant) vntill he came in sight of Antigonus; who could not containe himselfe, but went downe to meet him at the Gate, and heare the newes. Then did Aristodemus, vpon the suddaine, with a high voice salute Antigonus by the name of King; uttering the greatnesse of the victorie (with as much pompe, as before he had couered it with silence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loud acclamations, gaue that name of King, both to Antigonus, and to his sonne Demetrius. Antigonus in requital of the long silence, wherein Aristodemus had held him, said that it should also be long ere he receiued his reward. But the title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did set on his head, he could not with a fairer occasion to assume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his sonne.

When it was once noised abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselves Kings; it was not long, ere their fellowes were readie to follow the good example. Ptolomies friends would by no meanes endure, that their Lord should be thought a man dejected, for the losse of a fleet: therefore they saluted him also King. Lysimachus in Thrace had boldnesse enough, to put the Diademe about his owne head. Selenus had, before this time, among the Barbarous people, taken vpon him as King: but now he vsed the stile indifferently, as well among the Greekes and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassander held himselfe contented, with his owne name: whereby howsoever he might shadow his pride, he no way lessened the fame of his crueltie, against his Masters house. But the name which he forbore, his sonnes, after him, were bold to vsurpe, though with ill success, as will appeare, when they shall enter vpon the Stage; whereon these old Tragicians, vnder new habits, as no longer now the same persons, beginne to play their parts, with bigger lookes, and more boisterous actions, not with greater grace and judgement, than in the Scenes already past.

CHAP. VI.

Of the warres betweene the Kings of Egypt, Asia, Macedonia, Thrace, and others: vntill all ALEXANDERS Princes were consumed.

§. I.

The Expedition of ANTIGONVS against Egypt; with ill successe.

ALL the rest of these Kings had taken that name vpon them, in imitation of Antigonvs himselfe, as be-seeming his greatnesse: which was such as gaue him hope, to swallow them vp, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his owne strength, hee resolved to linge out Ptolomie, and make him an example to others: who should hardly be able to stand, when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose hee prepared an Armie of eightene thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, with foure-score and three Elephants: as likewise a fleet of a hundred and fiftie Gallies, and a hundred ships of burden. The Land-forces he commanded in person: of the Nauie Demetrius was Admirall.

When all was readie for the iourne, the Sea-men aduised him, to stay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the setting of the Pleades. But his haitie desire, to prevent all preparations for resistance that Ptolomie should make, rejected this counsaile, imputing it rather to their feare than skill. Wherefore he departed from Antigonia (a Towne which he had built in Syria, and called after his owne name, that was foone changed into Selenus, by his mortall Enemy) and came to Gaza; where hee met with his fleet. The nearer that he drew to Egypt, the more haile hee made:
thinking by celeritie to preuaile more then by his great power. He caused his Souldiers to carrie ten daies prouision of victuals; and had many Camells loaden with all necessaries for passing the Deserts, ouer which he marched with no small toile, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Casius, which is neare adjoining to Nilus, he saw his fleet, riding at Anchor, not farre from the shore; in ill case, and many ships wanting. It had bene sorely beaten with loule weather, wherein some were lost, others driuen back to Gaza, or scattered else where into such creeks as they could recouer: Demetrius himselfe, with the best and strongest vessels, did so long beat it vp against the winde, that all his fresh water was spent; in which extremitie, he and all his must haue perished, had not the tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in sight, from whom these ouer-weared, thirlye, and Sea-beaten Souldiers receiued reliefe. After these painfull traualles there followed a Warre no lesse painefull than to little purpose, for Ptolomie had so fortified all the passages vpon the Riuer of Nilus, as he assured himselfe either to end the warre there, or if his guards should happen to be fort, yet could it not be done, but so much to the weakening of the Assailants, as he should afterward, with a second Armie (which he held entire) entertaine the Inuader vpon aduantage enough. All that Antigonus sought was to come to blowes speedily, Ptolomie on the contrarie to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gaue him water enough, but wood hee had none to warme it, and while Antigonus assaulted the Rampiers raised vpon the Riuer in vaine,

vaine, Ptolomie assured the faith of his Souldiers with good successe, for with great gifts, and greater promises, he karried them ouer so fast, as had not Antigonus thrust some assured Regiments, vpon the passages next the enemy, and in the meane while taken a resolution to returne, Ptolomie had turned him out of Egypt, ill attended.

Some of them indeede he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those he put to death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the same ill successe that Perdiccas had formerly done, when he inuaded Egypt: had he not readily remoued his Armie further off, from the noise of their entertainment, that had alreadie bene wonne from him. To prevent therefore as well the present danger of his stay, as the shame following a forth retreat, hee secretly practized the aduice of his Councell, vpon whom the burden must be laid of his entrance, and leaving Egypt.

It is indeede lesse prejudiciall in such like cases, that errors, dishonours, and losses, be laid on Concellours and Captaines, than on Kings, on the Directed than on the Director, for the honour and reputation of a Prince is farre more precious, than that of a Vassall; Charles the first, as many other Princes haue done, laid the losse and dishonour hee receiued in the inuasion of France, by the way of Provinces, to Antoine de Lens, whither iustly or no, I know not; but howsoeuer all the Historians of that time agree, that the sorrow therof cost that braue Captaine his life.
Certainly to giue any violent aduice in doubtful enterprises, is rather a testimonie of loue, than of wisdom, in the giuer; for the ill successe is alwaies cast vpon the Councell, the good neuer wants a Father, though a false one, to acknowledge it.
Yet I haue sometime knowne it that great Commanders, who are for the present in place of Kings, haue not only bene disswayed, but held in a kinde by strong hand, from hazarding their owne persons, and yet haue those kinde of Mutiners neuer bene called to a Marshalls Court.

§. II.

How the Citie of Rhodes was beseged by

His departure of Antigonus left behind it many dead carcases, and a great deale of joy in Egypt. Ptolomie held a solemn feast, and sent Messengers abroad, loaden with glad newes, to Selenus, Lysimachus, and Cassander, his Confederates: strongly encouraging all that side with the report of this his late felicitie, though it appeared but in a dekinishe warre. Antigonus on the contrarie flattered himselfe with another interpretation, calling the joyes of his enemies for witness of his owne greatnesse, seeing they arose but from so little things: his enemies being but bare fauours by the last bargaine, and himselfe, as he supposed, having lost but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retreat. How soeuer it were, yet he meant to follow his affaires henceforth in another fashon, for that which he could not cleaue a-sunder by great blowes, he purposed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the branches first, to fell the Tree it selfe with the more facilitie. To effect which, he resolved (leauing the great ones to grow a while) to roote vp the Dependants of his Enemies:
Dependants, whom the forenamed Confederates should be fort, either to relieue, or to loose; and hereby he doubt.d not, to draw them into the field, where the aduantage of power, and of all other warlike prouisions, promised him victorie.

At this time the Citie of Rhodes was very mightie, being well gouerned, and hauing long held it selfe in good Neutralitie, it drew the better part of all the trade

of those parts, and thereby a great deale of riches to it selfe, to maintaine which, and to increase it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed ships, by which it not only beat off all Pyrates and pettie Theeves, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacie.

In this so dangerous a time (in which they must eyther refuse all that sought them, and so stand friendlesse and a part, or joyne themselves to some one; and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had growne) their affections carried them to the Egyptians, both because the greater part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus his disposition, greatnesse, & neighbourhood was fearful vnto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages, more apparent; gaue argument of quarrel to Antigonus, who began to declare himselfe against them by pettie iniuries, of taking some of their ships, with such other grieuances, while he made a more waightie preparation to pursue the warre against them openly and strongly. All things soone after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprise, he employed his sonne Demetrius against them in their owne Iland, who brought such terror vpon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their assistance, and seruice against whomsoever. Demetrius, who knew from whence this charge came, and that the alteration was perswaded by feare, and not by loue; raised his demands to an intollerable height, requiring a hundred hostages to be deliuered him, and libertie to lodge in their Port as manie ships of warre as himselfe pleased: these conditions, more properly to be imposed vpon a State already conquered, then on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a constrained assistance, restored vnto the Rhodians their lost courage, and made them resolute to defend their libertie to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bond-men, and wisely rather to make them their fellow Citizens, than to make themselves fellow slaues with them.

Demetrius having refused the faire conditions offered, and the Rhodians the fearefull ones propounded them, makes preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carrie the place in furie, he set in hand with his Engines of batterie, in the inuention and vse of which, he neuer shewed himselfe a greater Artisan, then in this warre. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the assaults giuen them for a whole year, after many braue saillies out of the Towne, and the famine which they indured within the Towne, which had proued farre more extreme, if Ptolomie had not with many hazards relievied them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embassadors, gaue ouer the siege; a hundred hostages they gaue him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrats and officers of the Citie.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the vsuall policie of warre, and state: for while with the flowre of all his fathers forces, he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recovered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the warre as in former times, by practise and surprise, but by a strong and well compounded armie, which hee himselfe led as farre as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed and indangered Athenis it selfe. On the other side (though with lesse successe) did Pyrrhus inuade Peloponnesus. These dangerous vndertakings vpon Greece, aduised the Athenians and Aitolians to dispatch their Embassadors towards Demetrius, and aduised Demetrius rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, then to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten, by setting all Greece at libertie.

Demetrius was no looser out of the Iland, then that the Rhodians erected statues in honour of Lysimachus and Cassander, but for Ptolomie, whom they most affected, and from whom they receiued their most reliefe, they consulted the Oracle of Delphos, whether it were not lawfull to call him a God. The Priests which attended in the Temple

Temple of Hammon, gaue the same faire answer for Ptolomie, which they had formerly done for Alexander his Master, for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Armie at his heeles; so was Ptolomie at this time Lord of the soile: and yet was this a farre more cleanly creation, then that done by the Athenians, who deified Antigonus and Demetrius, by decree of the people. A mad age it was, when so many of Alexanders Captaines could not content themselves with the stile of Kings, but that they would needs be called Gods.

§. III.

How Demetrius prevailed in Greece, Cassander desires peace of Antigonus, and cannot obtaine it. Great preparations of warre against Antigonus.

DEMETRIUS comming with a strong Fleet and Armie into Greece, quickly draue Cassander out of Attica; and pursuing his fortune, chased him beyond the straits of Thermopylae. Herein his reputation did much auail him; which was so great, that sixe thousand of his enemies Souldiers reuolted vnto him. So partly by the greatnesse of his name, partly by force, he recovered in short space all that Cassander held in those straights, and giuing libertie vnto the people, hee bestowed vpon the Athenians those peeces, which had bene fortified against them, to block them vp. Then went he into Peloponnesus, where he found the like, or more easie successe: for hee suddenly tooke Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the moit of the Countie, bestowing libertie vpon such as needed it. The Towne of Sicyon hee translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old seat into another place: and called it after his owne name Demetrias. This done, he betooke himselfe to his pleasure: At the Isthmian games he caused himselfe to be proclaimed Capitaine Generall of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) he despised all others, making it a matter of jest, that any, saue himselfe or his Father, should vsurpe the name of King. But in his behauiour hee was so farre vnlike to a King, that in all the time of his leisure, he deserved none other name then of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as readie as euer to deuide new honours for him: among which they made one decree, that whatsoeuer King Demetrius should command, ought to bee held sacred with the Gods, and iust with Men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great feare, least the warres should fall heauily vpon him in Macedon, which to auoide, he knew no better way then to make peace with his enemy betimes. And to that purpose he sent Embassadors; but had no better answer from Antigonus, then that he should submit his whole estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him looke about him, and labour hard in soliciting his friends, both to assist him, and take heede to themselves; neither found hee them slow in apprehending the common Danger, for Lysimachus knew, that if once Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soone be Master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolomie and Seleucus ignorant of that, which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were suffered to put himselfe in quiet possession of those Provinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with ioynt forces they should all together set vpon the common Enemy.

Hereof Antigonus had notice: but scorned all their preparations, saying, That hee would as easily scatter them, as a flock of Birds are driuen away with a stone. With these conceits hee pleased himselfe, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemies. He lay at that time in his Towne of Antigonia (a name that it must shortly loose) where he was carefully providing to set out some stately game and Pageants, in ostentation of his glorie. But thither was brought vnto him the tumultuous newes of Lysimachus his victories about Hellepont. For Cassander had committed vnto Lysimachus part of his forces, wherewith to passe ouer into Asia, while him selfe with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus passing the Hellepont, beganne to make hot warre vpon the Subjects of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to ioyne with him, by faire meanes; winning others by force, and waisting the Countrey round about.

To repress this vnexpected boldnesse, Antigonus made hastie iournies, and came soone enough to recover his losses, but not long enough to driue Lysimachus home, or compell him to come to battaile. Lysimachus waited for the coming of Seleucus; keeping himselfe the whilest from necessitie of fighting. But Babylon was farre off; and Seleucus his preparations were too great to bee soone in a readinesse. The Winter also did hinder his iourne: which enforced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrell in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspence, and bred much expectation. Yet might all haue come to nothing, had not Antigonus beene so froward, that hee refused to yeeld vnto any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neare with a mightie Armie of his owne (for hee had gathered strength in that long time of leisure, which Antigonus had giuen him) and with great aide from Ptolomie, that was ioynd with his forces.

To helpe in this needfull case, Demetrius was called ouer into Asia by his Fathers letters; which he readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, vpon reasonable termes: to the end he might not be driuen to leaue any part of his Armie for defence of the Countrey; and that his iourne might bee without any such blemish of reputation, as if hee had abandoned his Dependents: for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should be at libertie. Cassander was glad to bee so rid of an Enemie, that was too strong for him. Yet would this league haue done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise then they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred vnto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, euery one found meanes to cleare himselfe of all incumbrances elsewhere, to the end that each might freely apply himselfe to the triall of the maine controuerisie in Asia.

§. IIII.

How ANTIGONVS was slaine in a great battaile at Issus, neare vnto Ephesus; wherein his whole estate was lost.

SELEVCVS, with his Sonne Antiochus, ioyning with Lysimachus, compounded a great Armie, which was (all considered) not inferior to that of the Enemie. In greatnesse of name (that helpeth much in all warres, but especially in the Ciuill) they were rather vnswearable, than equal to their aduersaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them vnder with a mastering spirit, and had beene reputed a King indeede, when the rest were held but vsurpers of the title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a braue Commander, hauing giuen proofe of his worth in many great seruices of all kinds, and enriched the Art of warre with many inventions, which euen his enemies, & particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had sometimes flattered Antigonus, and fearfully stolen away from him to saue his life; with yong Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this iourne; and Lysimachus, that had liued long in a corner, hardly keeping his owne from the wilde Thracians; wanted much in reputation, of that which was yielded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient ancient Captaines vnder Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthie enough, to receiue any benefit that fortune might giue, and the third a Prince of great hope; whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for the most part hardie and well exercised: many of them hauing serued vnder Alexander; though of those old Companies, the long space of two and twentie yeares had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections; the followers of Seleucus were easily perswaded, that in this battaile they must either get the vpper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged vnto the Confederate Princes: whereas Antigonus his men could discern no other necessitie of fighting, than the obdurate qualitie of their Lord, that needs would be Matter of all. Antigonus had about thre score and ten thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and thre score and fifteen Elephants. His enemies were fixe thousand more of him in number of their foot; in horse they had the odds of fixe hundred; of Elephants they had foure hundred, and a hundred and twentie armed Chariots of warre; which helps, though they little had auailed the Persians, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captaine.

Antigonus himselfe, either troubled with the vnexpected grantees of his enemies forces, or prelagging little good like to ensue, grew very peniue, communing much in priuate with his sonne, whom he commended to the Armie as his Successor: whereas in former times he had neuer been so ioynd, as towards the houre of battaile, nor had beene accustomed to make his sonne, or any other, priue to his counsaile, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad luck, either foregoing the fight, or afterwards deuiled, I hold it needlesse to recount: Tiana of Ephesus dwelt neare to the place of battaile, a buie Goddess in many great fights, and therefore likely to haue beene thrust into the scale, if any matter, nearly resembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is ealie to beleene that these two so gallant Armies, contrayning well neare all the strength of Alexanders whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by such worthie Commanders, and whom the issue thereof did highly concerne. Yet are few of the particulars recorded: an ealie losse in regard of the much varietie, wherewith euery storie aboundeth in this kinde. The most memorable things in the battaile, were these. Demetrius with his best force of horse, charged valiantly vpon yong Antiochus; whom when hee had broken, and put to flight, hee was so transported with the heat of his good successe, that he neuer gaue ouer his pursute, but left his Father naked, and lost thereby both him, and the victorie. For when Seleucus perceived this aduantage, he enteredposd his Elephants, betwene Demetrius and the Phalans of Antigonus: and with many troupes of horse offering to breake vpon the enemies battaile, wherefor it lay most open, he did to terrifie the Antigonians, that a great part of them rather chose to reuolt from their Lord, whilst they were fairly invited, than to sustain the furie of so dangerous an impression. To his cowardize, or rather treason of some, discouraged others; and finally, cast them all into flight; expoling their Generall to the last end of his delinies. Antigonus was then foure score yeares old, very fat and vniuelle, so that hee was vnapt for flight, if his high spirit could haue entertained any thought thereof. Hee had about him some of his most trustie followers, and as many others as hee could hold together. When one that perceiued a great troupe making towards his person, told him, Sir King, yonder companie meanes to charge you; he answered, Well may they; for who desends me? but anon DEMETRIUS will releue vs. Thus expecting, to the very last, that his sonne should come to the rescue, he receiued so many Darts into his body, as tooke away his lately ambitious, but then fearefull hopes, together with his troublesome life.

His great abilitie in matter of Armes, together with his insatiable desire of Empire, haue sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loued by his friends; as one that could not moderate his fortune, but yed insolence towards all a like, as if it had bene some vertue nearest representing a Kingly Majestic. This was the cause that so many of his followers revolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Armie forsooke him in his last needfull. For those Kings and Princes that call all the careful indications of their Vassalls, only dutie and debt; and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the greatest services: shall finde themselves vpon the first change of fortune, (seeing it is loue only that staies by aduersitie) not only the most friendlesse, but euen the most contemptible, and despised of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he liued; in part he left it to be verified vpon his son.

b. V.

How Demetrius forsaken by the Athenians after his ouerthrow, was reconciled to Seleucus and Ptolomie, beginning a new fortune, and shortly entering into new quarrells.

How Demetrius, at his returne, from the idle pursuit of yong Antiochus, finding all quite lost, was glad to saue himselfe, with foure thousand horse, and five thousand foot, by a speedy retreat vnto Ephesus, whence he made great haste towards Athen, as to the place, that for his sake would suffer any extremities. But while he was in the midst of his course thither, the Athenian Embassadors met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their Citie. These were Embassadors, not Theori, or Consulters with the Oracle. It was a shamelesse ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his miserie, with such a decree: neither did any part of his calamitie more afflict the vnforsunate Prince, than to see his aduersitie despised by those whom he had thought his surest friends. Yet was he faine to giue good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Haven, of which he now stood in great neede, and therefore was faine to speake them faire, that sometimes had grossly flattered him. But he shall liue to teach them their old language, and speake vnto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships he sailed to the Isthmus, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrisons were euerie where broken vp; the Souldiers hauing betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that he was King only of a small Armie and Fleet, without monie or means wherewith to sustaine him and his followers any long time. All the rest or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in diuiding among the Conquerors, and those few places which as yet held for him (hauing not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieue, for to put himselfe into the field on that side of the Sea, he had no power, and to inclose himselfe in any of them, how strong soeuer, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeede to burie himselfe and his estate. Hee therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had fewest briers, fell vpon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdom, whereof hee gaue all the Spoile, that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his owne losses hauing bene too great to be repayed againe by small prizes.

In the meane while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to bulie themselves, in the partition of those Provinces, of which their late victorie had made them Lords, wherein Seleucus had a notable aduantage by being present and Master of the field, for neither Ptolomie, nor Cassander were at the ouerthrow giuen, hauing only sent certaine troupes to re-inforce the Armie which Seleucus led, who tooke hold of a part of Asia the lesse, and all Syria, being no otherwise diuided from his owne Territorie than by the Riuier of Euphrates. For there had not any order bene taken by the Confederates, for the diuision of all those Lands: because they did not expect to prosperous an issue of that warre, which they made only in their their owne common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that he could of the victorie, at which, neuertheless others did repine, and though they neither could nor durst accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet seeing the ouer-greatnesse of Seleucus brought no lesse danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted vpon the same reason of state as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined, for he read it in the Law vniuersall of Kingdoms and States, needing no other intelligence. Hercupon they forget friendship on all sides, and cure themselves of all vnprofitable passion, the hatred of each to other, and their loues being laid on the one side, against their profits on the other, were found so farre too light, as Seleucus who had to day slaine Antigonus the father, and driven Demetrius the sonne out of Asia, sought to morrow how to match himselfe with Stratonice, Demetrius his daughter, and so by Demetrius to serue his turne against Lysimachus.

The storie of this Stratonice, with whom yong Antiochus, the sonne of Seleucus fell so passionately in loue, and so dis tempered, as Seleucus his father, to saue his sonnes life, gaue her (though she were his wife) vnto him, and how his passion was discovered by his pulle; is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this alliance betwene Seleucus and Demetrius; betwene Ptolomie and Lysimachus; betwene Demetrius and Cassander; betwene Demetrius and Ptolomie; though for the present it brought him againe into the rancke of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the marriages betwene Christian Kings haue done in later times, namely betwene the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither haue the Leagues of those elder times bene found more faithfull, then those of the same later times haue bene; as in the stories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of France the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Milan, and others, the Reader may obserue: betwene whom from the yeare of our Lord, One thousand, foure hundred, ninetie and five, when Charles the eighth vndertook the Conquest of Naples, to the yeare one thousand five hundred fiftie and eight, when Henrie the second died, the Histories of those times tell vs that all the bonds, cyther by the bed or by the booke, cyther by weddings, or Sacramentall Oathes, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reape this profit by giuing his daughter to his enemy Seleucus, that he recouered Cilicia from Plitarchus, the brother of Cassander; who had gotten it as his share in the diuision of Antigonus his possessions; for the Intruder was not strong enough to holde it by his proper forces from him, that entred vpon it as a lawfull Heire, neither would Seleucus lend him any helpe, as by the rule of Confederacie he should haue done against the common enemy. So Plitarchus with very angry complaint, as well against Seleucus as Demetrius, went vnto Cassander; whither Phila, their sister, followed him shortly, to pacifie them both, and keepe all quiet; being sent for that purpose by Demetrius her husband, that was not strong enough to deale with Cassander, and therefore glad to make vse of that bond of alliance betwixt them, whereof in his owne prosperitie, he neuer tooke notice to the others good. About the same time he tooke to wife a daughter of Ptolomie (pluraltie of wiues being familiar with these Asie Ionians); that had learned it in their Easterne conquests; and so was he by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, than strengthened with two friends, for neither of them wished him any good, otherwife then might seeme to aduance their owne ambitious desires.

Seleucus and Ptolomie could both of them haue bene contented better, that Demetrius, with helpe of their countenance, should seeke his fortune somewhat farther off than settle his estate vnder their noses. Particularly Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himselfe; and Ptolomie had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Isle of Cyprus. Now whether it were so, that Seleucus would haue bene set his new father in law vpon the neck of Lysimachus; or whether hee were indeede greedie of the bargain, he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready monie, his late purchase of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not hearken, but meant to keepe as much Land as hee could, hauing alreadye found in Cilicia twelue thousand talents of his fathers treasure, that would serue him to make sport a while. This refusall so displeased Seleucus, that in angrie termes hee demanded the Citie of Tyre and Sidon, to bee surrendered vnto him; which were the only places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battaile. In stead of giuing them vp, Demetrius tooke present order to haue them better manned; and spake it stoutly, That were hee ouer-come a thousand times, yet would hee not hire Seleucus to become his sonne in law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant disposition, that would breake friendship with his father-in-law for two Townes, from whom he had alreadye taken more then well hee knew how to gouerne. But the fire consumed it selfe in words, which had it falned vpon armes, like it is that the weaker should haue found friends, out of enuie to the stronger.

§. V I.

How Demetrius wanne the Citie of Athens, and preuailed in Greece, but lost in Asia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of

CASSANDER.

IN the meane while, the Athenians not knowing how to vse the liber- tie, which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition, vnder the tyrannie of Lachares. Through which alteration their dis- tempered Citie was so weakened, that it seemed ill able to keepe off the punishment due to their late ingratitude. This advantage haile- ned him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to present him selfe vnto them, in the habit of a reuenging Iurie. Hee brought against them all the force that he could wel spare from other employments, which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtfull Esallene friends, were vnwilling to giue imped- 30 ment to any businesse, that might entangle him in Greece. His last enterprise in Athens had beene successfull; a great part of his fleet perishing in a tempest. But hee soone repaired the losse; and (after some victories in Peloponnesus, where hee wanne diuers Townes that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprise, wasted the Countie of Attica, and cut off all reliefe from the Citie, both by Land and Sea. Athens was not able to feede the great multitude within it, any long time: for it stood in a barren soile, and wanted now the command of those Ilands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be stored with victuals; being also destitute of meanes to keepe such a Nauie, as might bring in supply, or dare to doe any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolemie, 40 who (trusting thereby to winne the loue of Greece) had loaden a hundred and fiftie ships with corne, and sent them to releue the hungrie Citie. But these hundred and fiftie were vnable to deale with three hundred good fighting ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore basted them away betimes, as hauing done enough, in aduenturing to come so neare, that they might be discised. This brake the heart of the people; among whom the famine was so extreme, that a Father and his Sonne did fight for a dead Mousie, which dropped downe betwene them from the housetop. Wherefore they sent Embas- sadours to yeeld vp the Towne, and craue pardon, hauing so farre offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capitall offence, to propose any motion of peace. 50 Yet were they faine to abolish this decree: rather because they knew not what else to doe, then because they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victorie, did not only forbear to take away the liues of these vnthankfull men; which they had submitted vnto his mercie; mercie; but out of his liberalitie gaue them soode, and placed in Office amongst them such as were most acceptable to the people. Neuertheless hee was growne wiser then to truit them so farre as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Hauens, and dis- 10 pose of them at his pleasure; he was readie to lay hold vpon the word, and leaue a sure Garrison within their walls, to keepe them honest perforce. After this he went into Peloponnesus, vanquished the Lacedemonians in two battailes, and was in very faire possibilitie to take their citie: when the dangerous news called him in all haste, of Lyfimachus and Ptolemie, that preuailed faster vpon him else where, than himselfe 15 had gotten all the Iste of Cyprus, except the Citie of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children and Mother, that were straightly besieged. Whilste he was be- thinking himselfe which way to turne his forces, a notable peece of businesse offered it selfe, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Cassander was lately dead in Macedon, and soone after him, Philip his eldest sonne, whose two yonger bretherens, Antipater and Alexander, fought for the Kingdome. In this quarrell Thessalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Cassander had mar- 20 ried, seemed better affected to Alexander, then to her elder soane: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he slew his owne Mother. The odiousness of this fact gaue a faire lustre to Alexanders cause: drawing the generallitie of the Macedons to take his part, as in reuenge of the Queenes death, vpon that wicked parti- 30 zan Antipater. But Antipater was so strongly backed by Lyfimachus, whose Daugh- ter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his partie good without some forraigne aide. For which cause he called in both Pyrhus and Demetrius, who how they dealt with him, it will soone appeare, in the following Tragedie, of him and his brother. Their Father Cassander had bene one that shifted well for him- selfe, at such time as euery man sought how to get somewhat, in the ill ordered di- 40 uision of the Empire. Hee was cunning in practice, and a good Souldier: one of more open dealing then were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely killing those, whom others would more wisely haue made away. Hee deeply hated the memorie of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, vpon some o- pinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditarie quarrell, deriued from his Father, whom shee could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by crueltie, that shee vsed against his friends, both aliue and dead, as it made him aduenture vpon shedding the Royall blood; wherewith, when once hee had stained his hands, he did not care how farre he proceeded in that course of murder. His carefullnesse to destroy those women and children, whose liues hindered his pur- 45 pose, argues him to haue bene rather skilfull in matters of Armes, than a valiant man: such crueltie being a true marke of cowardize, which feares a farre off the dan- gers, that may quietly passe away: and seeks to auoide them by base and wicked meanes, as neuer thinking it selfe safe enough, vntill there be nothing left, that car- ries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may bee said, that they had well deserued the bloudie end which ouer-tooke them; yet ill befecmed it Cassander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexanders children had by no law of men de- 50 serued, to die for the tyranie of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his bed, yet the diuine Iustice brought swords vpon his wife and children, that well reuenged the crueltie of this bloudie man, by destroying his whole house, as he had done his Masters.

OF PYRRHVS and his doings in Macedonia. The death of CASSANDERS children.
 DEMETRIVS gets the Kingdome of Macedon; preuailes in warre against the Greeks; Looseth reputation in his warre against PYRRHVS, and in his Ciuill Government, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against DEMETRIVS.
 PYRRHVS and LYSIMACHVS invade him, his Armie yeelds to PYRRHVS, who shares the Kingdome of Macedon with LYSIMACHVS.

PYRRHVS, the Sonne of that vnfortunate Prince Acides, which perished in warre against Cassander, was hardly preferred, being a sucking Infant, from the furie of his Fathers enemies. When his Followers had conueighed him to Glaucias, King of Illyria; the deadly hatred of Cassander would haue bought his life with the price of two hundred talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his Heire. Glaucias was so far from betraying Pyrrhus, that hee restored him by force to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelue yeares of age. Within the compasse of sixe yeares, either the indiscretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, draue him out of his Kingdome, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went hee to Demetrius (who married his sister) became his Page; followed him a while in his wars; was with him in the great battaile of Issus, whence hee fled with him to Ephesus; and was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolonie. In Aegypt he so behaued himselfe, that he got the fauour of Berenice, Ptolonie principall wife; so that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon sent home, with monie and men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolonie, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdome of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out that businesse betweene the children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassanders sonnes, was so farre too weake for Pyrrhus, that hee had no desire to attend the coming of Demetrius, but made an halfe agreement, and diuided the Kingdome with his younger brother Alexander; who likewise felt the aide of Pyrrhus so troublesome, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacitie to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acarnania, and much more of the Countrie, as the reward of his paines: leaving the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessitie leaured the brethren to composition: but their composition would not satisfie Demetrius, who tooke the matter hainously, that he was sent for, and made a toole, to come so farre with an Armie, and finde no worke for it. This was a fruitles complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to doe as Pyrrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wise course, to remove this over-diligent friend, by murdering him vpon some aduantage. Thus Demetrius reported the storie, and it might bee true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wisest, beleued it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himselfe was sealed and slaine by Demetrius; who tooke his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder; executing the fact so well, by telling his owne danger, and what a naughtie man Cassander had been, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was bulied in warre with a King of the wilde Thracians: for thereby hee was compelled to seeke peace of Demetrius, which to obtaine, he caused the remainder of Macedon to bee giuen vp; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his sonne in law. At this ill bargain Antipater grievously stormed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he stormed, vntill his Father in law, to saue the labour of making many excuses, tooke away his trouble-trouble some life. Thus in haste, with a kinde of neglect, and as it were to auoide molestation, were slaine the children of Cassander: of Cassander that had slaine his owne Masters children, in a wise course of policie, with carefull meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to erect his owne house, that fell downe vpon his graue, ere the earth on it was thoroughly settled.

It might be thought, that such an access of Dominion, added much to the greatness of Demetrius. But indeede it shewed his infirmic; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of ciuill Government: but thought (or shewed by his actions that he thought) the vse and fruit of a Kingdome, to be none other, than to doe what a King listed. Hee gaue himselfe ouer to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those that offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing iustice. He hath more skill in getting a Kingdome, than in ruling it: warre being his recreation, and luxurie his nature. By long rest (as sixe yeares raigne is long to him, that knows not how to raigne one yeare) hee discoursed so much of his worst condition, as made both the people wearie of his idleness; and the Souldiers, of his vanitie. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost, though more especially, by hearing that Ptolonie had with great honor, entertained and dismissed his mother and children. This afforded him the better leisure, of making warre in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and wonne their Citie twice in short space, but vied his victorie with mercie. Against Lysimachus he would faine haue done somewhat (the peace betweene them notwithstanding) at such time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this iourney purchased nothing but enmitie. Another expedition he tooke in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse euent. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon; which hee had indeede as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdome; he had also made excursions into Thessalie; but there needed not any hand some pretence of quarrell, seeing Demetrius thought himselfe strong enough to ouer-runne his enemies Countrie, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they haue knowne raw Nouices in that facultie, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinarie. Pyrrhus was a Capitaine, whom later ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the ranke of Generalls, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, he missed that part of the Armie, which Demetrius led, and fell vpon the other halfe: which hee ouerthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his priuate valour, shewed in single combat against Pantachus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a strong man of bodie, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was vtrly beate. The losse of this battaile did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behauiour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the liuely figure of Alexander in his best qualitie. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vestures: but (said they) none, saue Pyrrhus, is like him indeed, in performing the office of a Capitaine.

These rumours were not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their owne King; whom they began to dislike, so much in regard of his vnprofitable journey into Epirus (for he had wasted much of the Countrie, and brought home his Armie in good case) as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intollerable. His apparell seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not only too sumptuous and new fangled, but very vnmanly; and seeming chiefly to be a daily witness, how much hee contemned them and their good opinion. Of his Souldiers liues he was rechelesse: and suffered vniuersally this vn-princely sentence to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. Hee made a mockerie of iustice; and (as it were, to publish vnto all his Subjects, how little he esteemed it or them) hauing by a shew of popularitie inuited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poore suters after him in great hope, till comming to a bridge, he threw all their writings into the Riuer; pleasing himselfe, in that he could so easily and so boldly deliue the cares of other men. By these courtes he grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacitie, and inuading Macedon, had almost wonne it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sick in his bed: who recouering health, and taking the field, had such great odds of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he beganne to haue some feeling of the generall hate, which to redresse, he did not (for he could not) alter his owne conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by letting them on worke in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appeare; that is, in a great warre. His intent was to inuade Asia, with a Royall Armie: wherein the fortune of one battaile might giue him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, hee first made peace with Pyrrhus; that so hee might leaue all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mightie Armie, of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse: with a Naue of fife hundred saile, wherein were many ships, farr exceeding the greatnesse of any that had bene scene before; yet so swift and vntail withall, that the greatnesse was least part of their commendation.

The terrible time of these preparations made Seleucus and Ptolemie suspect their owne forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, to ioyne against this ambitious sonne of Antigonus; that was like to proue more dangerous to themall, than euer was his Father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Asia, there could be no securitie for his friends in Eurepe; what league fouer were of old concluded. Therefore they resolu'd to beginne with him betimes, and each to inuade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his owne Kingdome. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Armie: but whilst he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Campe, that Pyrrhus had won Borthea. The matter was not ouer great: were it not, that mindes prepared with long discontent, are ready to lay hold vpon small occasions of dislike. All the camp was in vpror: some wept, others raged, few or none did forbear to vtter scdition words, and many desired leaue of Demetrius, to goe to their owne houses, meaning indeede to haue gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Armie, he thought it the wisest way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lysimachus their owne Countreman, against Pyrrhus that was a stranger: hoping by victorie against the Epirot, to recouer the loue of his followers, in such sort that hee might afterwards at leisure deale with the other. But herein his wisdome beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as batties he, to meet with Pyrrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to see that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others answered, of his person, his armor, and other tokens whereby he might be knowne; as particularly, by a paire of Goats hornes, that he wore on his crest. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Diuers of them stole away, and ranne ouer into Pyrrhus his campe: where the newes that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get light of Pyrrhus, they would all salute him King. To trie this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and presented himselfe bareheaded in view of the camp, whether some were sent before to prepare his welcome. The newes of his arrival found a generall applause, and euerie one began to looke out, with desire to set eye on him. His face was not so well knowne as his helmet; therefore he was admonished to put it on; which done, all came about him, and proffered their seruice; neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius; only some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bade him be gone betimes, and shitt for himselfe.

himselfe. So Demetrius threw aside his maskers habit, and attiring himselfe poorly, did fearefully steale away out of his owne Campe: deferring well this calamitie, whether it were so, that he would not hearken to the good counsaile of his friends, or whether his behaviour depriued him of such friends, as would dare to let him heare the vnpleasant found of necessitie truth.

Whilst Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entrie, into the Kingdome of Macedon; Lysimachus came vpon him, very vnseasonably, and would needs haue battle: saying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the warre, and therefore had reason to challenge his part of the gaines. The bargain was quickly made, and the diuision agreed vpon: each of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to worke his fellow quite out of all, vpon better oportunitie.

¶ VIII.

How Demetrius gathering forces, enterprised many things with ill successe, in Greece and Asia. How he was driuen vpon Seleucus, and compelled to yeeld himselfe. His imprisonment and death.

THE Athenians, were as vnthankfull to Demetrius in this his aduersitie, as they had bene in former times. For they presently forsooke his friendship, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius, when hee went against Lysimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, vnder his sonne Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had soone gotten an Armie; though Phila his wife (who is highly commended for a wife and vertuous Ladie) did poison her selfe, vpon desperate griefe of his misfortune. The first, vpon whom he attempted to throw his anger, were the Athenians, that had well deserued it. Hee beganne to lay siege to their Towne: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they made their spokeman; and taking faire words instead of satisfaction, passed ouer into Asia, with eleuen thousand Souldiers, meaning to trie his fortune against Lysimachus, for the Prouinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first comming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile vpon him. For many good Townes, willingly, or by compulsion, yielded to his obedience. There were also some Capitaines, that fell from Lysimachus to him, with their companies, and treasures. But it was not long, ere Agathocles, the sonne of Lysimachus, came vpon him, with an Armie so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his last stock against it. Wherefore, he resolu'd, to passe through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Prouinces of the higher Asia; trulling to finde a Kingdome somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsaile was grieuously impeached by Agathocles: who pursued him close, and cut off all his prouisions, driuing him to take which waies he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes, Demetrius vanquished this troublesome enemy: neuertheless, hee could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poore titularie King, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the Riuer Lyens, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were driuen to traualle with such speede, as might well be called a plaine flight. So that with famine, pestilent diseases following famine, and other accidents of warre, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Capitaine, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilst Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Countrey; but with vehement and humble letters he besought his sonne in law, to call to minde their alliance, and to pitie him in his great miserie. These letters, at the first wrought wel with Seleucus; and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himselfe, when he recovered strength after the battaile at Ipsus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Armie.

Many treaties were held between them; of which none tooke effect, through the jealousie of Seleucus. Therefore, mere desperation enforced Demetrius, to fight like a mad man; and his furie got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sickness tooke and held him fortie dayes, in which time, a great number of his few men, ranne to the enemy. This notwithstanding he still held out, and once had like to have taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his coming been discovered by fugitives, that gave the alarme. Finally, when all his Armie had forsaken him, and left him, with a few of his friends, to shift for himselfe: hee was compelled, by the last of those adherents (for euen some of those few forsooke him) to yeeld vnto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his owne humanity, by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he vied him with as much fauour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept vnder sure guard in a demie island, wherein were goodly walks, Orchards, and Parks for hunting. He had all that he asked roially, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his libertie was referred vnto the coming of young Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high Countries. In this sort he spent three years, liuing merrily all the while (as one that now enioyed the happinesse, which with so much trouble and blood-shed, hee had fought in vaine) and then died, leaving to his sonne Antigonus, the same which his father had left vnto himselfe; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Carinth; his qualities haue appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his house will shew it selfe hereafter, in times and places conuenient.

§. IX.

The death of PTOLOMIE, of LYSIMACHVS, and of SELEVCVS, that was last of ALEXANDERS Captaines: with other occurrences.

About the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomie King of Egypt; a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. Hee had, by many Wives and Concubines, many children: out of whom he selected Ptolomie Philadelphus, and caused him to raigne together with himselfe, two or three years before he died, that so hee might confirme him in the inheritance of the Kingdom. At this, Ptolomie Ceraunus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolomie) was grieuously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gaue him louing entertainment. There were now only two of Alexanders Captaines left; Seleucus and Lysimachus. These two needed would fight for it, who should be the longest liuer of that braue Companie. The true ground of their quarrell was, their neare equalitie of strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was, the murders which Lysimachus had committed vpon many of his Nobles, together with his poisoning Agathocles his eldest sonne: whose wife and children fled vnto Seleucus for aide.

The Macedons, after seuen Moneths pause, hauing spent their first heat of admiration, beganne to hearken so well to Lysimachus, their naturall Countre-man, that they forsooke Pyrrhus, vpon none other ground than because he was an Alien. This they had knowne well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, what they lightly gaue him. Lysimachus had reigned about about five yeares alone, when the Citie of Lysimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared, by euents, to haue foretold the fall of his house. His owne ialousie, and the infligation of a mother in law, caused him to poison his sonne Agathocles, which drew vpon him that warre, wherein (after the losse of all his fiftene children, that were taken away by diuers accidents) he perished himselfe.

Seleucus was encountered by Lysimachus on Asia side, where one battaile concluded the warre, with Lysimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victory, that he was the last of all the great Heroes which had followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himselfe, as Lord and Heire of all the conquered world. So he passed out into Macedonia, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his daies, and within seuen moneths followed Lysimachus, and other of his fellowes, by a bloudie death: being treacherously slaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron he had beene. Seuentie and seuen yeare old he was, when hee fought with Lysimachus, and Lysimachus was seuentie and foure. With them ended the generation of old Captaines, that had scene the daies, as it were of another world vnder the Persian: yet was there left one equall to any of them, in the Art of warre: euen Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we spake before; that is now readie to enter into warre with the Romans, a more warlike people, than Alexander himselfe euer did encounter. Of which warre, and of which people it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a storie more important, than any likely to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes, that were held by Alexanders Successors, with lesse (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

§. I. The growth of Rome: and setting of the Easterne Kingdomes.

§. I.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominion in Italie, from the death of TULLVS HOSTILIVS, vnto such time as they were assailed by PYRRHVS.

OW Rome was founded by Romulus; settled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many, though small, victories, it gathered strength; vnto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the raigne of Tullus Hostilius: it hath bene already noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatnesse, beginneth to encounter the power of Greece, and extending it selfe out of Italie, to ouerwhelme the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it conuenient (as in like cases I haue done) briefly to set downe the growth of this mighty Citie, in a compendious relation, of those many actions, which could not haue bene deliuered in the ages, wherein they were severally performed, without much interruption of the Historie, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when hee had reigned two and thirtie years, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grand-child to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much unlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdome of Rome. He walled the Citie about; enlarged it with the hill Auruntine, which he enclosed; built a bridge ouer Tybris, and the Citie of Ostia vpon the Sea, fixteene miles distant from Rome. Finally, hauing reigned foure and twentie years, he died, and by his last will hee left his children in charge with one Lucunus, the sonne of Damaratus a Corinthian, who auoiding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquiny, by the name of which Towne hee was afterwards called Tarquinius. From that Citie in Hetruria comming to Rome, and encouraged by some ominous occurrents, together with his wife Tauaquil propheticke, he grew a fauourite of Ancus Martius; by his Gracian wit humoring the factions of the Roman Court, in so much that after his decease, he became not only Protector to the children, but Governour to the Citie. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centuries of Horse-men: neither was he lesse eminent in warre, than in peace: for he preuailed often against the Tuscan, and from his victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph rocke their original. When this Lucius Tarquinius had reigned eight and thirtie years, he was slaine by the sonnes of Ancus Martius, to whom he had beene left Guardian. But Tauaquil his wife, perceiuing what was done, enformed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and sicke, but not dangerously. And withall signified vnto them, that in the interim of his sicknesse, one Seruius Tullius, whom from his birth the alwaies propheticke to be borne to great hopes, (the sonne of P. Corniculani and Oscilia, a well defended, but captiue woman) brought vp in her house, and husband vnto her daughter, should supplie her husbands place, in governing the State, vntill his recouerie: which government, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards vsurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourecore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the Kingdome in as good sort, as if it had beene a priuate household. At length, hauing two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outrageous: and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquinius Priscus, Sextus and Aruns, which had beene committed to his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters; he (willing to adde water, not oile, to fire) gaue the milde daughter to Sextus the hot-headed sonne; and the violent, to Aruns, the gentle, in marriage. But whether by intended courses, or by accident, it happened, the two milde ones being made away, the furious natures were readily joyned in marriage: who soone concurring, and calling the Senate together, beganne to lay claime to the Kingdome. Vpon this tumult, Seruius Tullius halting to the Senate (where he thought by authoritie to haue bridled insolencie) was throwne downe the staires, and going home fore bruised, was slaine by the way, when he had reigned fortie and foure yeares. Then Tullia his daughter, first proclaiming her husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home, enforced her Coach-man to driue his Chariot ouer her fathers corpes; whereupon the street had the denomination of wicked street. This Tarquine, exercising crueltie without iustice, and tyrannie without mercie, vpon the people and Senators hauing tired him selfe and them at home, vfed the same rage of treacherie vpon his borders. He tooke Osciculum, Suessula Pometia, and the Gaby. The issue of besieging Ardea, a towne eighteene miles distant from Rome, was of bad successe. In the heate of which warre, his sonne Sextus Tarquinius violently rauished that chaste Ladie Lucretia, his kinsman Collatine wife: who in way of expiation for so vnchaste a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamie with her owne blood; so (hauing first bequeathed the reuerge vnto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her husband Collatine, and Junius Brutus) she she killed her selfe: whereupon (chiefly by Junius Brutus his resolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his wife and children, was depouled and banished; and fled to Porfenna King of Hetruria for succour, in the hve and twentieth yeare of his reigne, and the two hundred fortie and fourth from the building of their Citie: in which space Rome had scarce gotten full possession of fiftene miles round about her.

Junius Brutus by the helpe of Collatine, hauing expelled Tarquine, and freed his country from that heauie yoke of bondage, enforced the people by solemn oath, neuer to admit any government by Kings amongst them: whereupon they ransacked their Kings goods, consecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the government of the State vpon Brutus and Collatine. But because the name of King was odious in their eares, they changed the manner of their government, from perpetuall to annuall, and from a single gouernour to a double, left perpetuall or sole dominion might be some motiue to vsurpation; and in stead of Kings they called them Consuls, signifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to be alwaies mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard settling of troubled waters, that the people after this innouation of State, scarce daring to assure themselves of their owne securitie, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to reigne vp his authoritie, fearing that tyrannie would be hereditarie, and supposing that the very name and affinity with the house of Tarquins, fauoured alreadie of their condition. In his room was substituted Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be gracious in the peoples eyes, gaue libertie, in matters of controuersie, to appeale from the Consuls to the people: and that he might as well in good as in person, auoide occasion of suspicion, caused his owne house to be pulled downe, because it was built in a place defensible, as if it had beene a Citadell. Neyther was Brutus any wayes deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples safetie, as their fauour: for hauing got intelligence, that some greener wits, and in the first ranke his owne sonnes, were itching after innouations, hoping to rettore the banished Kings; he caused them, publickely in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all vnpartially to the blocke.

Hitherto the Romans, hauing by the vnblemished integritie of Brutus, well appeased all inbred quarrels at home, now hereafter employ their militarie designements, against Forrainers; first, for their libertie; secondly, for enlarging of their possessions, and lastly, for defending their confederate Prouinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome situated as it were in the mid-way betwene Latium and the Tuscan, hauing as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minority, cannot but giue occasion of offence to her neighbours; vntill by maine opposition, hauing preuailed against her borders, shee vsed them as instruments, whereby to obtaine the rest.

Their first warre, in the first yeare of Consuls, was against Porfenna King of Hetruria, who being ouer-perfwaded by Tarquines lamentation, came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great forces, to seate him againe in his Kingdome.

In the first conflict, Horatius Codes, hauing long time borne the maine brunt of his enemies, on the bridge ouer Tybris, at length feeling himselfe too faint to stand against so many, caused the bridge behinde him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping into the Riuer, like a hunted Stagge, refreshed his hote spirits, and returned safe to his fellowes, with the like resolution to giue a new charge. Porfenna, although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Ianiculum, which is the verie entrance vnto the Citie, and found the victorie, in a manner, assuredly his owne: yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the constant resolution of Mutius Scauola (who hauing by error slaine Porfenna his Secretarie, instead of the King himselfe, did in scorn of torments threatned, burne off his owne hand) hee thought it not any whit prejudiciall, either to his safetie, or credit, to enter league with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleene, was not quite abated, though Arms his sonne, and Brutus his enemy, in single combat, had slaine each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the field; and their Ladies, whose Champion hee was, for their chastitie, not for beautie, mourned the losse of him one whole year. Into his place, for the residue of his yeare, was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia: and in his room (deceasing naturally before the yeare expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquine, vpon his ouerthrow, feeling the fates disastrous, thought it no boot to strue against the streame, and spent the residue of his time; which was about fourteen years, priuately at Tusculum. Yet his sonne-in-law, Atamilius Tullianus, hatching a fire at thole old repulles, because Porfenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied further succour vnto the Tarquines, mulstered vp his Latines, and gaue battaile to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue vncertaine, vntill Aulus Posthumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracie greater than Consuls, purposely for this Warre, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Souldiers courage, threw their owne Ensignes amidst the Enemy; and Cosius or Spurius Cosius (master of the Horse-men, an assistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might runne with free violence, to recouer againe their Ensignes. This fight was so well performed, that a report went current, of Caelor and Pelax, two Gods, who came on milke-white Steeds, to be eye witnesses of their valour, and fellow helpers of their victorie; for the Generall consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, hauing no object of valour abroad, reflected vpon themselves at home; and the sixteenth yeare after the Kings expulsion, vpon instigation of some desperate bankrupts, thinking themselves wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consuls, they made an uproare in the holy Mount; vntill by Neuenius Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconuenience in the head and bellies discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might haue some new Magistrates created, to whom they might appeale in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in their controuersies, the Consuls authoritie notwithstanding. This was enacted; and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attoneement amongst themselves, they had continuall Warre with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Amongst these, the Volsci and Aequi held them longest; who made warre, of themselves, vpon the Romans: whereby they lost the best Citie in their whole iurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, T. Martius got the surname of Coriolanus: a name honorable then, as deriued from a great victorie: although, by reason of the pouertie of the Towne, as a Roman Generall, in after times, would haue bene ashamed of that title. But yet these graces had bene no occasion of disparagement, had hee not afterwards, in a great time of dearth, aduised to sell corne, which they procured from Sicily, at too high a rate, to the people: whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalfe, accused him, and after iudgement, banished him. Coriolanus lying to the Volsci, whom lately before he had vanquished, incensed them to renew their forces againe; which being committed vnto him and to Altitus Tullus, he prevailed in field, so farre forth, that hee was come within foure or fife miles of the Citie. Incapable there hee made so sharpe warre, and was at such defiance, with his Countie, that hee would not relent, by any supplications of Embassadors, vntill his Mother Veturia, and Volumnia his wife, with a pittifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselves better Subjects to their Countie, than friends to their sonne and husband, were more available to Rome, then was any force of armes. Hereupon Coriolanus dismissing his Armie, was after put to death among the Volsci, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunitie: or (as others surmise) liuing with them vntill old age, hee died naturally.

Not

Not long after this, the Vej in Uetruria, prouoked the Romans; against whom the Faby, three hundred and fixe in number, all of one Familie, intreated and obtained, that they only might be imployed, as it had been in a priuate quarrell. These Faby, after some good seruices, lying incamped at Cremora, were circumvented and all slaine: one only of that whole house, had bene left, by reason of infancie, at home; from whom afterward sprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In procelle of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volsci, at the hill Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minucius their Confull, with his whole Armie, had bene discomfited, had not L. Quintus Cincinnatus chofen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the highest honour in Rome, with successe answerable to his expedition, disperfed his enemies, and freed his Countie in the space of sixteen dayes. In the continuance of this Volscian warre it was, that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two yeares before chofen Gouernours of the State, and inactours of Solons lawes amongst them, procured from Albans (abrogating in the meane while the Consuls, and all other Magistracies) would haue rauished Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginus, Captaine of a Companie, and lying then in campe at Algidum. Hereupon the people, in an uproare, tooke the Hill Auentine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men, to resigne vp their authoritie againe, to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrells, or desire to reuenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new warre, against the Vientes, and their adherents, vpon whom hauing tried their forces, with diuersitie of Captaines, and varietie of euent, they vanquished the Falsci, and the Fidenates, and vicerly subdued the Vientes. In conquering the Falsci, Furius Camillus shewed no lesse integritie than fortitude. For when a Schoole-master, by trayning forth into the Roman campe, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Towne, yielding them all vp as Hostages: Camillus deliuered this Traitor bound vnto his Schollers, willing them to whip him back into the Citie; which forthwith yeelded vnto him in reuerence of his iustice. The siege of Vej was ten yeares, and so troublefome, that the Romans were there first enforced to winter abroad vnder beasts skines (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they receiued pay), and to make vowes neuer to returne without victorie.

At length winning the Citie by a Mine, they got so large spoiles, that they consecrated their tenths to Apello Pythius: and the whole people in generall, were called to the ransacking of the Citie. But yet they were no lesse vnthankfull to Camillus for his seruice, than before they had bene to Coriolanus; For they banished him the Citie, vpon some occasion of inequalitye in diuiding the spoiles: yet he requited their vnkindnesse with a new peece of seruice, against the furie of the Gauls: who being a populous Countie, and very healthfull, the fathers (as sometimes now) liued so long, that the sonnes, delitute of meanes, were enforced to roaue abroad, seeking some place, where to set vp their rest: and withall being a Nation vast in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Rovers ouer many Countiees. Some of them lighting on Italie, set vpon Clussum, a Towne in Uetruria; whereof Rome hauing information (and being careful of her Confederate Townes) sent Embassadors, warning them to desist from such injurious enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, vpon some iniurie offered by the Roman Embassadors, conuerred their forces from Clussum towards Rome; and giuing a great ouerthrow to the Romans, by the River Alia, vpon the sixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after towards for vn-luckie, and called Allenfis in the Roman Kalender) they hastened towards the Citie. Then was Rome the true map of miserie and desolation. For some leauing the Citie, some creeping into holes; Priests hiding their reliques; and euery one shifiting for himselfe, ere the enemy came; Rome was abandoned, as indefensible. The Vestall Virgins, in this tumult, were safely conuaid away; the Ancients of the Citie, gathering thier boldneſſe out of deſperate feare, did put on their Robes, and taking their leaue of the world, did ſeate themſelues in Thrones, in their ſeuall houſes, hourly expecting the meſſengers of death, and meaning to die, as they had liued, in State. The younger ſort, which M. Manlius their Captaine, tooke vpon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this, the Gauls were entred the Citie, who ſeeing all quiet, at firſt ſuſpected ſome ambuſh; afterward finding all ſecure, they fell to the ſpoile, committing all to the fire and ſword. As for the old Senators, that ſate in their Majeltie, with a graue reſolution: hauing firſt reuerenced them as Gods, anon they tryed whether they would die like men. When the Citie was thoroughly riſed, they attempted the Capitoll: which held them worke for the ſpace of ſuen Moneths. Once they were like to haue ſurpriſed it by night, but being diſcried by the gaging of Ceeſar, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a compoſition was agreed vpon: the Gauls being wearie, and the Romans hungry. The bargain was, that the Gauls ſhould take a thouſand pound waight in gold, to deſiſt from their ſiege. Whileſt the gold, was in waighing, the Gauls, with open inſolencie, made their waights too heauie: Brennus, their Captaine, calling his ſword into the ballance, and, with a proud exprobration, ſaying, that the vanquiſhed muſt be patient perſeuer. But in the midſt of this cauiling, came Furius Camillus, with an Army, from Ardea, (where he had liued in his baniſhment) and fell vpon the Gauls, with ſuch violence, that hee diſperſed their troupes, quenched the fire of the Citie with their blood, forcing them to reſtore the ſpoiles with advantage, and forbear the gold, in accepting which, they had lately bene ſo nice. Further, hauing rid the Citie of them, he ſo hotly purſued them, through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Army, which eſcaped from him, was very ſmall. Other Armies of the Gauls, which followed this firſt, had the like ill ſucceſſe. They were often beaten by the Romans; eſpecially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in ſingle fight, ſlew a Champion of the Gauls) abated their preſumption, and reſtored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable ſeruiſe, was afterwards accepted a ſecond Romulus.

The people, after this deſtruction of their Citie, were earneſtly bent to goe to the Friz to inhabit; but Camillus diſſwaded them.

About the ſame time, ſomewhat before the ſiege of Friz, they changed their gouernement from Conſuls to militarie Tribunes. The gouernement of theſe alſo, after ſome yeares, was by ciuill diſſention interrupted: ſo that one while Conſuls ruled: another while there was an Anarchie: Then the Tribunes were reſtored and ruled againe, till after many yeares expired, the Conſular authoritie was eſta- bliſhed; it being enacted, that one of the Conſuls ſhould alwaies bee a Plebeian. This was after the building of the Citie, three hundred ſixtie ſue yeares. And now Rome by ſuppreſſion of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her 40 Monitie, dares ſet forth againſt the warlike Sannites, who dwelt almoſt one hundred and thirtie miles off: ſituated betwene Campania and Apulia. Theſe did ſtrongly invade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yeeld themſelues ſubiects to Rome, and vndergoe any conditions of Tribute, or what elſe what ſoever to obtaine protection, which the Romans, although both Countries had bene their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fiſh, ſhould deuour the leſſe, eaſily allowed off; eſpecially aiming themſelues at the good ſituation of Campania, the abundance of Corne and Wine, pleaſant Cities and Townes, but eſpecially Capua it ſelfe, the faireſt Citie then in all Italie.

The Families of the Papyrij and Fabij were moſt employed in the managing of this warre, which indured the ſpace of fiftie yeares. And in this ſeaſon were the Romans oftentimes dangerously encountered by the Sannites, as when T. Peturinus, and Sp. Poſthumius were Conſuls, and diſcomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no ſmall ignominie: and when Q. Fabius Gurgus loſt the field with three thouſand men.

But

But for theſe loſſes, many great victories made large amends: The greateſt where- of were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Sannites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Sannites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but leſſe warlike Nation) beganne to ſtirre. So the one and the other of theſe two Countries, be- came at length, tributarie to Rome.

In the continuance of this long warre it was, (though in time of truce betwene the Romans and Sannites) that the Latines beganne to challenge equal freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing Office, ſo that they required to haue one of the Conſuls yearly choſen out of them.

This demand, of the Latines, was not vnreaſonable. For the Romans themſelues were a Latine Collonie; beſides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any ſuch capitu- lation. So a great battaile was fought betwene them: wherein the fortune of Rome preuailed, by the vertue of the Conſuls.

Mucius Torquatus, and the elder Decius, were then Conſuls, whom the Sooth- ſayers aduerted, that the ſide ſhould be victorious, which loſt the General in fight. Hereupon, Decius the Conſull, expoſed his life to the Enemy, and purchaſed victo- rie (as was beleued) by his death. In which kinde of deuoting himſelfe for his Ar- mie, the ſonne of this Decius, being after Conſull, did imitate his father, in the Hetrurian warre. But (as Tullie well notes) it was rather the deſperate reſolution of theſe Decij, that purchaſed victorie, by ruſhing into the miſt of the enemies, where- in their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of ſuch a religion, as required the liues of ſo worthie Citizens, to be facilitated for their Countrey. The diſcipline of Manlius was no leſſe eſolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forſake his place, and fight ſingle with an enemy. For breach of which or- der, he cauſed his owne ſonne to be put to death, who had ſlaue a Captaine of the Latines, being challenged, in ſingle fight.

When the Latines, the Aequi, Volſci, Hernici, Campani, Sannites, and Hetrurians, with ſome other people, were brought vnder obedience; it was a vaine labour for any people of Italie, to contend againſt the Romans.

Yet the Sabines aduertured to trie their fortune; and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Conſull, waſting all their Countrey with fire and ſword, from the Riuier Nar and Felſa, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet ſubjection.

The laſt of the Italians, that made triall of the Roman Armes, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. Theſe had interpoſed themſelues as Mediators, betwene the Romans and Sannites; with a peremptorie denunciation of warre, vnto that partie, which ſhould dare to reſuſe the peace by them tendered. Theſe threats, which diſcouered their bad affection to Rome, ended in words; but when the Sannites were vtterly ſubdued, matter enough of quarrell was found, to examine their abilitie of performance.

The Romans complained, that certaine ſhips of theirs were robbed; and ſent Em- baſſadours vnto Tarentum, to require amends. Vpon ſome wrong done to theſe Embaſſadours, was laid the foundation of that Warre; wherein the Lucani, Meſſa- pians, Bruttians, and Apulians, joyning with the Tarentines, procured the Sannites, and other Subjects of Rome, to rebell, and take their part. But ſome experience of the Roman ſtrength, taught all theſe people to know their owne weakneſſe. Where- fore they agreed to ſend for Pyrrhus, by whole ſide (being a Græcian, as the Taren- tines alſo were) great hope was conceiued, that the Dominion of Rome ſhould bee 50 confined, vnto more narrow bounds, than all Italie, which already, in a manner it did ouerſpread.

§. I I.

How Pyrrhus warred upon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battailes.

PYRRHVS, forsaken by the Macedonians, and vnable to deale with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to liue in rest: which he abhorred no lesse than a wifer Prince would haue desired. He had a strong Armie, and a good Fleet, which in that vnsettled estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdome: but the fall of Demetrius had so encreased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdom, to make an offensive warre vpon him, without farre greater forces. Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, held Corinth, at the same time, and some other Townes, with the remainder of his fathers Armie and treasures, left in his hand. Vpon him it is like that Pyrrhus might haue wonne; but it was better to let him alone, that hee might serue to giue some hindrance to Lysimachus.

In this want of imploiment, and couetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadors came very fittly to Pyrrhus: and they came with braue offers, as needing none other aide then his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would call themselves vnder his protection. They had in their companie, some of the Samnites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised, in behalfe of their severall Nations, as much as could be desired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that he might enlarge his Empire to the West, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and still by one victorie open the gate vnto another. To which effect it is said, that once he answered Cyneus his chiefe Counsellour, asking what he meant to doe after every of the victories which hee hoped to get: that, having wonne Rome, he would soone be Master of all Italie; that, after Italie he would quickly get the Ile of Sicily; that, out of Sicily hee would passe ouer into Affricke, and winne Carthage, with all the rest of the Countrey; and being strengthened with the force of all these Provinces, hee would be too hard, for any of those that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cyneus enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all: Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would liue merrily; a thing (as Cyneus then told him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his owne.

Neuertheless, this Italian expedition seemed vnto Pyrrhus, a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any scholasticall dispute. Wherefore he prepared his Armie, of almost thirtie thousand men, well sorted, and well trained Souldiers: part of which he sent ouer before him vnder Cyneus, with the rest he followed in person. At his comming, he found the Tarentines very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, vtterly carelesse to provide for the Warre. Wherefore he was faine to shut vp their Theater, and other places of pleasure and resort; enforcing them to take Armes, and making such a stricke muster, as was to them very vnpleasing, though greatly behooning to their estate.

Whilest he was occupied with these cares, Lucius the Roman Consul drew near, and beganne to waite Lucania, a Province confederate with the Tarentines in this Warre.

The Lucanians were not readie to defend their owne Countrey; the Samnites were carelesse of the harme, that fell not (as yet) vpon themselves; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would haue bene, but their valour was little: all of these had bene accustomed to shrinke, for feare of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more vpon his owne forces, than the issue of their vaunting promises. Hee was now driven, either to set forward, with those that himselfe had brought into Italie, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein wherein little was to be repofed; or else to weaken the reputation of his owne sufficiency, which by all meanes he was carefull to vp-hold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had bene scattered by foule weather at Sea, were lately come to him: with which he refused to assaye the valour of the Romans, against whom hee proudly marched.

Lucius the Consul was not affrighted, with the terrible name of a great King, but came on confidently to meet him, and giue him battaile, ere all his adherents should be readie to joyne with him. This boldnesse of the Roman, and the slacknesse of the Messapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger moit concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a treate of peace: requiring to haue the quarrel, betweene the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to winne time, that the Samnites and their fellows might arrive at his Campe; or whether, considering better at neare distance, the weight of the business, which he had taken in hand, he was desirous to quit it with his honour; the short answer, that was returned to his proposition, gaue him no meanes of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen him their Iudge, nor feared him their enemy.

Hereupon, both Armies hastened their march vnto the Riuer of Siris: Lucius intending to fight, before the arrivall of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from passing that Riuer, vntill his owne Armie were full. Vpon the first view of the Roman Campe, it was readily conceived by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to doe with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a braue discipline of warre: which caused him to set a strong Corps de garde, vpon the passage of the riuer, that he might not be compelled to fight, vntill he saw his best advantage. But he quickly found, that this new enemy was not only skilfull in the Art of warre, but courageous in execution. For the Roman Armie entred the Foord, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horse, at the same time, beganne to passe the Riuer, in sundrie places: which caused the Greekes to forsake the defence of their banke, and speedily retire vnto their Campe.

This audacitie forced Pyrrhus to battaile; wherewith he thought it best to present them, ere their whole Armie had recovered firme footing, and were in order. So directing his Captaines how to marshall his battailes; himselfe with the horse, charged vpon the Romans: who stoutly received him, as men well exercised in sustaining furious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transporth him beyond the dutie of a carefull General; nor his providence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personall valour. It behooved him indeede to doe his best; for he neuer met with better opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slaine vnder him: afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the vse of his Kings armour, which was torne from his back. This accident had almost lost him the battaile: but he perceiving it, discovered his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and tooke from the Romans their vaine joy. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater losse (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his side, as long as only speare and sword were vsed. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose vnusuall forme and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (vnaccustomed to the like) were not able to sustaine; then was the victorie quickly gotten. For the Roman battailes, perceiving their horse put to rout, and driven out of the field; finding also themselves both charged in flanke, and ouer-borne, by the force, and huge bulke, of these strange beasts; gaue way to necessity, and suied themselves, as well as they could, by hasty flight: in which confusion, they were so forgetfull of their discipline, that they carried not to defend their Campe, but ranne quite beyond it, leauing both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victorie was soone spread ouer Italie; and the reputation was nolesse than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Consul, Confull, with a select Armie, should loofe in plaine battaile, not only the field, but the Campe it selfe, being so notably fortified, as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more brauely wonne by Pyrrhus, for that hee had with him none of his Italian friends, save the vnrwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well dissemble his content that he tooke, in hauing the glorie of this action peculiarly his owne, at such time as he blamed the Lucians and Samniters, for comming (as we say) a day after the faire. Neuertheless, he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than he could many such victories. Therefore, he thought it good to compound with them, whilest with his honour he might; and to that purpose hee sent vnto them Cyneus his Embassadour; demanding only to haue the Tarentines permitted to liue at rest, and himselfe accepted as their speciall friend. This did Cyneus, with all his cunning, and with liberal gifts, labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their desire of recouering their captiues, or their danger, by the riling of many States in Italie against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blinde Senator, did stirre them vp to make good their honour by warre. So they returned answere, that whilest Pyrrhus abode in Italie, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was thereport, that Cyneus made, at his returne, of the Roman puissance and vertue; as kindled in Pyrrhus a great desire of confederacie, with that gallant Citie. Hereupon many kinde Offices passed betwene them: but still when hee vrged his motion of peace, the answere was, He must first depart out of Italie, and then treat of peace.

In the meane season, each part made prouision for warre; the Romans leauing a more mightie armie than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthened with access vnto his forces; all the East parts of Italie. So they came to triall of a second battaile, wherein (though after long and cruell fight) the boisterous violence of the Elephants, gaue to Pyrrhus a second victorie. But this was not altogether so joyfull, as the former had bene: rather it gaue him cause to say, that such another victorie would be his vtter vndoing. For hee had lost the flower of his Armie in this battaile, and though he draue the Romans into their Campe, yet he could not force them out of it, nor saw any likelihood of preuailling against them, that were like to be relieved with daily supplies, whilest he should bee driuen to spend vpon his old stock. Neither could hee expect, that his Elephants should alwayes stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight, would soone teach the Romans, that were apt Scholers in such learning, how to make them vnserviceable. Wherefore he desired nothing more, than how to carrie his honour safe out of Italie: which to doe (seeing the Romans would not helpe him, by offering or accepting any faire conditions of peace, or of truce) he tooke a slight occasion, presented by fortune, that followeth to be related.

§. III.

§. III.

The great troubles in Macedonia and Sicill. How Pyrrhus, being invited into Sicill, forsooke Italie; wanne the most of the Isle; and lost it in short space.

Pyrrhus returnes into Italie; where he is beaten by the Romans, and so goes back to his owne Kingdome.

When Ptolomie Ceraunus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Selencus, he presently seized vpon all the Dominions of Lysimachus in Europe, as if they had bene the due reward, vnto him, that had slaine the Conquerour. The houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Asie any man of strength and reputation enough, to aduance himselfe against Ceraunus. The friends of Lysimachus were rather pleased to haue him their King, that had (as hee professed) reuenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiousness of his fact, by which they were freed from subiection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that vpon remembrance of his Fathers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselves that his raigne might proue good, though his entrance had bene wicked. These afflictions of the Macedonians did serue to defeat Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, that made an attempt vpon the Kingdome. As for Antiochus, the sonne of Selencus, he was farre off, and might be questioned about some part of Asie, ere he should be able to bring an Armie neare vnto Europe. Yet hee made great shew of meaning to reuenge his fathers death: but being stronger in monie than in armes, hee was content, after a while, to take faire words, and make peace with the murderer. While these three stroue about the Kingdome, Pyrrhus, who thought his claime as good as any of theirs, made vse of their dissention: threatening warre, or promising his assistance, to euery one of them. By these meanes he strengthened himselfe, and greatly aduantaged his Italian voiage, which hee had then in hand: requesting monie of Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Ptolomie, who gaue him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (covenanting to haue them restored at two yeares end) more farre feare than for loue: that so he might free himselfe from trouble, & quietly enjoy his Kingdome.

Thus Ptolomie grew mightie on the suddaine; and the power that by wicked meanes he had gotten, by meanes as wicked he increased.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong Citie of Cassandria, was held by Arconce his siller, the widow of Lysimachus, who lay therein with her young children. Her hee circumvented by making loue to her, and (according to the fashion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinitie) taking her to wife, with promise to adopt her children: a promise that he meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere he slew them, and draue her into exile.

In the pride of this good successe, which his vilanie found; vengeance came vpon him from a farre, by the furie of a Nation, that hee had neuer heard off. Belgus a Captaine of the Gauls, hauing forced his passage through many Countries, vnto the confines of Itace, sent a proud message to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy peace with monie, or other wise, to looke for all the miseries of warre. These Gauls were the race of those, that issued out of their Countrie, to seeke new feates, in that great expedition, wherein Brennus tooke and burnt the Citie of Rome. They had diuided themselves, at their setting forth, into two Companies; of which the one fell vpon Italie, the other passing through the Countries that lie on the Northerne side of the Adriaticke Sea, made long abode in Pannonia, and the Regions adioyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeme peace with tribute, as now they would haue compelled Ceraunus to doe; vnto whose borders they came, about an hundred and eight yeares after such time as their fellows had taken Rome.

Cecce

When

When their Embassadors came to Ptolomie, asking what he would giue : His answer was, that he would be contented to giue them peace, but it must bee with condition, that they should put into his hands their Princes as hostages, and yield vp their armes; for otherwife, he would neither pardon their boldnesse, nor giue any credit to their words. At this answer, when it was returned, the Gauls did laugh; saying, that they would soone confute with deeds, the vanitie of such proud words. It may seeme strange, that he, who had giuen away part of his Armie vnto Pyrhus, for very feare, should bee so confident in vndertaking more mightie enemies. The King of the Dardaniens offered to lend him twentie thousand men against the Gauls; but hee scorned the offer; saying, that hee had the children of those, which vnder the conduct of Alexander, had subdued all the East. Thus hee issued forth against the barbarous people, with his famous Macedonians, as if the victorie mult needs haue followed the reputation of a great name. But hee soone found his great error, when it was too late. For the enemies were not only equall in strength of body, and fiercenesse of courage, but so farre superiour to the Macedonians in numbers, that few or none escaped their furie. Ptolomie himselfe grievously wounded, fell into their hands, whilst the battaile continued; and they presently strooke off his head, which they shewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their vtter astonishment.

The report of this great overthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Townes, and abandoned the whole Countrey as lost. Only Sesphenes, a valiant Capitaine, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Armie, with which hee many times got the vpper hand, and hindred Belgius from vsing the victorie at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would haue made him King; which title he refused, and was content with the name of a Generall. But (as mischiefs doe seldom come alone) the good successe of Belgius, drew into Macedon Brennus, another Capitaine of the Gauls, with an hundred and fiftie thousand foot, and fiftene thousand horse; against which mightie Armie, when Sesphenes with his weake troups made opposition, hee was easily beaten, and the Macedonians againe compelled to hide themselves within their walls, leaving all their Countrey to the spoile of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians debilitate of a King, and troden downe by a Nation, that they had not heard of; in lesse then fiftie yeares after the death of Alexander, who fought to discouer and subdue vnknown Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia, had beene too little for a King of Macedon.

Very seasonably had these newes beene carried to Pyrhus in Italie; who found a faire pretext of relinquishing his warre with the Romans; had not other tidings of Sicil distracted him, and carried him away in pursute of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who reigned ouer the whole Island, the Carthaginians sent an Armie to conquer Sicil, out of which, by him, they had beene expelled. This Armie did so fast preuaile, that the Sicilians had no other hope to auoide slaueerie, than in submitting themselves to the rule of Pyrhus; whom, being a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, than to liue vnder the well knowne heauie yoke of Carthage. To him therefore, the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agrogentines, principall Estates of the Isle, sent Embassadors, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieved Pyrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions, of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so vnluckily, both at one time. Yet whether he thought the businesse of Sicil more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps hee beleued (as came after to passe) that his aduantage, vpon Macedon, would not so hastily passe away, but that he might finde some occasion to lay hold on it, at better leaue, ouer into Sicil he transported his Armie, leaving the Tarentines to shift for themselves; yet not leaving them free as hee found them, but with a Garrison in their Towne, to hold them in subiection.

As

As his departure out of Italie, was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature aduice; so were his actions following, vntill his returne vnto Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, than well ordered, or more worthie. The Armie which hee carried into that Isle, consisted of thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse: with which, soone after his descent in Sicil, hee forct the Carthaginians, out of all, in effect, that they held therein. He also wonne the strong Citie of Eryx, and hauing beaten the Mameritines in battaile, hee beganne to change condition, and turne Tyrant. For hee draue Sofistratus (to whom his crueltie was suspected) out of the Island, and put Theron of Syracuse to death, being jealous of his greatnesse; which two persons had faithfully serued him, and deliuered the great and rich Citie of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined so fast, as hee serued himselfe, and salued the disreputation of his leauing Sicil, by an Embassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Sammites, imploring his present helpe against the Romans, who since his leauing Italie, had well neare disposited them of all that they had.

Taking this faire occasion, hee embarked for Italie; but was first beaten by the Carthaginians Gallies, in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italie sent, by eightene hundred Mameritines, that attended him in the straits of the Countrey. Lastly, after hee had recovered Tarentum, hee fought a third battaile with the Romans, led by M. Curtius, who was victorious ouer him, and forct him out of Italie, into his owne Epirus.

A Prince hee was farre more valiant than constant, and had hee beene but a General of an Armie, for some other great King or State, and had beene directed to haue conquered any one Countrey or Kingdome, it is to be thought, that hee would haue purchased no lesse honour, than any man of warre, either preceding or succeeding him; for a greater Capitaine, or a valiantier man, hath bene nowhere found. But hee neuer staid vpon any enterprize; which was, indeede, the discafe hee had, whereof not long after hee died in Argos.

§. IIII.

How ANTIGONVS, the sonne of DEMETRIVS, deliuered Macedon from the Gauls. How PYRRHVS wonne the Kingdome of Macedon from ANTIGONVS.

The vertue of Sesphenes being too weake, to defend the Kingdome of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him against Belgius, failing him in his attempts against Brennus; the Macedonians were no lesse glad to submit themselves vnto the government of Antigonus, than they had formerly beene desirous, to free themselves, from the impotent rule of his father Demetrius. His comming into the Countrey, with an Armie, Naue, and treasure, becoming a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for hee was driuen to vse against the Babarians, only those forces, which hee brought with him, hauing none other than good wiues of the Macedons, to take his part. Brennus, with the maine strength of his Armie, was gone to spoile the Temple of Apollo at Delfos; hauing left no more behinde him, than he thought necessarie to guarno the borders of Macedon, and Pannonia; which were about fiftene thousand foot, and three thousand horse. These could not be idle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of their fellows: and then sure sent vnto Antigonus, offering to sell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraneus, hee had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Antigonus was vnwilling to weaken his reputation, by condescending to their proud demands: yet hee judged it vnfit to exasperat their furious choler, by vncurteous words or vslages, as Ceraneus had ouerfondly done. Wherefore

he entertained their Embassadors in very louing and sumptuous manner, with a roiall feast: wherein he exposed to their view, such abundance of masse gold and siluer, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with sight of the vessels, wherein it was serued. He thought hereby, to make them vnderstand, how great a Prince he was, and how able, if neede required, to wage a mightie Armie.

To which end, he likewise did shew vnto them, his Camp and Nauie, but especially his Elephants. But all this brauerie serued only to kindle their greedie appetites; who seeing his ships heauie laden, his Campe full of wealth, and ill fortified, himselfe (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage inferior vnto the Gauls: thought all time lost, wherein they suffered the present possessors, to spend the riches, which they accompted assuredly their owne. They returned therefore to their Companions, with none other newes in their mouthes, than of spoile and purchase: which tale, caried the Gauls head-long, to Antigonus his camp, where they expected a greater bootie, than the victorie ouer Ceraunus had giuen to Belgius. Their coming was terrible and suddaine; yet not so suddaine, but that Antigonus had notice of it: who distrustful of the courage of his owne men, dislodged somewhat before their arriual, and conueighed himselfe, with his whole armie and carriage, into certaine woods adioyning, where he lay close.

The Gauls, finding his Camp forsaken, were not battie to pursue him, but fell to ransacking the empty Cabines of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched euery place in vaine, angrie at their lost labour, they marched with all speed toward the Sea-side; that they might fall vpon him, whilst hee was busie in getting his men and carriages a ship-board. But the successe was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought vpon Antigonus, they were so careless of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoile of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Armie had left Antigonus, where he lay in couert, and had saved himselfe by getting aboard the fleet: in which number were some well experienced men of warre, who discouering the much aduantage offered vnto them, by the desperate presumption of their enemies, tooke courage, and encouraged others, to lay manie hold vpon the opportunitie. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resolution, gaue so braue a charge vpon the disordered Gauls, that their contemptuous boldnesse was thereby changed into suddaine feare, and they, after a great slaughter, driuen to cast themselves into the serueice of Antigonus.

The fame of this victorie, caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters, to re-entertaine their ancient beliefe of the Macedonian valour: by which, the terrible and resistlesse oppressors of so many Countries, were ouerthrowne.

To speake more of the Gauls, in this place; and to shew how, about these times, 49 three Tribes of men passed ouer into Asia the lesse, with their warres and conquests there; I hold it needlesse: the victorious armes of the Romans, taming them hereafter, in the Countries which now they wanne, shall giue better occasion, to rehearse these matters briefly.

Howsoever the good successe of Antigonus got him reputation, among the barbarous people, yet his owne Souldiers, that without his leading, had wonne this victorie, could not thereupon be perswaded, to thinke him a good man of warre: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the seruice, wherein his conduct was no better, than creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appeare) was greatly helpfull vnto Pyrrius: though as yet, he knew not so much. For Pyrrius, when his affaires in Italie stood vpon hard termes, had sent vnto Antigonus for helpe: not without threats, in case it were denied. So was he sure to get, either a supply, wherewith to continue his war against the Romans, or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italie, vnder colour of making making his word good, in seeking reuenge. The threats which he had vsed in brauerie, were necessitie forced him, at his returne into Epirus, to put in practice.

He brought home with him, eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse: an armie too little to be imploied, by his reslesse nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had meanes to keepe in pay. Therefore he fell vpon Macedon; intending to take what spoile he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this businesse, two thousand of Antigonus his Souldiers, reuolted vnto Pyrrius; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, receiued him. Such faire beginnings, easily perswaded the 10 courage of this daring Prince, to set vpon Antigonus himselfe, and to hazard his fortune, in trial of a battaile, for the whole Kingdome of Macedon.

It appeares, that Antigonus had no desire to fight, with this hot warrior; but thought it the wisest way, by protracting of time, to wearie him out of the Countrey. For Pyrrius ouertooke him in a straight passage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gauls, and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength: a manifest proofe that he was in retreat. The Gauls very brauely sustained Pyrrius his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slaine) after a sharpe fight: wherein it seemes, that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the streight, and not aduancing to their succour, tooke away 20 their courage, by deceiuing their expectation. The Captaines of the Elephants were taken soone after; who, finding themselves exposed to the same violence, that had consumed so many of the Gauls, yielded themselves and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus, and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort: which emboldened Pyrrius, to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged only in a front, it was a matter of extreme difficultie (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had scene so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrrius; who discouered so well their affections, that hee aduentured to draw neare in person, and exhorted them to yeeld. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader, refused to become his follower.

All forsooke Antigonus, a few horse-men excepted, that fled a long with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and monie enough to entertaine a greater power, had he knowne where to leaue it. But whilst he was thinking, how to allure a sufficient number of the Gauls into his seruice; whereby hee might re- 30 pare his losse: Ptolomie, the sonne of Pyrrius, came vpon him, and easily defeating his weak forces, draue him to flee from the parts about Macedon, to those Townes a farre off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himselfe a King.

This good successe reuiued the spirits of the Epirois, and caused him to forget all sorrow, of his late misfortunes in the Roman warre: so that he sent for his sonne Hecleus (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Caste of Tarentum) willing him to come ouer into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselves.

§. V.

How Pyrrius assailed Sparta without successe. His enterprise vpon Argos, and his death.

PYRRIUS had now conceiued a great hope, that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing, that in open fight, he had vanquished the Gauls, beaten Antigonus, and wonne the Kingdome of Macedon; There was not in all Greece, nor, indeede, in all the Lands that Alexander had wonne, any Leader of such name and worth, as deserved to be set vp against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might doe what he

he pleaded. He raised therefore an Armie, consisting of five and twentie thousand foot, two thousand horse, and foure and twentie Elephants; pretending warre against Antigonus and the gaining libertie to those Townes in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subjection; though it was easily discovered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some designe more important, than warre against a Prince already vanquished, and almost vterly dejected. Especially the Lacedemonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrie, had betaken himselfe to Pyrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his Kingdome. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrhus make thew of any displeasure, that he bare vnto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to haue two of his owne yonger sonnes trained vp in that Citie, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours hee deluded men, euen till he entred vpon Laconia; where presently he demeaned himselfe as an open enemy: excusing himselfe, and his former dissembling words, with a iealet; That he followed herein the Lacedemonian custome, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedemonians, to deale in like sort with others, whom, in the time of their greatness, they fought to oppress: but now they complained of that, as falsehood, in Pyrhus, which they alwaies practised as wilddome, till it made them distrustful, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Neuerthelesse, they were not wanting to themselves, in this dangerous extremity. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Towne; causing such as could beare armes, to rescue themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrhus had vnwisely deferred, vpon assurance of preuailing.

Sparta was neuer fortified, before this time, otherwise than with armed Citizens: soone after this (it being built vpon vneuen ground, and for the most part hard to approach) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with walls; at the present, only trenches were cast, and barriadoes made with Carts, where the entrance seemed most easie. Three daies together it was assailed by Pyrhus, exceeding fiercely, and no lesse stoutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preferred the Towne the first day; whereinto the violence of Pyrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindfull of sauing the person of their King, than of breaking into the Citie, though already they had torne in sunder the barriadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captaines got into Sparta, with a good strength of men; and Arew the King returned out of Crete (where he had beene helping his friends in warre) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his owne countrie stood, vntill he was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, than kindle in Pyrhus a desire to preuaile against all impediments. But the third daies worke shewed, how great his error had bene, in forbearing to assault the Towne at his first coming. For he was so manfully repelled, that hee saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course, he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Armie, though not strong enough to meet the enemy in plaine field, yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrhus doubtful what way to take; being diuersly affected, by the difficultie of his enterprize in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilst hee was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inuiting him thither; with promise, to deliuer that Citie into his hands.

Civil diffension raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of severall factions, to call in Pyrhus and Antigonus; but the coming of these two Princes, taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous, to rid their hands of such powerfull Assistants, as each of the two Kings pretended himselfe to be. Antigonus told the Argives, that he came to saue them from the tyrannic of Pyrhus; and that hee would be be gone if they needed not his helpe. On the other side, Pyrhus would needes perswade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them safe from Antigonus, offering in like manner, to depart, if they so desired.

The Argues tooke small pleasure, in hearing the Foxe and Kite at strife, which of them should keepe the Chickens from his enemy: and therefore prayed them both, to diuert their powers some other way. Hercunto Antigonus readily condescended, and gaue hostages to assure his word: for he was the weaker, and stood in neede of good-will. But Pyrhus thought it enough to promise: hostages he would giue none, to his inferiours; especially, meaning deceit. This made them suspect his purpose to be such, as, in indeede, it was. Yet he leif regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthe of assurance, by giuing such a bond, as hee intended to breake ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the Citie should be opened by night vnto Pyrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Armie, without any tumult, entred the Citie: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to passe the Gate. The taking off, and setting on againe, of those Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both giue alarme to the Citie, and some leisure to take order for defence, before so many were entred, as could fully Master it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindered the Gauls (that had the Vanguard) being ignorant of the waies, in the darke night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much aduantage, by their knowledge of euery by-passage: and setting vpon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great losse, and more trouble.

Pyrhus therefore, vnderstanding by the confused noise, and vnequall shoutings of his owne men, that they were in distresse, entred the Citie in person, to take order for their reliefe, and assurance of the place. But the darkenesse, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, vntill break of day. Then beganne he to make his passage by force, and so farre preuailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is said, that seeing in that place, the Image of a Wolfe and a Bull, in such posture as if they had bene combattant, hee called to minde an Oracle, which threatened him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolfe: and that hereupon he made retreat.

Indee, the coming of Antigonus to the rescue, the disorder and confusion of his owne men; with diuers ill accidents, gaue him reasonable cause to haue retired out of the Citie, though the Wolfe and Bull had bene away. The tumult was such, that no directions could be heard; but as some gaue back, so did others thrust forward, and the Argues pressing hard vpon him, forced Pyrhus to make good his retreat, with his owne sword. The tops of the houles were couered with women, that stood looking on the fight. Among these was one, that saw her owne sonne in dangerous case, fighting with Pyrhus. Wherefore, shee tooke a tile stone, or slate, and threw it so violently downe on the head of Pyrhus, that hee fell to ground astonished with the blow; and lying in that case, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the rellesse ambition of Pyrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdome of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith possessed the armie, the bodie, and the children of his enemy. The bodie of Pyrhus, had honourable funeral, and was giuen by Antigonus vnto Helene his sonne; which young Prince he graciously sent home, into his Fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus, held the Kingdome of Macedon; the posteritie of Seleucus, reigned ouer Asia and Syria; and the house of Ptolemie had quiet possession of Egypt: vntill such time, as the Citie of Rome, swallowing all vp, digested these, among other Countreies, into the bodie of her owne Empire.

CHAP. I.

Of the first Punicke Warre.

§. I.

A discussion of that probleme of LIVIE; Whether the Romans could haue resisted the great ALEXANDER. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equall valour to the English.

40 THAT question handled by LIVIE, Whether the great ALEXANDER could haue preuailed against the Romans, if after his Easterne conquest, he had bent all his forces against them, hath bene, and is, the subject of much dispute; which (as it seemes to me) the arguments on both sides do not so well explaine, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath giuen, of the Roman power, in his daies. For if he, a Commander (in Han-nibals judgement) inferior to Alexander, though 50 to none else, could with small strength of men, and little store of monie, or of other needfull helps in warre, vanquish them in two battailes, and endanger their estate, when it was well setled, and held the best part of Italie, vnder a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander haue done, that was abundantly provided of all which is need-full

full to a Conquerour, wanting only matter of employment, comming vpon them before their Dominion was halfe so well settled. It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more, than thirtie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse (as indeede, at his first passage into Asia, he carried ouer, not many more) and that the rest of his followers were no better than bafe effeminate Asiatiques. But he that considers the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipater, Cyrtus, Eumenes, Ptolemy, Antigonus, and Lysimachus, with the actions by them performed, euery one of which (to omit others) commanded only some fragment of this dead Emperours power; shall easily finde, that such reckoning is farre short of the truth.

It were needlesse to speake of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of batterie, and the like: of all which, the Macedonian had abundance; the Roman hauing nought, save men and armes. As for Sea-forces; he that shall consider after what sort the Romans, in their first Punicke warre, were trained, in the rudiments of Navigation; sitting vpon the shoare, and beating the land with poles, to practise the stroke of the Oare, as not daring to lanch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will easily conceiue, how farre too weakie they would haue proved in such seruices.

Now for helpers in warre; I doe not see, why all Greece and Macedon, being absolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deserue to be laid in ballance, against those parts of Italy, which the Romans held in ill-assured subiection. To omit therefore all benefit, that the Easterne world, more wealthie, indeede, than so valiant, could haue afforded vnto the Macedonian: let vs only conjecture, how the States of Sicill and Carthage, nearest neighbours, to such a quarrell (had it happened) would haue stood affected. The Sicilians were, for the most part, Graecians; neither is it to bee doubted, that they would readily haue submitted themselves vnto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what termes they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselves, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is, that Alexander recomming into those parts, would haue brought excellencie joy, to them that were faine to get the helpe of Pyrrius, by offering to become his subjects. As for the Carthaginians; if Agathocles, the Tyrant of Syracuse, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his owne besieged Citie, could, by aduenturing to saile into Africke, put their Dominion, yea and Carthage it selfe, in extreme hazard; shall wee thinke that they would haue bene able to withstand Alexander? But, why doe I question their abilitie, seeing that they sent Embassadors, with their submission, as farre as Babylon, ere the warre drew neare them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Roman mult, without other succour, than perhaps of some few Italian friends (of which yet there were none, that forooke them not, at some time, both before and after this) haue opposed their valour, and good militarie discipline, against the power of all Countries, to them knowne, if they would haue made resistance. How they could haue sped well, in vndertaking such a match; it is vncasie to finde in discouerie of humane reason. It is true; that vertue and fortune worke wonders: but it is against cowardly fooles, and the vnfortunate: for whosoever contends with one too mightie for him; either must excell in these, as much as his enimie goes beyond him in power; or else must looke, both to be ouer-come, and to bee cast downe so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman, or the Macedonian, were in those daies the better Souldier, I will not take vpon me to determine: though I might, without partialitie, deliuer mine owne opinion, and preferre that Arme, which followed not only Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of warre; before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did send forth. Concerning so fortune; who can giue a rule that shall alwaies hold? Alexander was victorious in euery battaile he fought: and the Romans in the issue of euery warre. But forasmuch as Liuie hath judged this matter worthe of consideration; I thinke it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italy: where in three three yeares after his death, the two Roman Consuls, together with all the power of that State, were surprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yeeld vp their armes. We may therefore permit Liuie to admire his owne Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Captaines of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equal to his followers: that the same conceipt should blind our judgment, we cannot permit without much vantage.

Now in deciding such a controuerisie, me thinks it were not amiss, for an Englisht man, to giue such a sentence betwene the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being chosen Arbitrators) betwene the Aradians and Aricians, that strife about a peece of land; saying, that it belonged vnto neither of them, but vnto the Roman themselves.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman, were the best Warriour? I will answer: The Englisht man. For it will soone appeare, to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nation in warre, that they were performed by no aduantage of weapon; against no fawge or vnmannerly people; the enimie being farre superiour vnto vs in numbers, and all needfull prouisions, yea as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of warre.

In what sort Philip wanne his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Persians and Indians were; whom Alexander vanquished; as likewise of what force the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, against such armies as it commonly encountered: any man, that hath taken paines to reade the foregoing storie of them, doth sufficiently vnderstand. Yet was this Phalanx neuer, or very fewe, able to stand, against the Roman Armies: which were embattailed in so excellent a forme, as I know not, whether any Nation besides them haue vied, either before or since. The Roman weapons likewise, both offensive and defensive, were of greater vice, than those with which any other Nation hath serued, before the fierie instruments of Gunne-powder were knowne. As for the enemies, with which Rome had to doe; we finde, that they, which did ouer-match her in numbers, were as farre ouer-matched by her, in weapons; and that they, of whom there had little aduantage in armes, had as little aduantage of her in multitude. This also (as Plutarch well obserueth) was a part of her happinesse; that there was neuer ouer-laid, with two great warres at once.

Hereby it came to passe, that hauing at first increased her strength, by accession of the Sabines, hauing wonne the State of Alba, against which shee aduentured her owne selfe, as it were in wager, vpon the heads of three Champions: and hauing thereby made her selfe Princessesse of Latium: shee did afterwards, by long warre, in many ages, extend her Dominion ouer all Italy. The Carthaginians had well neare oppressed her: but their Souldiers were Mercinarie; so that for want of proper strength, they were easily beaten at their owne doores. The Etolians, and with them all, or the most of Greece, assisted her against Philip the Macedonian: hee being beaten, did lend her his helpe, to beat the same Etolians. The warres against Antiochus, and other Asiatiques, were such as gaue to Rome small cause of boast, though much of joy: for those opposites were as bafe of courage, as the lands which they held were abundant of riches. Sicill, Syracuse, and all Greece, fell into her hands by vnging her aide, to protect them against the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I shall not neede to speake of her other conquests: it was easie to get more when shee had gotten all this. It is not my purpose to disgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemish the reputation of so many famous victories: I am not so idle. This I say; that among all their warres, I finde not any, wherein their so valour hath appeared, comparable to the Englisht. If my judgement seeme ouer-partiall; our warres in France may helpe to make it good.

First therefore it is well knowne; that Rome (or perhaps all the world besides) had neuer any so braue a Commander in warre, as Julius Caesar: and that no Roman armie, was comparable vnto that, which serued vnder the same Cesar. Likewise, it is apparent, that this gallant Armie, which had giuen faire proofe of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Heluetian warre, when it first entred into Gaulies, was neuertheless vtterly disheartened, when Caesar led it against the Germanes. So that we may iustly impute, all that was extraordinary in the valour of Caesar's men, to their long exercise, vnder fo good a Leader, in fo great a warre. Now let vs in generall compare with the deedes, done by these best of Roman Souldiers, in their principall seruice; the things performed in the same Countrey, by our common Englisch Souldier, leauied in haite, from following the Carr, or sitting on the thop-stall: fo shall we see the difference. Herein will we deale fairly, and beleuee Caesar, in relating the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Historians to witnesse, what actions were performed by the Englisch. In Caesar's time, France was inhabited by the Gaulies, a stout people, but inferior to the French, by whom they were subdued; euen when the Romans gaue them assistance. The Countrey of Gaulie was rent in sunder (as Caesar witnesseth) into many Lordships: some of which were governed by petty Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in such fort as might make it applicable to the nearest Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: not only in generall through the whole Countrey, but betwene the petty States, yet in euery Citie, and almost in euery house. What greater advantage could a Conquerour desire? Yet there was a greater. Ariouistus, with his Germani, had ouer-runne the Countrey, and held much part of it in a subiection, little different from mere slavery: yea, fo often had the Germanes prevailed in warre vpon the Gaulies, that the Gaulies (who had sometimes bene the better Souldiers) did hold themselves no way equall to those daily Inuaders. Had France bene fo prepared vnto our Englisch Kings, Rome it selfe, by this time, and long ere this time, would haue bene ours. But when King Edward the third beganne his warre vpon France, hee found the whole Countrey setled in obedience to one mightie King; a King whose reputation abroad, was no lesse, than his puissance at home; vnder whose Ensigne, the King of Bohemia, did serue in person; at whose call, the Genouoyes, and other Neighbour States, were ready to take armes: finally, a King vnto whom one Prince gaue away his Dominion, for loue; & another sold away a goodly Citie and Territorie for mouie. The Countrey lying fo open to the Roman, and being so well fenced against the Englisch, it is note-worthy, not who prevailed most therein (for it were mere vanitie, to match the Englisch purchases, with the Roman conquest) but whether of the two gaue the greater proofe of militarie vertue. Caesar himselfe doth witness, that the Gaulies complained of their owne ignorance in the Art of warre, and that their owne hardnesse was ouer-mastered, by the skill of their enemies. Poore men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of batterie, raised and planted against their walls, as more than humane workes. What greater wonder is it, that such a people was beaten by the Roman; than that the Cariés, a naked people, but valiant, as any vnder the skie, are commonly put to the worke, by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to haue regard, of the great difficultie that was found, in drawing all the Gaulies, or any great part of them, to one head, that with ioynt forces they might oppose their assailants: as also the much more difficultie, of holding them long together. For hereby it came to passe, that they were neuer able to make vse of oportunitie: but sometimes compelled to flay for their followers; and sometimes driuen, to giue or take battaile, vpon extreme disadvantages, for feare, least their Companies should fall a-sunder: as indeede, vpon any little disaster, they were ready to breake, and returne euery one to the defence of his owne. All this, and (which was little lesse than all this) great oddes in weapon, gaue to the Romans, the honour of many gallant victories. What such helpe? or what other worldly helpe, than the golden metall of their Souldiers, had our Englisch Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of Warre? Yea, did they not thinke themselves therein our superiours? Were they not in armes, in horse, and in all prouision, exceedingly beyond vs?

Let

Let vs heare, what a French writer saith, of the inequality that was betwene the French and Englisch, when their King John was ready to giue the on-let, vpon the Black Prince, at the battaile of Poitiers. JOHN had all advantages ouer EDWARD, both of number, of ce, then, Countrey, and conceit (the which is commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affaires) and withall, the choise of all his beste men ( esteemed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Captaines of his whole Realme. And what could he with more?

I thinke, it would trouble a Roman antiquaire, to finde the like example in their Histories; the example, I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an Armie of eight thousand, which he had surrounded with fortie thousand, better appointed, and no lesse expert warriors. This I am sure of; that neither Syphax the Nu-midian, followed by a rabble of halfe Scullions, as Lince rightly tearmes them, nor those cowardly Kings Perseus and Gentius, are worthe patters. All that haue read of Crespe and Agincourt, will beare me witnesse, that I doe not allage the battaile of Poitiers, for lack of other, as good examples of the Englisch vertue: the proofe whereof hath lent many a hundred better marks, in all quarters of France, than euer did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these victories of ours to the long Bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Crosse-bow: my answer is ready; that in all these respects, it is also (being drawne with a strong arme) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more vse. The Gunne, and the Crosse-bow, are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weakenesse, or sicknesse, or a fore finger, makes the long Bow vnseruicable. More particularly, I say, that it was the custom of our Ancetors, to shoot, for the most part, point blank: and fo shall hee perceive, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battaile. This takes away all objection: for when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of arrowes, or two at the most, can be deliuered, before they close. Neither is it in generall true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more strongly than the Crosse-bow: But this is the rare effect, of an extraordinarie arme; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall aske, How then came it to passe, that the Englisch wanne so many great battailes, hauing no advantage to helpe him? I may, with best commendation of modestie, referre him to the French Historian: who relating the victory of our men at Crenant, where they killed a bridge, in face of the enemy, & these were words; The Englisch comes with a 10th de Serres, conquering bravely, as he, that was accustomed to giue euery where, without any flay: kee forth our garde, placed vpon the bridge, to keepe the passage. Or I may cite another place of the same Author, where he tells, how the Britons, being inuaded by Charles the eight, King of France, thought it good policie, to apparell a thousand and two hundred of their owne men in Englisch Callics; hoping that the very sight of the Englisch Crosse, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Aemilius; report wonders of our Nation) the proposition which first I undertooke to maintain; that the militarie vertue of the Englisch, prevailing against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of Romans, which was assisted with all advantages that could be desired. If it be demanded; why then did not our Kings finish the conquest, as Caesar had done? my answer may bee (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the race of the Æacids, of whom the Poet Ennius gaue this note; Belli potentes sunt magis quam sapienti potentes; they were more warlike than politique. Who fo notes their proceedings, may finde, that none of them went to worke like a Conquerour: saue only King Henrie the first, the course of whose victories, it pleased God to interrupt by his death. But this question is the more easily answered, if another be first made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conquest of Gaulie, before the time of Caesar? why not after the Macedonian warre? why not after the third Punic, or after the Numidian? At all these times they had good leiture: and then especially had they both leisure, and fit oportunitie, when in the conduct of Marius, they had newly vanquished the Cimbri, and Teutones, by whom the Countrie of Gaul had bene pitcoully wasted. Surely, the words of Tullie were true; that with other Nations, the Romans fought for Dominion; with the Gauls, for preferation of their owne latitude.

Therefore they attempted not the conquest of Gaul, untill they were Lords of all other Countreies, to them knowne. We on the other side, held only the one halfe of our owne land; the other halfe being inhabited by a Nation (wiltic perhaps in wealth and numbers of men somewhat inferiour) every way equall to our felicity, a Nation, anciently & strongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard, enemy to vs. So that our danger lay both before and behinde vs: and the greater danger at our backs; where commonly we felt, alwaies we feared, a stronger invasion by land, than we could make vpon France, transporting our forces ouer Sea.

It is vsuall, with men, that haue pleased themselves, in admiring the matters which they finde in ancient Histories; to hold it a great iniurie done to their judgment, if any take vpon him, by way of comparison, to extoll the things of later ages. But I am well perswaded, that as the diuised vertue of this our land, hath giuen more noble proofe of it selfe; than vnder to worthe a Leader, that Roman Armie could doe, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Cesar a Monarch, so hereafter, by Gods blessing, who hath concerted our greatest hindrance, into our greatest helpe, the enemy that shall dare to trie our forces, will finde cause to with, that auoiding vs, hee had rather encountered as great a puissance, as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that laying a side comparisons, we returne to the rehearsal of deeds done: wherein we shall finde, how Rome began, after Pyrrius had left Italy, to strue with Carthage for Dominion, in the first Punic warre.

§. II.

The estate of Carthage, before it entred into warre with Rome.

He Citie of Carthage had stood aboue sixe hundred yeares, when first it began to contend with Rome, for the maistrick of Sicily. It forwent Rome one hundred and fiftie yeares in antiquitie of foundation: but in the honor of great atchieuements, it excelled farre beyond this advantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion in Africa it selfe, from the west part of Cyrene, to the streights of Hercules, about one thousand and five hundred miles in length, wherein stood three hundred Cities. It had subjected all Spain, euen to the Pyrenean Mountaines, together with all the Islands in the Mediterranean Sea, to the west of Sicily; and of Sicily the better part. It flourished about seven hundred and thirtieth yeare, before the destruction thereof by Scipio: who besides other spoiles, and all that the Souldiers referred, carried thence foure hundred & fiftie thousand weight of siluer, which make of our monie (if our pounds differ not) fourtene hundred and ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious Citie, ranne the same fortune, which many other great ones haue done. Both before and since. The ruine of the goodliest peeces of the world, fore-flues the dissolution of the whole.

About one hundred yeares after such time as it was cast downe, the Senate of Rome caused it to be rebuilt: and by Gracchus it was called Iunonia: it was againe and againe abandoned and re-peopled, taken and retaken; by Genfericus the Pandal, by Belofarius vnder Iustinian, by the Persians, by the Agyptians, and by the Mohometans. It is now nothing. The seat thereof was exceeding strong: and, while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, inuincible. For the Sea compassed it about, furing that it was tied to the maine by a neck of land; which passage had two mile and more of breadth (Africke is aith three mile, and one furlong) by which we may be induced, to beleue the common report, that the Citie it selfe, was about twentie mile in compass; compass; if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to haue bene twice as great.

It had three walls, without the wall of the Citie; and betweene each of those, three or foure streets, with vaults vnder ground, of thirtie foot deepe, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants, and all their food. Ouer these they had stables for foure thousand horse, and Granaries for all their prouender. They had also lodging in these streets, betweene these out-walls for foure thousand horse-men and twentie thousand foot-men, which (according to the discipline vied now by those of China) neuer pestered the Citie. It had towards the South part, the Citie of Byssa; to which Servilius giues two and twentie furlongs in compass, that make two mile and a halfe. This was the same peece of ground, which Licio obtained of the Libyans, when hee got leaue to buy only of most kind of them, as hee could compass with an Oxe hide. On the west side it had also the salt Sea, but in the nature of a standing poole; for a certaine arme of Land, fastened to the ground, on which the Citie stood, stretched it selfe towards the west continent, and left but leuentic foot open for the Sea to enter. Ouer this standing Sea was built a most sumptuous Arsenal, hauing their ships and gallies riding vnder it.

The forme of their Common-weale resembled that of Sparta; for they had titularie Kings, and the Aristocratical power of Senators. But (as Regius well obserueth) the people in later times vltured too great authoritie in their Councils. This confusion in gouernement, together with the trull that they reposed in hired Souldiers, were helping causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more forcible causes of their ruine, were their auarice and their cruelty. A their auarice was shewed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinarie tributes) the one halfe of the fruits of the earth; and in conferring of great Offices, not vpon gentle and mercifull persons, but vpon those who could best tyrannize ouer the people, to augment their treasures. Their cruelty appeared, in putting them to death without mercie, that had offended through ignorance. The one of these rendered them odious to their vassals, whom it made readie, vpon all occasions, to revolt from them: the other did breake the spirits of their Generalls, by presenting in the heat of their actions abroad, the feare of a cruell death at home. Hereby it came to passe, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian forces, after some great losse received, haue desperately cast themselves, with all that remained vnder their charge, into the throat of destruction; holding it necessarie, either to repaire their losses quickly, or to ruine all together: and few of them haue dared, to manage their owne best projects, after that good forme, wherein they first conceived them, for feare lest the manner of their proceeding should be misinterpreted: It being the Carthaginian rule, to crucifie, not only the vnhappy Captaine, but euen him, whose bad counsaile had prospered euent. The faults, wherewith, in general, they of Carthage are taxed by Roman Historians, I finde to be these; lust, cruelty, auarice, craft, vnfaithfulness, inello, and perjurie. Whether the Romans themselves were free from the same crimes, let the triall be referred vnto their actions. The first league betwene Carthage and Rome, was very ancient: hauing bene made, the yeare following the expulsiion of Tarquinius. In that league, the Carthaginians had the superiortie, as imposing vpon the Romans, the more strict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans should not so much as haue trade, in some part of Africa, nor suffer any ship of theirs, to passe beyond the headland, or cape, then called the Saine Promontorie, vnlesse it were by force obtayned: whereas on the other side, no Hauen in Italy was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A second league was made long after, which (how fouler it hath pleased Licio to say, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreatie) was more strict than the former: prohibiting the Romans, to haue trade in any part of Africa, or in the land of Sardinia.

By these two treaties it may appeare, that the Carthaginians had an intent, not only to keep the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledge of the state of Africa; but to countenance & uphold them, in their troubling all Italy.

whereby they themselves might have the better means to occupie all Sicill, whilst that Island should be destitute of Italian succours. Hereupon were kinde good cause, of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crowne of gold, weighing twentie & five pound, sent from Rome to Rome, when the Sannites were overthrowne. But the little state of Tenete, prevailed faster in Italie, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicill. For that mighty Armie, of three hundred thousand men, which Annibal conducted out of Affric into Sicill, wanne only two Cities therein; many great floods were deuoured by tempests; and howlouer the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their owne valour, or by assistance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repaire their owne losses, and take reuenge vpon these Inuadours. But neuer were the people of Carthage in better hope, of getting all Sicill, than when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole Land in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible, for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilst the Carthaginians were busie, in making their advantage, of this good oportunitie; Pyrrhus, invited by the Tarentines, and their fellows, came into Italie, where hee made sharpe warre vpon the Romans. These newes were vnpleasing to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtle Nation, easily foresaw, that the same basic disposition, which had brought this Prince, out of Greece into Italie, would as easily transport him over into Sicill, as soone as he could finish his Roman warre. To preuent this danger, they sent Alco Embassadour to Rome, who declared in their name, that they were sorie to heare, what misadventure had befallen the Romans, their good friends, in this warre with Pyrrhus; and that the people of Carthage were very willing to assist the state of Rome, by sending an Armie into Italie; if their helpe were thought needfull, against the Epiriots.

It was, indeede, the maine desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus so hardly to his worke in Italie, that they might, at good leisure, pursue their businesse in Sicill: which caused them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high minded: and refused to accept any such aide of their friends; least it should blemish their reputation, and make them seeme vnable to stand by their owne strength. Yet the message was taken louingly, as it ought; and the former league betwene Rome and Carthage renewed with covenants added, concerning the present businesse. That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be, with reservation of libertie, to assist the other, in case that Pyrrhus should invade either of their Dominion. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, vntill all means to found his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one vpon euery new occasion changeth his owne purposes) yet Pyrrhus found leisure to make a step into Sicill: where, though in fine hee was neither getter nor sauer, yet hee cleane defeated the purposes of Carthage, leaving them at his departure thence, as farre from any end, as when they first beganne.

So many disasters, in an enterprise, that from the first vndertaking, had bene so strongly pursued, through the length of many generations, might well haue induc'd the Carthaginians to belicue, that an higher providence resisted their intentment. But their desire, of winning that fruitfull Island, was so insatiate; that with vnwearied patience, they still continued in hope, of so much the greater an haruelt, by how much their cost and paines therein buried had bene the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses; and by force or practise, recovered in few yeares, all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chiefe City of the Island, that so they might the better enable themselves to deale with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, a troupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had serued vnder Agathocles, being entertained within Messina as friends, and finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, tooke advantage of the power that they had to doe wrong; and with perfidious crueltie, slew those that had trusted them; which done they occupied the Citie, Lands, Goods, and Wiues, of those, whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselves Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that mere desperation, of finding any that would approve their barbarous treacherie, added rage vnto their frowne. Having therefore none other colour of their proceedings, than the Law of the stronger, they ouerran the Countrey round about them.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not only defend Messina against the Cities of Sicill Confederate, to wit, against the Syracusians, and others, but they rather wan vpon them, yea, and vpon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her back to these Mamertines, the Syracusians wanne fall vpon them, and finally, confining them within the walls of Messina, they also with a powerfull Armie besieged the Citie. It happened ill, that about the same time, a contention beganne, betwene the Syracusan Souldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracuse; and Gouernours of the Common-wealth; which proceeded so firre that the Armie elected two Gouernours, among themselves; to wit, Artemidorus, and Theron, that was afterwards King. Theron, being for his yeares excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrarie to the policie of that State, to approue any election made by the Souldiers, yet for the great clemencie hee ved at his first entrance, was by generall consent, established and made Gouernour. This Office, he rather ved as a Scale, thereby to climbe to some higher degree, than rested content with his present preferment.

In briefe, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himselfe within the Citie; and somewhat without it, that gaue impediment, to his obtaining, and safe keeping, of the place he sought; to wit, a powerfull partie within the Towne, and certaine mutinous troups of Souldiers without, often and easily moued to sedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himselfe, hee tooke to wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest estimation and authoritie among the Syracusians. For the second, leading out the Armie to besiege Messina, he quartered all his Companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the Citie, and leading the rest of his horse and foot vnto the other side, as if he would haue assaulted it in two severall parts, he marched a way vnder the court of the Towne walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in peeces by the assaied: So returning home, and leauing an Armie of his owne Citizens, well trained and obedient, hee halted againe towards Messina, and was by the Mamertines (growne proud by their former victorie ouer the Mutiners) incountred in the plains of Ayleum, where hee obtained a most signall victorie, and leading with him their Commander Captiue into Syracuse, himselfe by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mamertines, finding themselves vtterly infeasible, some of them reselued to giue themselves to the Carthaginians, others to craue assistance of the Romans: to each of whom, the severall factions, dispatched Embassadours for the same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soone readie, to lay hold vpon the good offer: so that a Captaine of theirs got into the Castle of Messina, whereof they that had sent him gaue him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captaine, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of doores, and the Towne reserved for other Masters.

These newes did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Captaine, as both a Traitor and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Armie to besiege Messina, as a Towne that rebelled, hauing once bene theirs. Theron, the new-made King of Syracuse (to gratifie his people, incensed with the smart of injuries lately received) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom hee entered into a league, for exterminating the Mamertines out of Sicill. So the Mamertines on all sides were closed vp within Messana: the Carthaginians lying with a Nauie at Sen, and with an Armie on the one side of the Towne, whilest Hieron with his Syracusans, lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger, came Appius Claudius, the Roman Consull, with an Armie to the streights of Sicily: which passing by night with notable audacitie, hee put himselfe into the Towne, and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hiera, required them to depart; signifying vnto them, that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore hee was come to giue them protection, euen by force of warre, if reason would not preuaile.

This message was vterly neglected; And so beganne the warre betwene Rome and Carthage; wherein it will then be time to shew, on which part was the iustice of the quarrell, when some actions of the Romans, lately foregoing this, haue bene first considered.

§. III.

The beginning of the first Punick warre. That it was vniusly undertaken by the Romans.

When Pyrrhus beganne his warres in Italie, the Citie of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not only fearing to be taken by the Epyri, but much more distrusting the Carthaginians, as likely to seize vpon it at that busie time, sought aide from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, consisting of foure thousand Souldiers, vnder the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and assured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering at good leisure, the fact of the Mamertines, committed in Messana, (a Citie in Sicily, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no otherwise diuided than by a narrow Sea, which feuereth it from Italie) and rather weighing the greatnesse of the bootie, than the odioulnesse of the vilanie, by which it was gotten; resolved finally, to make the like purchase, by taking the like wicked course. Confederating therefore themselves with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; diuiding the spoile, and all which that State had, among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate & people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the world made a more seuerer profukion of iustice, than they did, during all the time of their growing greatnesse) resolved, after a while, to take reuenge vpon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italie, by Pyrrhus. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulenesse of their fact, hopelesse of pardon) defended themselves with an obstinate resolution: yet in the end, the assailants forced them; and those which escaped the present furie, were brought bound to Rome, where after the vusual torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custome of the Countrey, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders; and the people of Rhegium were againe restored to their former liberties and estates.

This execution of iustice being newly performed, and the fame thereof founding honourably through all quarters of Italie: messengers came to Rome, from Messana, desiring helpe against the Carthaginians, and Syracusans, that were in a readinesse to inflict the like punishment vpon the Mamertines, for the like offence. An impudent request it was, which they made: who hauing both giuen example of that vilanie, to the Roman Souldiers and holpen them with ioynt forces to make it good; intreat the Iudges to giue them that assistance, which they were wont to recieue from their fellow theetes.

The

The Romans were not suddenly resolute, whether the way of honellie, or of profit, were to be followed; they euenmore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They considered, how contrarie the course of succouring the Mamertines was, to their former counsells, and actions: seeing for the same offences they had lately put to torment, and to the sword, their owne Souldiers, and restored the oppressed to their libertie. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the best parts of Africa, of the Mediterranean lands, of a great part of Spain, and some part of Sicily selfe; whilest also they feared, that Syracuse therein feared (a Citie in beautie and riches, little, at that time, inferior to Carthage, and farre superiour to Rome it selfe) might become theirs; the safetie of their owne estate spake for these Mamertines: who, if they (driven to despair by the Romans) should deliuer vp Messana, with those other holds, that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand betwene Carthage, and the Lordship of all Sicily: for Syracuse it selfe could not, for want of succour, any long time subsist, if once the Carthaginians, that were Masters of the Sea, did fasten vpon that passage from the maine Land. It was further considered; that the oportunitie of Messana was such, as would not only debarre all succours out of the continent, from arrivall in Sicily; but would serue as a bridge, wherby the Carthaginians might haue entrance into Italie, at their owne pleasure.

These considerations, of profit at hand, and of preventing dangers, that threatened from a farre: did so preuaile, about all regard of honellie, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacie with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Consull, presently dispatched away for Messana into which he entred, and vnder-tooke the protection of it, as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arrivall; and less moued, with his requiring them, to desist from their attempt. For they did farre exceede him in number of men; the whole Island was readie to relieue them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Towne. All this Appius himselfe well vnderstood: and against all this, he thought the fittest mettal of his Roman Souldier, a sufficient reuenge. Therefore, he resolved to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his coming was to send them away from the Towne; not to be besieged by them with him.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficiall to him, that the enemy lay encamped in such fort, as one quarter was not well able to relieue another in distresse. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, wherinto hee had wilfully cast his owne mutinous followers, not long before: only he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his owne quarter, without helpe of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by vnexpected sallie, to surprize his trenches) arranged his men in order of battaile, wherewith hee presented him.

The Syracusans wanted not courage to fight; but surely, hee wanted good aduice: else would he not haue hazarded all his power against an enemy, of whom he had made no triall; when it had bene easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his owne Campe. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorne the beginning of his raigne. But he was well beaten, and driven to saue himselfe with in his Trenches: by which losse, he learned a point of wisdom, that would him and his Kingdome in good stead, all the daies of his life. It was a foolish desire of reuenge, that had made the Syracusans so busie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana bene taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it selfe must haue sought helpe from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mightie Cities) but a small stock, which it bestowed him to gouerne well: such another losse would haue made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake vp his Camp, and retired home: intending to let them stand to their adventures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargain. The next day, day, Claudius perceiving the Sietian Armie gone, did with great courage, and with much alacrity of hisouldiers, giue charge vpon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the enemy forooke both held and campe, leaving all the Countre open to the Romans; who hauing spoiled all round, without reitance, intended to lay siege vnto the great Citie of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, how foucer they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes, of attayning to greater matters, than at first they had expected. Yet did they not imprint any forme of terror, in the Citie of Carthage, that had wel enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost, than what had bene prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspition of warre from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it seasonable, to consider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this warre; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honor (for questionlesse the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict termes of lawfulness, whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themselves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, distressed by the Samites, had done) I cannot finde: neither can I finde, how the messengers of those folke, whereof one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any such surrendrie, in the publike name of all their Companie.
